RELIGIOUS RULE.

"The White Cappers are the Lord's chosen to wreak out his vengeance on the wicked and unjust."—White Cap notice at Napoleon, O.

Notes and Clippings.

ARCHBISHOP RIORDAN, of San Francisco, has asked the California superior court for permission to sell a portion of the mission church property on Dolores and Sixteenth streets, of that city, that Sixteenth street may be opened. It seems, comments Freethought, that when property is taxed the church does not hold on to it so tenaciously as when it costs nothing to keep it.

WILBER F. CRAFTS has resigned his pastorate in this city to take the office of field secretary of the American Sabbath Union, the organization which J. B. Wolff, for the American Secular Union, recently confronted in Washington. Mr. Crafts is now to travel and organize auxiliary unions among the churches of the country, and hold public meetings in advocacy of a national Puritan Sunday law. Secretary Stevens of the Secular Union will hav to look sharp after Crafts.

THIS is how the Rev. Madison C. Peters, of Philadelphia, discusses the theater: "All actors are not moral; all preachers are not moral. There is not a better woman in Philadelphia than Charlotte Cushman was or Mary Anderson is. Nor is there a man in this city whose character is more spotless and life more beneficent than Joseph Jefferson's. Honor to whom honor is due. Crimes are committed on the stage; so they are in the Bible. The chief themes of the theater are the passions of men; so are the subjects of the chisel of Angelo, the brush of Guido, the brain of Dore, the burden of the Sermon on the Mount by Christ. If the exposure of sin is an indecency, to be consistent all the literature in the world, sacred or profane, must be committed to the flames. The plays that achieve the widest and most permanent success are as innocent as milk."

IN considering the subject of Spiritualism the other day, the Rev. J. A. Roney, Catholic, gave utterance to these inspired remarks: "Angels, saints, and the souls in purgatory are under God's order and not subject to man, not even to the churches established by Christ. Mediums may call them, but they will not come. Neither can the reprobated souls come, because, being consigned to the regions of perdition and being under God's sentence, it is not in the power of the devil to produce them at séances. If there are spirits at the service of Spiritists it is certain that they are devils, and it is also certain that they hav no good object in answering the call of the mediums. Spiritism is, beyond question, demonism." Spiritualists will kindly note this, and consider the matter settled.

THE Evening Post thus describes the life of the missionaries in Turkey: "They liv in good and often handsome houses, with sufficient servants, and surrounded by every European and American comfort. They are far better off than country clergymen at home, because they preach but few sermons, hav absolutely no parish work, receive fairly good salaries, are sure of a pension for their old age, of occasional journeys home with expenses paid, and know that funds will be found somewhere to send the boys to school and college. At Manissa (Magnesia) the missionaries used to occupy the best house of the place, a former harem of the pasha, which was furnished well, where they had a large library, engravings, and photographs, a Steinway piano and cabinet organ, and received most of the magazines and illustrated papers. At Constantinople the mission has become a mere business institution. The ladies conduct a large and flourishing girls' school called 'The Home,' and the men run a large printing establishment called 'The Bible-House,' where they print Bibles, books, and religious or mildly secular papers in several languages. They go to their offices in the morning and return to their families at night, like so many men of business at home."

THERE are a good many towns of which this story has been told: The Rev. Dr. A. E. Dunning, of Boston, tells this story: he was visiting his home in Maine, and an old fellow-townsman began a theological discussion with him. "Parson," said he, "the Bible says that the Lord made the world in six days. Do you believe it?" "Yes." "Now, do you think that he finished the whole thing up in that time?" "Yes." "Well, all I can say is, that he could hav put in one day more to mighty good advantage right here in this town."

ELLIOTT F. SHEPARD, the bombastic and bigoted editor of the Mail and Express, has become an issue in this little town. He has hired a "war correspondent" on his staff, has been challenged to fight a duel, and has besides attended to his religious duty of getting control of the board of directors of the Fifth Avenue Stage Company, to the end that he may stop the running of stages on Sunday. It is alleged that in the interest of righteousness he has used his paper to depreciate the stock of the company, while his brokers hav been buying it in cheap. He has succeeded in putting six of his directors on the board. The opposing members—wicked, worldly-minded men—are mad all through, and will try to keep up the ungodly Sunday stages, but the colonel, armed on his knowledge that he has a majority of the directors, will go ahead without fear of the consequences. It is said that chromos of men prominent in church circles will decorate the stages, and that each passenger will be furnished with a suitable biblical text. It is also hinted that he will shortly turn the stage line into a street railway company, when he will reap the just reward of his virtue, as a railway line will pay better than the stages. The Evening Sun publishes the following rules, modeled upon those in force in the Mail and Express office, as to be posted in the stables: "On and after this date no stages will be run on the Sabbath day. (Read the Mail and Express.) All employees will be required to attend church twice on the Sabbath. All drivers and stable hands will at once fill out blanks giving their full names, residences, number and names of the members of their families, where born, their faith; what church they attend, and whether they are regular members thereof; the names of their pastors; where educated; their experience (if any) in Wall street; their politics, and such other information as may be required at the discretion of their friend and employer.—Col. Elliott F. Shepard. It is also stipulated that all employees shall at once become members of the Salvation Army. (Buy the Christmas number of the Mail and Express, price three cents.) If you can't ride on my line use the Fourth avenue line and keep the money in the family." Colonel Shepard, concludes the Sun, will thus combine business with morality, and he will hav no man in his employ whose habits nd pedigree are not on file."

The Mission of Freethought.

Freethought is the religion of Nature. It has often been remarked that under normal conditions, under circumstances favorable to healthy social development, the political institutions of antiquity differed but little from those of the freest nations of our age; and with equal truth it may be declared that the religious opinions of the great thinkers of by-gone ages exhibit a striking resemblance to the most advanced views of modern Rationalists. Their philosophy may hav been biased by the prevailing scientific crochets of their respectiv centuries, but they all agreed in recognizing the right of free inquiry, in respecting the sanctity of truth and the power of knowledge, and in opposing the claims of dogmatic monopolists, especially when their dogmas extended their pretensions to the domain of the unknowable. They all preferred the eternal oracles of Nature to the gospel of pretended supernatural revelators. They honored God by studying his works, and by obeying his moral and physical health laws, rather than by celebrating the anniversaries of his family events and feeding the ministers of his altars. They refused to sacrifice earth to heaven, and the certain present to a doubtful future; they did not insult their All-father by despising his visible works and the form he created in his image; they did not believe that the road to the New Jerusalem leads over the trampled flowers of this earth; they advised their brethren to enjoy paradise on this side of the grave.

The confessors of that religion, from Plato to Thomas Paine, from Aristotle to Charles Darwin, from Confucius to Jean Jacques Rousseau, hav been united by an unbroken bond of fellowship, by a unanimity which unitary truth can alone inspire; their system, founded on eternal facts, can never fall, their enthusiasm can never wither while Nature remains young and fair. Science, self-reliance, justice, love of light, truth, and freedom, were the bulwarks which hav stood, like the mountain ramparts of the Waldenses, between spiritual despotism and the last strongholds of mental liberty.

From the beginning of authentic history Rationalism has been the leaven of mankind, the salt which preserved the moral world from putrefaction. Freethinkers hav been the champions of nature against all her enemies; they hav never abandoned that standpoint, though they had to face attacks from many different directions, and had once to rally on a single center when their outworks were forced by overwhelming numbers. In the dark ages of the world Freethinkers hav liberated their brethren from the fear of the ghosts and monstrous phantoms to which that night gave birth; in the dawn of civilization they hav led the way toward the mountain-tops of knowledge, which were already lighted by the rays of a rising sun. Before the citizens of the first republics had learned to circumscribe the license of their rulers by general laws, Freethinkers bridled the caprice of kings and priests by satire, and made suecessful appeals from the throne of power to the tribunal of humanity. They stoqd up for common sense and the right of free inquiry whenever the absurdities of polytheism threatened to assume the form of authoritativ dogmas; to such men as Socrates, Aristophanes, and Lucretius the Greeks and Romans owed it that their mythology never became anything worse than a fanciful nature-worship.

And finally, when the childhood of the human race was past; when logic, science, and self-reliance were sufficiently developed to grapple with such an enemy, the men of Freethought were called upon to save the world from the fearful danger of an anti-natural religion. Our foes hav been overpowered, but only after a struggle which has trampled the garden-spots of the Old World into dust; they hav been expelled from their strongholds, but only after turning so many happiest countries of this earth into a hell of madness and tyranny that it might once seem doubtful if the rest were worth while saving, if the discovery of a new continent had not given us a new lease of life and liberty.

From North America, at least, our victories hav averted the danger—for a time. What that danger means our favored land can hardly conceive, unless we review the fate of those nations to whom salvation came too late, on whose destiny the curse of that moral disease has been wrought out to the bitter end. Like a moral pest, the Semitic insanity has swept over the Mediterranean god-gardens and left a desert in its track, physical, political, and intellectual.

The founders of that religion assured us that the study of natural sciences is unworthy of the sons of the thaumaturgic church, and, indeed, superfluous, since all the blessings of earth are distributed by supernatural agencies, and, if lost, may be restored in answer to prayer. We believed it, and the elysian fields of southern Europe were changed into hopeless sand-wastes; husbandry, agriculture, and the science of health languished; cadaverous saints burrowed in the deserted mountains, and the nymphs and fauns left their old haunts forever.

The Semitic prophets told us that our bodies are only fit to be mortified; that they must be macerated in order to deaden our natural instincts, and that physical health is unfavorable to true saintliness. We believed it, and the gymnasium was abandoned for the convent, the god-like athletes of Greece and the invincible Roman warriors were superseded by whining wretches who gloried in sickness and deformity.

They told us that all human wisdom is vain, that faith is superior to science, that spiritual poverty is bliss, and an inquisitiv mind a proof of an unregenerate heart. They found believers, and a general eclipse of common sense and reason followed like an unnatural night upon the bright sunrise of Grecian civilization.

They propagated the dogma of eternal torment as a punishment of theological non-conformity, and their converts desolated the earth by a series of murderous aggressiv wars and persecutions, whose atrocities seemed fully justified if they resulted in the salvation of a single immortal soul from such a fate.

Their gospel inculcated an implicit belief in the possibility of miracles and demoniac possessions, and the pantheism of the ancients degenerated into a pandiabolism; in trees, in mountains and rivers, wherever the pagans had sought a god, the Christians feared a devil; the witchcraft mania raged through the world like a mental epidemic, devouring more victims than all the wars of Assyria, Persia, and Rome taken together, and turned the lands of Christendom into such a pandemonium that the lot of African and American savages appeared heaven in comparison.

Humanity, justice, manhood, science, and common sense were thrown prostrate and fettered at the foot of the cross; mankind lay in a fever dream, and a swarm of vampires sucked their life-blood with impunity.

When the disease reached a point beyond which recovery would hav been impossible, the northern nations saved themselvs by a revolt whose significance can no longer be concealed—the success of the Reformation is a secret whose solution has long enough been whispered in the chambers, and may now be openly proclaimed. It was an insurrection against Jerusalem as well as against Rome, a protest against St. Peter as well as against his successor.

We got our hands free, and before long managed to pull the bandages from our eyes and the shackles from our feet. Blind submission and the repetition of prescribed prayers were exchanged for the more congenial occupation of protesting, especially against the suppressors of free investigation. The claims of our religious system were then investigated, and with curious results. If our spiritual Bastile has not been toppled yet, it is at least well undermined; its dungeon gates hav been unlocked, and all but the utterly blind hav availed themselvs of the open doors.

When our fathers had invigorated their bodies and souls in the free air of America, the Liberals of all sects and nations united their strength for a grand and successful effort, and effected the divorce of our legislativ and educational institutions from their unnatural alliance with a specter of the Old World. We dared to use our eyes for seeing, and our feet for progressiv purposes; we transferred our attention from the mysteries of the New Zion to secular affairs; we resigned heaven to the ghost, and tried to recover our lost earthly elysium. As a result our nation prospered beyond anything in the experience of the last fifty generations, our country began to blossom like the Garden of the Hesperides, and the days of the golden age promised to return.

But as paradise attracted the fiend, as a sweet fruit attracts the worm, our plethora of health and happiness has attracted the vampires that drained the life-springs of our ancestors. The ghouls hav risen from their shallow graves—they stalk in our midst in their traditional disguises; while we slept on our laurels they hav been wide awake; they are at their old work again wherever their designs are favored by darkness, wherever they can lull the vigilance of their victims by their somniferous artifices. They hav gained access to our schools and firesides; their opiate artists take a hand in the preparation of our mental food; the ominous smell of orthodox narcotics mingles once more with our social atmosphere; audible whispers repeat that the light of the apocalypse is, after all, superior to sunshine, and that metaphysics ought to be a monopoly of the church. They attempt to graft their insidious doctrin on our republican institutions; yes, try to attach a hoodwinking appendage to our very liberty cap, and importune our government to subsidize their free dormitories.

And these are the moralists who to-day denounce our impious interference with the darkness of sacred mysteries and the bliss of obedient recumbency, and with whom we are now called upon to try conclusions as the champions of sunlight and free air against the dealers in beeswax and gilded candlesticks.

In the first place, let us make a stand against the continuation of a nomenclatural abuse. Transfer the favorit epithet of our slanderers to those who hav to reproach themselvs with any disloyalty in thought or action. Let us vindicate the sacredness of our cause. Shall the friends of truth cringe before the hirelings of imposture? The champions of science before the slaves of superstition? Upright men before moral prostitutes? Shall we submit to be branded with the name of Infidels—i.e., faithless deserters—by creatures who hav abandoned their reason for blind faith, nature for a dogma, and her eternal glories for a crucifix? It is true that some of us hav forsaken a church which once claimed them as her own, but they might as well call a reformed toper an Infidel for freeing himself from the slavery of the alcoholic habit, or a woman for abandoning a house of ill-fame into which she had been inveigled during her unsuspecting youth.

In the second place, keep their controversionalists to the point; do not permit them to obscure the questions at issue by their favorit artifices. Expose the contemptible strategy that has to take refuge in slander and misrepresentation; exhibit the weapons that hav been used in the warfare against the heroes of Freethought, against Socrates, Bruno, Servetus, Spinoza, Hume, Voltaire, and Paine; challenge the church to name a single dissenter whose logic they could answer in any other way than by attacking his body or his personal reputation.

Let us scrupulously abstain from anything that might give color to rude calumnies; let our actions prove that moral health not only can, but as a rule does go hand in hand with intellectual sanity; that those who resist the tyranny of an anti-natural dogma are the readiest to obey the laws of justice and the laws of nature. Let the world judge between our morality and theirs; let us clinch our charges and specifications before they hav time to falsify the records of the Middle Ages; but let us strictly confine ourselvs to historical facts, whose terrible truth can, indeed, defy the rivalry of fiction.

But, above all things, keep constantly before their eyes the anti-natural tendencies of their dogma.

Do not permit them to obscure, disguise, or deny the fact that their religion is founded on the doctrin of total natural depravity and the necessity of preternatural salvation; that it teaches mistrust in our inborn instincts, teaches the duty of sacrificing our physical and secular welfare on the altar of supernaturalism, and directly encourages neglect of the most important health laws of God. We are called upon to believe on the authority of a divine messenger that it is indifferent what enters our mouth so long as the words that leave it are soundly orthodox; that sickness is a consequence of diabolical possession and prayer its proper cure; that it is heathenish and unworthy of a saint to work and busy himself with terrestrial affairs; that health, strength, knowledge, and industry can be dispensed with by true believers, in whose favor the laws of nature that would visit such neglect with dire penalties will be miraculously suspended.

To this doctrin we owe all the physical woes that made the Middle Ages the unhappiest period in the history of mankind; all the intemperance, quackery, and scrofulous imbecility that blights our modern civilization; all the unmanliness that contrasts our generation with the hero-race of antiquity. All our dietetic abuses, all our modern outrages against the science of health, all our sins against the fertility of our Mother Earth, are due to the belief that the laws of nature can be neglected with impunity. The destruction of forests alone has made two-fifths of the Old World uninhabitable by drouths and locust swarms, which our spiritual guides still advise us to avert by prayer-meetings. Like an all-pervading mist, the poison vapor of mysticism has obscured the light of science and blinded the eyes of common sense to innumerable fallacies and charlatanries. Our physical training, our diet, our hygienic tenets, and our entire educational system need a thorough revision. Our codes and school-books must be purged from anti-naturalism. No hope of progress while our feet are tied with such shackles, no chance of recovery while our daily food is such a poison.

If this side of the question were kept constantly in view the controversy about the toleration of Freethought would speedily assume a different aspect. Toleration of Freethought! The very word implies a misconception of our mission and our claims. Our right to occupy our present standpoint would not be disputed, if we had made it clearly understood that we must and will advance—if we had demonstrated, as we could demonstrate, the duty of every honest man to aid the progress of our cause. Not as a right only, but as a solemn obligation, truth seeking and truth speaking should be recognized; our fellow-men should honor as well as tolerate our principles, respect our loyalty to facts as they should respect conformity to any other moral law. A society of Freethinkers craving the indulgence of the mythology-mongers is in the position of the honest tradesman deprecating the wrath of a gang of counterfeiters, of a virgin imploring a coterie of prostitutes not to treat her as an outcast.

Do not condescend to any compromise with jugglers and miracle-mongers, do not encourage them by connivance or the slightest sign of fear. Numerically we are still in the minority; but this world is guided, governed, judged, and educated, and has always been reformed, by numerical minorities. A cause imparts its strength to its representativs; we are the healthful police of the moral world; we need not doubt that the officers of the health bureau and their employees are in a numerical minority against those who secretly prefer the darkness of their slum alleys to light and air, and dislike the trouble of removing pestiferous rubbish heaps, and yet the health office prevails by the strength of an overwhelming array of proofs in favor of the necessity of this work. A majority of voters will follow, if it is once sufficiently known that we hav on our side not only a majority, but a monopoly, of unanswerable arguments.

One advantage has already been added to the direct superiority of truth over imposture; the accumulated testimony of science and genius can no longer be overlooked. Millions are familiar with the fact that our roll of honor displays the names of nearly all men who hav ever distinguished themselvs in science and literature; that, with the rarest exceptions, all great thinkers, discoverers, inventors, authors, and poets were Liberals, and hav recorded their protest against a creed whose delusions are fatal to originality and genius; millions are familiar with the documents of history and the results of critical research into the evidences of our worshiped dogmas. Nature herself bears witness against them. Francis Volney used to assert that a self-thinking man of a fair average education who still professes a belief in the Semitic myths must either be a hypocrit or a blockhead; nowadays we may say that such a man must be either a hypocrit or a maniac. Human stupidity has its limits. Unless the right of free opinion is denounced à priori, it is not possible for a normally constituted human being to adhere to a dogma whose absurdities admit of mathematical demonstration—it is not possible to believe in the divine authority of a church which has sanctioned atrocities against which the better part of mankind had to combine in sheer self defense.

We hav to stultify ourselvs before we can see in which sense of the word our present polytheism is an improvement on the ancient system—what we gained in exchanging a pantheon for a charnel-house, a company of happy gods for an assembly of tearful saints, a chief-god with the propensities of a buck-goat for a supreme being with the disposition of a tiger—it is difficult to see why it is more unworthy of a god to persecute four or five earthly beauties with his illicit amours than to torment untold millions of his helpless creatures in an eternal abyss of brimstone and fire. It is not possible to believe that we owe our civilization to a church which has been in league with all despots that consented to make themselvs her tools, which has always opposed freedom of speech, of doctrin, and of conscience, to the utmost of its power, and has never failed to aim its poisoned daggers at the heart of every reformer, every scientific discoverer, and every destroyer of error. It is not in human nature to honor a system whose anti-natural tenets hav degraded its disciples to the verge of beasthood, and which has yearly for the last four centuries demonstrated its own fallibility in a thousand different ways.

A sincere adherence to such doctrins implies voluntary blindness. It is a consoling circumstance to know that all clear-seeing men are openly or secretly of our opinion. Many who are wide awake to the absurdities of their professed creed dislike to expose what they may hav private reasons to think a useful superstition, and may hate us for proclaiming the truth, but their wrath is impotent; hypocrits can never be formidable enemies. The unchangeable laws of the universe are antagonistic to unveracity; only he who is himself convinced is blessed with the gift of convincing others.

Hav confidence enough in the mightiness of truth to rely on the completeness of our ultimate victory. Let us encourage our weak brethren by our unanimity, our hearty coöperation, and our confidence in the strength of our cause. Present a bold front to the enemy, and be sure that every victory of ours will lessen their numerical superiority by hundreds whom fear alone prevents from joining our ranks. Let us not insult the manhood of our race by doubting that thousands secretly detest the chains which the cowardice of their fellow-slaves obliges them to wear in silence. In this age of anachronistic dogmas and pious shams, they must yearn for a believable religion, as the prisoner yearns for pure air and sunlight. It is a serious grievance for a manly man to be refused the right of standing erect in the presence of a contemptible idol; it is no trifle if the eternal hopes and the entire moral system of a nation are founded on a transparent fraud.

Accept no compromise. Do not share the shame of hypocrisy; do not barter your self-respect for any personal and temporal indulgences. "The whole truth, and nothing but the truth," must be our motto. Only whole-souled devotion can make a cause victorious. Creeds hav never been supplanted by indifference or half-hearted aversion, but only by stronger creeds. Our claims should be positiv as well as negativ. We hav to charge our opponents with sins of omission as well as of commission. The attention which they hav bestowed upon mythological squabbles has been withdrawn from physical problems of the highest importance.

Mental liberty itself has a positiv mission. Freedom of inquiry means the right to obey the impulses of our intellectual conscience—the right to investigate suspicious claims; but also the right to rescue from oblivion many a forgotten or suppressed truth, familiar to the wisdom of the ancients. It means the right of revising the canons of justice, and the code of the health-police—it means the right of proclaiming a gospel of Nature.

Let us deserve that right. Let us honor our cause by valor, by vigilance, and progressiv activity. Do not let us rest while our task is but half done.

It will be done when candor and love of knowledge hav been recognized as the first manly graces, and hypocrisy and spiritual sloth as the most contemptible vices; when mental prostitution is no longer commended as a praiseworthy act of Christian humility; when the acquisition of knowledge, strength, physical purity, and the conformity of our habits to the laws of Nature, hav been acknowledged as primary duties; when we hav fully established the fact that health, wealth, wisdom, and all earthly blessings are given as a reward of industry and rational habits, and never in answer to prayer or mysterious ceremonies; that we hav been sent to this earth to ennoble it, and not to despise it; that our reason was given us to be used, and not to be sacrificed on the altar of a dogma.

When the opponents of free inquiry hav become as odious as the conspirers against our free political institutions; when all men hav rediscovered the truth that only a healthy body can be the abode of a healthy mind; that the highest physical and moral well-being can only be conjointly attained; that the destiny of man must be worked out on this side of the grave; when life is valued for its own sake; when we hav regained our terrestrial paradise—then, and not till then, the Mission of Freethought will be fulfilled.

FELIX L. OSWALD.

Those Terrible Anarchists and Their Schools.

Chicago Correspondence of the New York World.

"The Anarchist scare is an intermittent fever in Chicago," said a citizen the other day. "Its outbreaks are recurrent about every four months. Just now, among part of the population, it is semi-epidemic. In two weeks it will subside to the sporadic stage. In two more weeks it will be utterly forgotten. In four months, when the city election will be well on, the disease will return, no doubt with the most malignant symptoms."

A city that has had Chicago's exciting experience with Anarchism may readily be pardoned some nervousness about such things. Still, the rest of the country should not for that reason get the impression that Chicago rests on a mine of lawlessness, with thousands of red-handed Radicals running around with torches to blow it up. Careful investigation shows that there is nothing going on at present among the Red brethren that need disturb anybody. Sensational stories about the "revival of Anarchism," and the renewal of dangerous agitation and the plotting of dreadful plots, hav been sent from here all over the country. With few exceptions, they are either wholly imaginativ or greatly exaggerated.

"Anarchist Sunday-schools" hav been the subject of many of these stories. According to the worthy but preternaturally excitable people who are going to hav an Anarchist uprising here whether or no, these institutions are a frightful source of danger. The common account runs that they hav recently been organized to teach little children hatred of government, the doctrins of Most, the use of explosivs, the possibilities of assassination, and like delectable matters; that the teachers hold up Spies and Parsons as blessed martyrs, and urge the children to emulate their example; that, above all, their chief object is to keep alive a passionate recollection of the executions of November 11th, and the idea of some day revenging them in a sea of blood. From this the somber conclusion is drawn that the Chicago Anarchist is a very much more dangerous fellow than most persons had supposed, and that some day he will be heard of in another sanguinary outbreak.

All this is amusing to those who know the facts and don't care, and exasperating to those who know the facts and hav some regard for the reputation of Chicago.

The easily ascertained truth about the matter is this:

These schools are not of recent origin. They hav existed for years and years. They are not Anarchist schools. They hav nothing to do with Anarchism. They are not perpetuating the cause of Spies and Parsons. They are not teaching the doctrins of Most. So far as any person of ordinary powers can see and hear their teachings are just about as dangerous as the teachings of Colonel Ingersoll and not a whit worse.

A very large number of the German-born residents of Chicago are disbelievers in Christianity and the Bible. Many of them hav a violent hatred for all religion. They would regard it as a great personal misfortune if one of their children should become a Christian. It is hard for those who hav not moved among these people to understand it, but the fact is, they regard a church about as an old Scotch Covenanter used to regard a surplice. Christian parents feel no keener grief over a scoffing son than these people feel over a child that joins the church. In order to keep their children away from the church Sunday-schools, they years and years ago established Sunday-schools of their own.

In these schools teachers giv lessons and demonstrations in all branches of science and inculcate a Materialistic philosophy. Skepticism about the existence of a personal God and the truth of the Bible is freely expressed. Lately the missionaries of the Catholic and Lutheran churches hav been very activ trying to get the pupils of these schools into the Sunday-schools of the churches. This has rubbed the skeptical parents on their sorest spot. To counteract the efforts of the missionaries they hav undertaken to extend their own school system. Two or three new schools hav been opened. At a meeting Sunday arrangements were made for several more.

Not one in one thousand of the supporters of these schools is an Anarchist. Not a great many are pronounced Socialists. Very likely in some of the schools the Socialistic theory has been explained. It is just possible, though there is no trustworthy testimony to that effect, that some teacher may hav referred to Spies and Parsons as martyrs to the cause of labor. If so, it is safe to say the children heard nothing they had not heard at home a thousand times. It must be borne in mind that thousands of workingmen in Chicago who hav no kind of sympathy with either Anarchism or Socialism still believe that the executed men were champions of the labor cause who were sacrificed by the capitalists. They and their children will probably believe so as long as they liv, schools or no schools.

There is nothing secret about the schools. They stand open to the public every Sunday. Detectivs, reporters, alarmists, and disinterested observers hav visited them. You might pass all they hav heard through a sieve and not catch revolutionary ideas enough to startle the most timorous person in the world.

Here is the testimony of one of the best informed detectivs in Chicago, one who has made a special study of the Anarchist movement from an impartial point of view. That is Emil Sandmyer. When a World reporter asked him to-day what he thought of the scare that had been raised about "Anarchist Sunday-schools," this is what he said:

"I am satisfied that it amounts to nothing. These schools are not 'Anarchist Sunday-schools' in any sense of the word. They are merely established by parents who are Freethinkers and opposed to the church and religious influences. They hav existed in the West for twenty-five years. You will find them in every big city where there is a large German-born population. The attempt to distort them into training-schools for Anarchists is absurd. Their object is to keep the children out of the churches and giv them scientific education. So far as I can see they are not at all dangerous or worthy of serious consideration, except so far as it may be considered dangerous for children to grow up without religious instruction. I do not consider that they hav any bearing on the Anarchist problem."

The directors, organizers, and supporters of the schools strenuously deny that they hav any kind of connection with Anarchy or Socialism. Dr. E. Kleinodt, one of the directors, makes this statement:

"We do not teach Socialism or Anarchism in our Sunday-schools, and the newspapers do us injustice when they say we do. The object of our schools is to keep the children away from the influence of the Jesuits, who teach the Bible, religious songs, and church doctrin, subjects that are very distasteful to us. Our course of instruction includes reading, writing, natural history, geography, literature, general history, and morality—so much of ethics as young minds are capable of receiving."

"And you do not teach the tenets of Anarchism?"

"By no means. We say nothing of bombs, dynamite, overthrow of kingdoms, uprooting of our present social system, or anything of that kind. I cordially invite reporters, clergymen, officials, and all others interested, to attend our sessions. We use the same books that are used in the day-schools, and what we teach is what I hav told you before—only this and nothing more."

In regard to the reports of renewed activity among the Anarchists Detectiv Sandmyer says:

"A careful distinction should be drawn between the Anarchists and Socialists. The latter are harmless. They believe that education will eventually bring all men to believe in the peaceful abolition of the government. Many of the Chicago Socialists are well educated, prosperous, and substantial citizens. They are earnestly opposed to violence. There is some activity among these men. It could hardly be expected that believing in what they consider a great reform they would keep still. They hav held several public meetings, which hav been fully reported in the papers. Nothing revolutionary has been said at these meetings, and there is not the least cause for alarm in the movement. The real Anarchists are not displaying any activity. It should be remembered that there are very few Anarchists in Chicago, but a good many Socialists. The Anarchists are completely cowed, and under the thumb of the police department. Being naturally cowards, they will not run the slightest risk of the fate of Parsons and Spies. The educated Anarchist leaders in times past hav been men like Spies and Schwab, who made their living by agitating. When they found by the execution that agitation was most likely to hav a dangling rope's end for them, they got a lesson they will never forget as long as they liv.

"Without leaders the few Anarchists will never make an effort, and the leaders may be depended upon to keep very quiet. There is not now, and I don't see how there ever can be, the slightest danger of a revival of Anarchism in Chicago."

It is worth while to mention here that the alarming circular which a recent sensational dispatch from Chicago says has been circulated among the Anarchists is five years old. It was issued in 1883, and is very much of a chestnut to every person who has examined the Anarchistic problem. Two of the persons who signed the circular hav been hanged, and the others hav gone out of the agitation business. How much effect their tumid phrases can hav now may be easily guessed.

Statistics and Crime.

As our government goes to the expense of gathering statistics upon which future legislation may be based, and as the United States census is soon to be taken, we hope that some of our friends can be found with sufficient tact and influence to secure the insertion in the list of questions of something that will accurately demonstrate the disposition, or, I might say, *pre*disposition, of theological training to crime. For instance, that criminals be required to answer "what had been their religious training, if any." From those responses it would easily be shown that the institutions furnishing, proportionately to the population, the largest amount of criminals were at the same time the most adroit tax-dodgers, solely on the pretext of their moral training and its beneficent effect on the entire community. Such statistics would be invaluable.

THE SUNDAY NEWSPAPER.

All the leading papers gave reports of the brilliant lecture by our able coadjutor, P. J. O'Shea, although I regret that they did not giv his best utterances. The Herald admits that it "proved to be one of the most brilliant defenses of the Sunday newspaper ever made, the large audience which gathered in the Forum cheering him to the echo." Mr. O'Shea was formerly principal of the high school, and is both student and orator. Following is the report of the Times:

"The Sunday Newspapers" was the subject of a brilliant Forum, corner Washington boulevard and Sangamon street, lecture delivered last evening before the Secular Union at the by Lawyer P. J. O'Shea. The speaker addressed himself principally to pointing out the unstability of the ground upon which the preachers based their protests, and said:

"Happily for the continued progression of the human race, the Sunday newspaper is not an infant industry. It needs no protection—it needs no champions. The time has passed when clerical influence can injuriously affect it. The opposition of the clerical element to anything is the measure of its success. The immense sale of 'Robert Elsmere' is largely due to their condemnation alone. Certain assemblages of ministers who profess to preach the gospel of Jesus hav lately condemned the publication or circulation of newspapers on Sunday. I hav admiration for much of the teaching of the ministers and for all the morality inculcated by them. They are the children of civilization, not its parents. The days of blind faith are numbered. The gospel of Rationalism is being preached to the sons of men and is filling the world with its light. Moses did not condemn the Sunday newspapers. If the ministers were consistent, their churches and Sunday-schools would be empty and cold on the modern Sabbath day. There is no trace of a Sabbath in nature. Every animal, including man, seeks food, rest, and happiness on all days alike. And as in the physical so in the moral world, people should be good and moral on all days. The ministers hav disobeyed the suggestion of Jesus, embodied in the sentence, 'Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's and to God the things that are God's.' That is, to keep the state and church separate. From their untaxed pulpits they are now Sunday after Sunday denouncing one of the most useful institutions of the world. Their opposition to knowledge should be rebuked. It is to the unhallowed influences of the churches of the world that we can trace even in free America the existence of laws which are a tax on our very thoughts. Surely if an institution like the church escapes the just burdens of taxation because, as is alleged, it teaches men to be moral, what will be said of the Sunday newspaper?

"The American newspaper, chaste, bold, honest, able, affectionate, impatient of restraint, its myriad hands extending not, indeed, over our northern continent alone and unifying it, but including the whole planet, and even penetrating the abyss of the infinit in its efforts to satisfy the great mind of man; with its stories, its poetry, its humor, bringing gladness wherever it goes; in its divorce and criminal departments warning us by the experience of others of the dreadful consequences of crime or ill-advised marriages; in its political department showing the citizen his duty to his country, in all its pages contributes to the happiness and well-being of society, and its moral teachings hav superseded those of the pulpit. It sways the people, not, indeed, with tortures and persecutions and burnings, but through the spirit of Rationalism. It instructs the politicians and statesmen, and warns them that behind the custodians the real custodians, the people, stand, menacing, silent. I may well say of the Sunday newspaper that he who carefully reads it avoids the saloon, the gambling house, and perhaps thinks the Sunday minister largely unnecessary. The American is willing enough, it may be, to permit others to hav their hell and their heaven and their Sabbath days; he insists that these things be not obtruded upon the body politic. It is American thought, as seen in the writings of those pure transcendentalists Whitman, Emerson, Burroughs, and such magnetic speakers as Ingersoll, and countless others, that has made America take the lead in the intellectual world.

After the lecture the president presented the following, which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the Chicago Secular Union stands ready to prove that the Bible contains more vulgar, foul, filthy, and indecent utterances than ever appeared in a Sunday newspaper. That we regard the Sunday paper as the most important and essential of the seven great daily secular educators, filled as they are with more facts than fables, with science, art, amusement, with the progressiv literature of the period, and most welcome substitutes for the sapient sermons which the pulpiteers of seventeenth-century ideas still continue to inflict upon a long-suffering people.

IRISH DISLOYALTY TO AMERICA.

The leading Irish organ of Fenianism—United Ireland—which is certainly an authority, thus editorially discourses on our recent election:

Republican and Democrat were nearly balanced, but the touch that turned the scale was given by a foreign hand, and was directed by an impulse that had no regard for American interests. The policy of Mr. Balfour had more to do with deciding the election than the policy of Mr. Cleveland, and General Harrison owes his victory less to any merits of his own than to Lord Sackville's indiscreet profession of regard for his opponent. It is the Irish vote which nowadays has the final say in the making and unmaking of American governments, and the Irish vote has, on this occasion, chosen to look askance on Mr. Cleveland, because Mr. Cleveland's government has been suspected, however unjustly, of too close a friendship with Lord Salisbury's.

Irishmen, when they go to the United States, should (and would under other circumstances) think only, in American politics, of the welfare of their adopted country. But so long as they leave behind them an oppressed and misgoverned mother country, Irishmen, to their honor be it said, for it is the highest testimony to their patriotism and their civic fiber, will never do this. They bring away with them memories of wrong and a devotion which will claim their first thoughts and their best energies, and which will hold even their American-born children under its spell so long as a helpless and downtrodden Ireland exists to claim it.

Here is the explicit declaration that it is to their honor that Irishmen commit perjury when they profess allegiance to the United States above all other countries, and not merely do this themselvs, but transmit the same unpatriotic spirit to their American-born offspring. They are not Anarchists, oh, no!

At the meeting of the Chicago Secular Union December 23d, the following was adopted:

WHEREAS, Our fellow-member R. J. Midgeley, an activ worker for the Secular cause, and an efficient promoter of our Young People's Society, has departed from our midst and severed his connection with us,

Resolved, That the Chicago Secular Union hereby expresses its regrets at his departure and its best wishes for his future career, and highly commends Brother Midgeley to our Secular friends of Hamilton, Canada, as a young man of great promis, a careful student, and an earnest, intelligent Secularist.

Notes from the Field.

After resting a day at Grantfork, Ill., friend Kraft took me riding for the purpose of working up lecture engagements. We visited Highland, and immediately arranged for a lecture Sunday night, Dec. 9th. We also drove to St. Jacobs and Morine, but these two places contained no Liberals that we could interest in the work.

The next day we drove to Alhambra, and Henry Sharp, an ex-preacher but now a Spiritualist and a firm friend to the workers in the Liberal field, arranged for lectures the 17th, 18th, and 19th.

My lecture in Highland was well attended. I had an audience of about one hundred intelligent gentlemen and ladies. The lecture was held in the Turner hall. Highland has a large Turner society, which accounts for the intelligence and Liberalism of the place. I made the acquaintance of several Liberals there, but their German names I can not hold in my memory. But there is August Pagan, who has been a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER for about a year, and S. Pabst, and C. F. Kahnen, who gave me their subscriptions to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Then there are Messrs. Miller & Knœble the druggists, and Mr. Machtlin the photographer.

When in Alhambra I was entertained by Mr. and Mrs. Sharp, who are true-blue Liberals. But I must say that when there I realized something of what Christ felt when forsaken by his friends. Of all the audiences I ever had to speak to, those at Alhambra were the worst. One good Christian offered a young man $1 if he would egg me. Another good follower of the meek and lowly Jesus went down the stairs and shouted back, "You are a damned liar," which was, perhaps, quite Christian, though not gentlemanly.

At Pocahontas, the 13th, we had a good audience, but a great deal of annoyance from about twenty half-civilized young Christians. The second night we had a much better audience, but were annoyed by the same brilliant offshoots of Christian parents. The third night, I suppose in answer to some Christian's prayer, a hard rain set in, and having seven miles to drive to and from the lecture, we concluded to postpone the lecture for one week. In the mean time a friend wrote that we had better not attempt a third lecture, as there was likely to be trouble. But not being made of the kind of material that scares very easily, I met my engagement. A very fair audience again greeted me—about forty men and two ladies. The ladies did not attend the last night, because of anticipated trouble. The same young bloods were in attendance, but soon vacated the room, and I had been speaking about forty minutes when a stone, as though shot from a sling, came crashing through a window, and passed just in front of me. The audience stampeded for a few minutes, but we soon got them seated and resumed the lecture. After the lecture the men in the audience saw friend Kraft and myself into our buggy and safely on the way home.

The Liberal friends at Pocahontas are Henry Kleinman, Wm. Powell, Mr. Nelson, Jacob Kehr. Mr. Maxey and Mr. Ploge came from Old Ripley.

If there are any who think the Liberal lecturer has a sinecure, he had better make the attempt for a few months and realize what it really is. The activ opposition of the Christian, even shown by a mob, is not half as discouraging as the half-heartedness and cowardice of pretended Liberals.

While here I hav been entertained by Mr. and Mrs. Kraft. Mr. Kraft is a kind, generous, and enthusiastic Liberal. If the "itinerant men" could meet friends wherever they go half as earnest as Mr. Kraft, the work would be much easier and more encouraging.

I cannot close this letter without saying something about the Rev. Mr. Wm. Feutterer, the Catholic priest of this village. He very kindly invited Mr. Kraft and myself to call on him. We did so, and spent some hours in pleasant conversation on religious matters. He returned our call and spent half a day with us, and of course the conversation again turned to religious subjects. He knew positivly that there was a God, and seemed very desirous of convincing me of that fact. I told him I was in the dark about that matter, and the facts were what I was after. He commenced his argument by introducing the watch theory. After scratching my head awhile, I remembered having heard that old chestnut before. He was logician enough to appreciate the difficulties I threw in his way, and finally admitted that we did not know. I think very much of Mr. Feutterer. He did that which few men of his cloth will ever do. He does not hav that cunning, deceitful countenance that characterizes men of his profession. He looks more like a studious, well-informed pedagog. He was honest enough to admit that the Catholic church was endeavoring to destroy our public schools, and from the immense number of parochial schools springing up in our country, unless activ, energetic work is done, the days of our public schools are numbered. GEO. H. DAWES.

Dec. 23, 1888.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

Denver, Col., is one of the wondrous cities of the mighty West, the capital and commercial center of glorious Colorado. Denver can now send its representativs to Washington by six different palace-car lines. The first settlement was made Nov. 1, 1858; West Denver was laid out three days later, and on the 6th less than two hundred citizens held a meeting and elected a delegate to Congress, and on the 8th, mounted on a broncho, he started for Washington to try to get the Pike's Peak gold-mines set apart from Kansas as a separate territory.

The real struggle for the existence of the town commenced in 1861. The mines were declared "played out;" the war divided the people; the grasshoppers hopped onto everything green, leaving famin and dreary desolation in their track; fire consumed nearly half the buildings; then came a terrible flood and swept away the best half of what the flames had spared. In 1864 the Indian war cut off all supplies from the East and all mail communication. The Indians murdered immigrants, and burnt the ranches over the entire route between Denver and the Missouri river, some six hundred miles. Every man was under arms, and the hurried erection of blockhouses in the exposed parts of the city was the only industry. Then, as a final "crusher," came the announcement, "The Union Pacific railroad is building up Pole Creek." Many abandoned the town in despair; quarter sections of good farm land on the outskirts of the town were offered in exchange for an old lumber wagon and pair of oxen with which to flee away, while corner lots were eagerly swapped for a rifle or a few bronchos. But those who had their all invested, and found it impossible to get away, rallied and resolved to do or die. Finding the Union Pacific would not come to them, they resolved to go to it. They raised subscriptions, bonded the county; and to their indomitable grit, enterprise, and push we are indebted for the great city of Denver of to-day, with its immense smelting works, extensiv foundries and manufactories, magnificent public buildings and schools, unsurpassed—I think, unequaled—in any Eastern city of ten times its age.

Denver is the county seat of Arapahoe county, fourteen miles in a direct line from the base of the Rocky mountains, at the junction of the South Platte river and Cherry creek. Its elevation is 5,224 feet above sea level, with a population of over eighty-five thousand. The alpine view from Denver of the great Rocky mountain chain, extending north and south for two hundred miles, with Long's Peak to the north, Pike's Peak to the south, and the colossal Gray's Peak in the center, is most exquisit.

The city is built mainly of stone and brick. Buildings are superb in style, substantial, and provided with all the modern improvements. The streets are broad, the sidewalks paved with large flagstones, and there is an abundance of shade-trees. Independent of a very extensiv and perfect system of street-cars, a cable motor company has just completed its extensiv routes at an outlay of several millions of dollars. North, south, east, and west the city is reaching out, and property is doubling in value each year. There are hundreds of fine private residences in and around Denver that hav been built within the last ten years by men of wealth as homes, that cost from $15,000 to $75,000, furnished with every conceivable luxury—miners, cattle and sheep barons, men of brawn and brain, who hav made success on the mountains and the plains, and hav now settled down to enjoy their well-earned fortunes in this beautiful, health-giving, prosperous city.

Denver needs no boom. It is the port of entry where the greater portion of foreign goods that are sold in Colorado arrive direct in bond. It is the base of supplies for rich mines, and an unsurpassed farming and grazing country for a radius of five hundred miles, and for five hundred miles has no possible rival.

There is a large, powerful Liberal element. Many of the leading business men and capitalists are Infidels. Heretofore the responsibility and burden has rested on a few willing burden-bearers, not the best able to meet expenses. Brother John G. Jenkins has been long the leading self-sacrificing worker, and is worthy of the honor, esteem, and high regard in which he is held by all classes. And that energetic and successful business man, and stanch, outspoken Liberal, E. I. Weber, proposes to secure the coöperation of leading business and professional men of the city who will subscribe $100 each, and, thus having formed a fund, secure the service of able lecturers, and establish a practical organization of the Liberals of Denver.

Heretofore the Opera House had been rented for the Liberal lectures, but the rent was raised from $75 to $100 per night; so the friends engaged the Odd Fellows' Hall for my lecture, and, despite some unfavorable circumstances, I had a very fair-sized audience of highly intellectual people.

Greeley, Col., is fifty-two miles from Denver, with a population of 2,500. It is the county seat of Weld county, and was laid out in May, 1870, by the Greeley colony, under the fostering care of poor Horace Greeley. The colony controls about 100,000 acres of the very finest land in the whole state, well irrigated by extensiv canals, bringing water from Cache-a-la-Poudre river. No intoxicating drink is allowed to be sold. The penalty of so doing is forfeiture to the city of the lot upon which it is sold. The city is laid out over a very large territory; the dwellings generally are a goodly distance apart. Unless Greeley can secure extensiv manufactures, she has reached the limit of prosperity. Wiser to sell than to buy property in Greeley. The lectures were delivered in the Unitarian church, Liberals having contributed largely toward its erection. The Rev. Mr. Savage, the pastor, is a young man of more than average ability, but is dwarfed by the necessity of ever carefully trimming his ideas so as not to arouse ire and opposition of the orthodox element in his church. Many of his members are quite as narrow-minded, bigoted, and fanatical as Free Methodists and Salvation Army tramps; and, with a few noble exceptions, they all lack the courage of their convictions, living in terror of Mrs. Grundy.

Here I had a happy home with that undaunted, honest old hero Capt. A. J. Wadlia. A kinder, truer, more generous-hearted man cannot be found in all Colorado. A Liberal from conviction, he delights to liv up to his ennobling belief. Those desiring to arrange for lectures at Greeley will do well to confine their correspondence on the subject to Capt. A. J. Wadlia, as the deserved high respect in which he and his family are held makes him a power for good in overcoming disastrous effects that the indiscretions of some in the past hav produced. Among the most earnest, self-sacrificing Liberals is the ever reliable old veteran James Henry.

I am in receipt of a letter from that dear old Infidel blacksmith Wm. Thorpe, of Ballston Spa, N. Y., calling my attention to the appeal of his darling little daughters in the Children's Corner of THE TRUTH SEEKER to raise, by dime subscriptions, money enough to purchase a cow for old Mr. and Mrs. Casey. The poor old man met with an accident so severely injuring his wrist that he has permanently lost the use of his right hand.

While laid up, disabled, he borrowed a small sum of money of a good Christian neighbor, who, for security, took a chattel mortgage on their cow, and then suddenly seized it, thus obtaining an excellent cow—the main dependence of the old couple—for about one-fifth of its value. "Good enough treatment for old Infidels." Many readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, like myself, failed to make immediate response to the appeal, and there is danger of the poor old couple suffering, and the dear little Thorpe girls becoming disheartened at the lack of readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to respond to the call of distress, or liv up to the principles of Liberalism.

Dear reader, let us make glad the hearts of the worthy old couple, and cause rejoicing to the darling little Thorpe girls, by at once—by next mail—sending postal note addressed, Miss Sadie Thorpe, Ballston Spa, N. Y. C. B. REYNOLDS

Destruction of Dogmas.

It is assumed by some Liberals that the work of destroying church creeds and superstitious notions, in which the Boston Investigator has been engaged for more than half a century, and THE TRUTH SEEKER its young, vigorous, David-like ally, a wonderful child which talked as soon as it was born, and Freethought, grandchild of the Boston Infidel, hav been effectivly engaged since, should cease.

Sometimes it is pathetically pictured that the Christian church is on its bended knees imploring the iconoclastic Infidels to "hav mercy on us!"

I am glad of it—if it is so.

If the church has given up its foul plotting to overthrow American liberty by a union of church and state, then the advice for us to make masons, carpenters, architects of ourselvs should be respectfully considered.

I hav been asleep for twenty years and awake to find all the Demands of Liberalism granted! No more chaplains in Congress or legislatures! That grand old patriot, John Gage, can split kindling-wood Sunday mornings without liability of a prosecution on Monday by a God-loving, Infidel-hating, Sunday-service deacon. The churches pay taxes like honest business men! The Bible-reading school exercise is abolished! Swearing and praying hav walked out of the nation arm in arm without reeling. Sectarianism is dead and cremated. The human race is a vast brotherhood helping one another to find truth, and no church too sacred in which to look for it.

Finally, brethren, the Freethinkers and Christians find themselvs as near together as the Democratic and Republican parties on the tariff—both are for reduction and neither for free trade—and their voices blend in harmonious notes—the Freethinkers' a little husky from many years of non-use. By our destructiv blows we hav Liberalized the churches, and they hav balanced the account by teaching us to "construct" something! Just what it is passeth human understanding. But we want to be grateful just the same, and when we learn what we are to be grateful for we will make our gratitude specific and join the Japs in building a monument to Grant. Poor Grant is nearly out of monuments! But this is one of the ways to keep our hand in as "builders."

Angels are now whispering to the patient in his sleep—see him smile!

Will the Liberal destroying angels—there is veteran Seaver, the two Macdonalds and the one Putnam and several others hovering near—will they not please meet in Boston to hold a conference (it is a noted conference center), and lay down their arms of destruction and proclaim the golden era of universal peace?

Alack! it would be a pity if this is "but a dream! my child," and that the orthodox, like the fox in the poultry-pen, should fear the rabid destructionists had "perhaps not heard the news!"

The Heptameron Still Sold.

J. A. Wilson, of Camden, N. J., to the New York World.

For Anthony Comstock's edification you will state that "The Decameron" of Boccaccio has come up in the English courts as to the fitness of its sale and publication. The publishers of this work set up as a defense the fact that the book had been recognized as a work of high literary merit for the last five hundred years; that during that time it had never been out of print, and that the British Museum possessed two hundred copies of it. The magistrate, recognizing the proof of these claims, dismissed the case. Comstock, with the power of the United States behind him, forced a heavy cash compromise out of a New Jersey dealer two years ago—after convicting and sending to prison myself for two years for mailing another precisely similar classic, copies of which are in your Astor and Lenox libraries, and were then in—among other private libraries—that of the late Henry Ward Beecher, himself a member of the society that prosecuted me. What was my surprise upon my release to find the books in question in no less than five Philadelphia bookstores, openly shown in the windows of three of them; and two large Broadway dealers hav them on their latest catalogs, though Saint Anthony denied my assertion before Judge Nixon at the time. I am not a detectiv, but if Anthony Comstock wants to know the names of the parties I will name them to him. J. A. WILSON.

About That Postscript.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: That "Postscript" on "Slate-writing" requires explanation. It has appeared twice. The first article, dated November 1st, got lost, and so a second one was written, which appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER, December 16th. And now the first one turns up and gets printed. It is your fault, Mr. Editor, and it may cause your amiable correspondent, Thomas Knott, to think that "the Burr family hav a first mortgage" on your mantle as well as on that of George Chainey. The Idol's Lament.

From the World.

I'm a bloody little idol from a temple in Nepaul,
I love my bloody heathen rites, I love my victims' squall,
And I'm steeped up to my brazen lips in wickedness and sin.
I'm an Afreet, I'm a fetich, I'm a ghoul, and eke a djin.
But as long as this Museum Metropolitan remains
And I'm here for folks to stare at, with my patience for my pains,
I should like to hav it known at once, flat-footed and straight-out,
That I won't stay here on Sunday if the rabble is about.
My Sabbath days I must and will reserve for thought and rest
And devotion to the worship that I find repays me best.
So in solitary grandeur on a Sunday here I be
A-musing on the niggers that they used to bake for me!
It's hard enough two evenings in the week to hav to pose
Without daring once to blaspheme if a fly perks on my nose!
It's hard enough to hav a crowd of humble working folk
Come here on holidays and stare and push and talk and poke!
But on Sundays I won't hav it! It's the aristocracy
Who don't go out on Sundays I would hav to gaze on me!
I don't care a fig for the people who work six days out of seven
And then come here instead of staying home to think of heaven.

The gentleman who lent me to the trustees feels the same;
If the mob comes here on Sundays, why he'll just withdraw his name;
He'll no longer be a patron nor a trustee nor a donor,
And that means, of course, when people come to look I'll be a goner.
The museum without his name may flourish, I'll admit,
But deprived of me it wouldn't get along a little bit.
Afreets and djins are not to be found on every fence,
And a foreign archæologist once said I was immense.

Whence, after all, this low, unseemly cry for Sabbath shows?
How far this vulgar impudence will go nobody knows.
The people who are best informed on bigotry and virtue
Would just as leave unfrock you or unpant you as unchurch you!
The really intellectual and upper classes go
To church on Sundays; they don't want to see a heathen show.
And if the common people will insist on coming in,
Why, they'll hav to get along as best they can without their djin.
JOHN PAUL BOCOCK.

"God Bless Bob Ingersoll."

"Every night before I sleep I say, 'God bless Bob Ingersoll,'" said a young lady to a Sun reporter recently. "Why? Well, I'll tell you.

"Everything has been going wrong with me lately. I've been what you would probably call 'playing in hard luck.' I've lost all my money, my income has been stopped, and I've been for the first time in my life thrown on my own resources entirely. I tried everywhere to get employment. I am willing to do anything, but everywhere I've been confronted with the question: 'What experience hav you had in this line?' Not having had any, it has been simply impossible for me to get a start even—and it sounds funny to me when I say it—even at tying up bundles. No one knows, no one can realize until she is thrown into the world unexpectedly, how hard, oh, how hard it is for a woman to get employment in this great, big, dear old New York.

"Failing at every turn and getting poorer and poorer, I went to a clergyman whom everybody knows, and whom I had known in prosperity personally. Going around among the stores was bad enough, but this was worse. Still, I had known him, and I was now cordially received until I had made known the object of my call, and then I was informed very sweetly that 'we hav so many members of our own congregation to assist, you know, that really I—well—I'll talk it over with the ladies of our society, and will see if we can't recommend you to some place,' etc. And this was about the result with them all.

"By this time I was in actual need, when the thought occurred to me to go to the opposit extreme and see Robert Ingersoll, a total stranger to me. I knew he couldn't kill me, and was sure I would be at least politely treated. I was shown into his private office with my heart beating furiously, my brain in a whirl, and without an idea of what I should say first. We shook hands, and showing me to a chair opposit to him, he said: 'Sit down, please, and let's see what the trouble is,' with such a kindly, cordial smile that I was at once at ease, and told him plainly just what a predicament I was in. He watched me closely and questioned me shrewdly, and then kept people waiting while he gave me a lot of his precious time and just such friendly, fatherly advice as I hav been yearning for. I could hav just hugged him, while my eyes were full of tears. I felt already rich with his earnest, sympathetic words, but before I left he voluntarily helped me substantially. Then he came way out to the door with me, and, after asking me to let him know how I got along, his last words were, as he shook my hand: 'Good-bye; success to you—and, yes, I'll say God bless you.'

"I think I've got a little start now, and that's why I say every night before I sleep, and a thousand times a day, 'God bless "Bob" Ingersoll.'"

THE Christmas number of Puck is gilt-edged, ruby-tinted, and decolleté. The aged will perk up, the young will chirrup, and the midway-between will hav their cardiacal region dangerously stirred by its gorgeous pictures, concinnous stories and poems, and resplendent style. Its art is almost good enough for Anthony Comstock to prosecute. 25 cents of any newsdealer.

Boyhood Reminiscences.

Standing one day on the lower part of the Castle Hill, leading to the front gate of the immense fortification, Edinburgh castle—a favored place of resort for young loafers—my attention became divided between two quite conspicuous specimens of God's handicraft in man-making; specimens one of whom, when regarded with reference to the fitness of his surroundings, was strangely incongruous, indeed, altogether incompatible with divine wisdom; so much so, indeed, as to be shocking even to the callous reflectiv faculties of a youth of fourteen—my age at the time; he was the specimen nearest to me; a full-grown human, but, unfortunately, one of "God's poor," as idiots in the olden time were called. Daft Willie was indeed an idiot. Amorphous as a carelessly stuffed bag of hay, he would stand for hours on the same spot, as if incapable of locomotion, and with his right hand inverted, his fingers in his mouth, he would recognize his tormentors by a prolonged inarticulate sound, about as significant as the howl of a houseless dog. His place was invariably the same.

It is possible, I thought, that deep in the idiot's being there might be a loophole through which his fettered soul looked out, enabling him to see attractions in the locality he never failed to select as his standing-ground; a spot giving him a panoramic view of surpassing grandeur; the Frith of Forth with its blue horizon belt, embracing its naval line-of-battle ships in the Roads, and its passing argosies of commerce outward and inward bound; its stretches of New Town buildings, palatial and grand, seen in avenues, in squares, in terraces, and parks; its spurs of the Pentlands; its overlooking points of Salsbury crags; its Arthur's Seat; its monumental Calton Hill; its castellated masses of rocky embrasures, with heavy ordnance peering threateningly out; its massiv gates and yawning drawbridge. Be that as it may, on the same spot of ground the poor idiot stood on "bonny days," the butt of the young and thoughtless, his only protection being the occasional passing of the policeman on his beat. There he stood, no butt of ridicule for me, but rather an object of pity, while I vainly wondered at the causes of his great failure as a man.

The other specimen referred to was a comely youth of about my own age, dressed in the costume worn by the fox-hunter, a velvet cap, green cutaway velvet coat with gold-plated buttons, riding gloves, breeches, and top-boots, garnished with spurs. He was mounted on a cream-colored Spanish genet, saddled and bridled as if got up for a festal day. He had just emerged from the castle, accompanied by a score or so of young officers of the garrison, who all seemed to vie with each other who should do him most honor. A more hilarious party, bridled by decorum, it would be difficult to imagin; brimful of delight they bustled around the young horseman, while they bubbled over with checked merriment when he essayed a touch of humor.

At length the boy horseman moved off, the officers uncovering their heads as, cap in hand, he bade them au revoir. Behind the youth rode a strong, handsome young fellow dressed in the rich livery of the ducal house of Buccleugh.

The pace of the horsemen was slow as they threaded their way down the inclined plane leading to the south, slow for the reason they had to conform to the movement of the crowd, who were, if anything, more deferential to the young rider than even were the officers he had just parted with. It was a sight worth a day's march to hav seen the dainty Spanish pony treading the smooth macadamized road, its sweeping mane and tail flashing in the sunlight like so much floss silk. Hats and bonnets slid from their places as the youth pushed on through the demonstrativ crowd. I kept my bonnet on, while my brain below it throbbed in perplexity as I compared the specimens, wondering to which of the two categories I belonged; I partaking so slightly of either party, yet quite distinctly a something claiming relationship with both, but as far separated from the one as from the other.

In the presence of so monstrous a failure as "Daft Willie," the human mind, unaided by science, looks on appalled, antagonized, confronting an enigma rising before it a mere blank wall, against which the intellect butts itself in vain; a condition of stultification rejecting all appliances of religious explanation as priestly impertinences; mere anodynes of sentiment; balms of Gilead exhaled; their savor whistled down the passing years. To say that it pleased God to fashion Daft Willies, is to suggest a god subject to aberrations, himself at times daft. To urge the curse pronounced against the race by Adam's fall as giving occasion for such conditions, curls the lip with contempt, dismissing it at once as unworthy of regard. And yet, in my youth, that was the popular explanation given of all such phenomena. The pulpit could giv no other interpretation of such departures from the established standard; and, beyond the pulpit, there was no wide-spread reliable guidance.

Not so with the present. Science stepped in and at once placed such lapses above all litigation, attributing to physiological violation what was ascribed to God-visitation or the presence of "evil spirits." True, the explanation brings with it the condemnation of the pretentious assumption of Christ and his apostles, thus exploding the system on which the Christian faith rests, quite as completely as any other fraud has been, and will continue to be, exploded by the truth which is in nature; not, of course, explaining phenomena in all their details—mystery asserting itself at all times in all operations in the laboratory of nature—but at least to the degree of justifying the inquirer in pushing superstition aside, placing the mind in harmony with truth. All interpretations of nature are necessarily partial. Who can explain the mystery of the growth of the seed which brings the harvest? Yet the most illiterate rustic calculates on reaping the full ears of grain at the proper season.

"Bow thy head, proud Sicambrian," said the bishop to King Clovis, the first convert to Christianity in ancient France. And through all the centuries the same blind exaction of the altar has continued to be made alike to prince and peasant.

Religion has nothing to do with causes beyond sin; no system to avert penalties but the parrot phrase, "Come to Jesus." The yellow fever is sent to punish man for moral transgression. The anger of God is seen in the ravages of the fire-stricken city to reiterate the announcement, "I the Lord am a consuming fire." The cholera comes to justify the text, "Visiting the iniquities of the fathers upon the children to the third and fourth generations of them that hate me;" the blighted product of the field and orchard to enforce the text, "He treadeth the wine-press in his wrath." Bow thy head to the mandate of the altar! And thus the government of the church became "a terror unto evil-doers and a praise unto them which doeth good"—evil-doers as the church regards evil and good as it regards good. "Dies iræ" has been the sing-song doom of mankind, grunted in organ groanings, piped in female screechings, and yelped in pulpit ravings from year to year. And yet the primal yeast keeps rising, enabling the busy baker Evolution to shovel out his loaves of fruition alike to Christian and to pagan. The altar of the only living and true god is the big world; its high priest is Science, and before him only "every knee shall bow and every tongue confess"—Science, at once the teacher, the healer, the redeemer, and conqueror; uniting the nations in the fraternal fellowship of unbroken interests; the solidarity that knows no party, no nation, no creeds, no religion—Science, a thousand harbingers of whose approach already hav marshaled him the way that he is going.

A leaning in the direction of religious dispute had been gradually preparing the minds of the Sawnies for at least the past half century.

A brilliant galaxy of lights had burnt in the sky of civilization. In France Voltaire had passed like a comet with a splendid train, illumining as it swept by. In America the sharp glare of Paine had been seen with a train of coruscations lighting up the skies of progress from horizon to dome.

The irreverences of Burns had loosened out the early teachings of the youth of the workshop and of the field; particularly had his "Holy Willie's Prayer" made havoc with the popular faith; a poem without a parallel in any language; its lines burning and scalding the thoughtful reader into compliance of contempt for the subject of the lines from first to last, so true to nature is the presentation of the character and the faith of the Holy Willies of Presbyterianism. The sharpest virulences of rancor run scorchingly through the closing stanzas, showing how deeply the cruel lessons of the Bible had sunk into the poet's young soul; lessons which, but for the original sweetness of his nature, would hav given another name to the roll of the Presbyterian pulpit. All the malignities of the Hebrew God shoot through the lines, keeping the text at all times in mind: "For they shall know that I am the Lord." The stanza preceding the last fairly welters in molten wrath. I quote:

> Lord, in the day o' vengeance try him;
> Lord, veesit them wha did employ him;
> And in thy mercy pass not by him,
> Nor hear their prayer;
> But for thy people's sake destroy him
> And dinna spare.

Many great names besides had flashed above the mental horizon to assist in heralding the advent of the great and only true redeemer of mankind—Science. Lord Monboddo had held the public attention. Shelley, too, had seared himself into public favor by the searching splendor of his genius. Lord Byron was then passing on strong wing, cleaving his way to immortality. Taylor and Priestly had lived. Besides all these, bringing like effects, Modern Athens, the great metropolis of Sawniedom, had had its local agitators; all tending to disrupt the established humdrum, though not in open rupture with religion. Henry Irvine was jabbering in the unknown tongues of the "Pentecostal season," giving a holiday activity to the "auld Wast Kirk at the fit o' the Lothian road." Dr. Thomson was hammering Dr. Gray in the arena of debate, in St. George's kirk, on the subject of the Apocrypha; filling the great edifice to overflowing with delighted listeners from counting-room and workshop; the debate giving no signs of abatement in either disputant or hearers. The great city rang all over with the echoes of the sacred clang of the combatants; the followers of the leaders repeating the arguments in private contest. Over pots of "remin' swats" and whisky toddies controversy grew warm; the disputation waxing hotter as the drinkers drank. The weaver wove them into his web, giving his shuttle an extra yank as he remembered successful points; the shoemaker pounded them into the soles of his boots, the tailor worked them into button-holes. The artist caricatured the principal disputants, representing Dr. Thompson as a snarling bulldog, his rival as a greyhound, each effort of the pencil delighting the passer-by. And so the battle raged, till at length death came to the rescue, silencing the eloquent pastor of St. George's church with apoplexy, striking him down at the door of the "sanctuary."

And so, below the cuticle of society, an itching of controversy broke out, irrepressible, on Sawnie's favorit topic, religion.

About the period I refer to Combe had thrown among the hornets of the pulpit a brand of disturbance, rousing the entire sacerdotal swarms of both city and town, and, buzzing around them, rose clouds of followers. The brand I speak of was a course of lectures on moral philosophy. A series of dynamite bombs exploding in the market-place could not hav brought more disturbance to the public pulse. Scotland fairly flamed all over with disputation, heard alike in humble boothie and in ducal palace, the theme, "Phrenology vs. Theology." Then followed a carnival of the Scottish intellect, where Sawney pelted Sawny, not with bonbons of confections, but with texts of scripture and with bumps of craniology. Without the theological feature there would hav been no such mental gamboling, such spirit banqueting, the themes of the pulpit being the nuts and wine, par excellence, of the Scottish disputant.

Then came another "rippit" of enthusiasm to the metropolis, viz., the reception of "Mons Meg," the great cannon of Scotia. In compliment to the national vanity, the ancient mass of ordnance had been conceded to Scottish keeping—a mass of old iron hooped into semblance of a cannon, but as unfit for use as a weapon of war as a mammoth main tube would be, shotted and aimed against an enemy. War, however, is the handmaid of religion, and therefore dear to the Scottish heart. "Our God is a man of war;" a splendid day was the consequence. The morning gun rung out its summons, awaiting echoes and sleepers; and, as if in answer to a proud defiance, the naval squadron in the Roads poured out its broadsides in response, while answering rounds from mole and artillery barracks called to "Jock's Lodge" to "boot and saddle," to join the grand procession now forming. And at once, obedient to the summons, chargers could be seen wheeling into place to the sound of kettledrums, cymbals, and trumpet calls.

The metropolis was in holiday costume. Ranks had merged for the nonce in a common interest, all but the "beastly poor" mingling in festal gaiety. From all accessible projections of the towering castle flags fluttered, while high above all, in loving juxta, the red lion banner of the Stuarts mingled with the union jack of England. The monuments were draped with bunting. Church steeples blossomed with flags, while bells rang out, some sweet and silvery, ravishing the ear with melody; others clamorous and arrogant, as if they only should be heard, while the deep voice of the massiv Tron made bass for all. The sun looked down with favoring eye, quite unaccompanied by cloud or mist. Martial notes kept breaking on the ear, as glittering files of cavalry and infantry, artillery and city bands, marched by. All the carriages of the city, public and private, were in motion, filled with gay inmates, women and children alike represented. Rich liveries, gleaming with buttons and silver lace, clothed coachman and flunkey, the horses champing silver-mounted bits as they decorously passed each other in the crowded streets. Nothing to mar the harmony of the scene save where knots of "parritch"-fed dwellers of tenements looked out of alleys, closes, and wynds, their sad, wan faces scowling at the pageant as it passed. What was Mons Meg to them? Let them hav it and they would quickly hav sold it to the dealer in old iron, to purchase oatmeal and "penny swipes" to satisfy their hungry "bairns." "God help them!"

The esplanade leading to the principal entrance of the castle was thronged with the grand equipages of the nobility and wealthy nabobs of the city, including the lord mayor—once a mechanic—his velvet robe of office and civic chain of gold significantly outlustering the crowd.

So dense was the mass of carriages that wheel touched wheel, as, ranged in rows, they stood, leaving a channel in the middle wide enough for easy access to the authorized procession accompanying the old iron. The arrangement was complete, not a disturbing movement occurring to mar the harmony of the occasion.

All went merry as a marriage bell.

The occupants of the carriages were all on tiptoe, straining their vision in the direction of Leith Walk, where the mass of old iron, mounted on wheels, was seen slowly advancing, drawn by twenty massiv gray horses, two abreast, gorgeously caparisoned, and mounted by as many handsome boys tricked out in flesh-colored tights, and with silken wings, a la Raphael's cherubim; their fat, round, dimpled hands guiding the teams with silken-tasseled cords. And thus, to the blare of bugle, trumpet, and cornet, and flageolet, and clash of cymbal and tintinnabulation of orchestral bells, the procession toiled in the hot summer sun.

I sat with my father on the "dicky"—the driver's seat of a grandee's family coach—a concession graciously granted in consideration of the event. On our left stood the massiv traveling chariot of his grace of Dalkeith, in the front of which I recognized the young rider referred to in the opening of my sketch, now a mustachioed, dashing youth of twenty. His appearance at once coupled the driveling idiot with him in my mind; and under the inspiration of the sad remembrance, I whispered to my father my first introduction to the youth.

"He might well hav been so mounted and so entertained by the officers and the crowd you speak of," said my father. "He is the eldest son of the great duke of Buccleugh, and heir to the title of one of Scotland's oldest nobility, along with whole miles of the best lands in the Lothians, besides rich coal mines and farms yielding a fabulous revenue."

To which I replied: "And how comes it, father, that you, a larger, stronger, and, no doubt, as deserving a man as the duke, hav not a single rood of earth to call your own?"

A sharp, devouring glance, a glare at the audacity of my question, and he shot out the words, "Boy, you hav been reading 'Tom Paine.'"

"Never heard the name before," I responded.

He was silent for a minute; then, while a deep Sunday gloom shadowed his face, he uttered a sentiment which, until lately, guided and directed the whole current of my life; shaping and giving character to thought and leading to action at variance with my surroundings; in fine, placing me in the attitude of a pigmy Ajax defying the lightning. Casting a glance at the youth beyond me, I saw in him one of heaven's favorits, while I sat a poor, despairing lad, doomed to lead a life productivless of usefulness as was the idiot's. This was the sentiment: "My son, if it pleases God to giv to one man more than to another, it is no business of mine. It is for me only to know that when the duke comes to die, he will be asked to giv an account of his stewardship while in life. And if it be found that he has acted the part of the unjust steward he will be sent to hell."

"And where will be the compensation to the landless man in such a decision, father?"

A feu de joie from the garrison here broke up our discussion.

The cortege passed on. Battery replied to battery, welcoming the old iron to its place on the platform so carefully prepared for it. Mons Meg stands there still, awaiting the summons of the future to take new forms in the matrices of the moulder.

It's comin' yet for a' that,
When man to man, the world o'er,
Shall brithers be for a' that.

Le Roy, N. Y. 74.

McArthur to Mrs. Slenker.

Without candor, discussion, in the highest sense, is impossible. All hav the same interest, whether they know it or not, in the establishment of facts. All hav the same to gain, the same to lose. He loads the dice against himself who scores a point against the right. Absolute honesty is to the intellectual perception what light is to the eyes. Prejudice and passion cloud the mind. In each disputant should be blended the advocate and judge.—Ingersoll.

Do not let us quarrel over trifles, "words, mere words." I remarked that you were a violent opponent of the Spiritual philosophy, because I hav noticed for several years past that, whenever anything could possibly be construed to its disadvantage, you immediately appeared in print and always sided against it. And I fail to remember a solitary instance in which you had even a kind word to say in its behalf. It may be because you deem it "false, untrue, and mischievous," but you hav never proved any of these charges, and I am now giving you an opportunity of so doing.

I do not claim that you admitted the phenomena to be either Spiritual or miraculous; for to hav admitted the first would hav proved you a Spiritualist, or the other would hav landed you in the Christian church.

How many times are you to be assured that we Spiritualists do not believe in the miraculous? Why do you bandy this term? Do you know any Spiritualist who claims that there is anything above nature? If you do, then that one is a newcomer from the church, and his proper place is where he came from. We hav nothing in common with him.

But you did admit, and in this last article you do admit, the reality of the phenomena, for you say, "I am requested to relate the portion of the phenomena I believe was real," and then you go on to relate your experiences.

So, before I examin your testimony, I propose to set myself aright on a quotation you make from my last letter.

In speaking of a credulous man, Christian or Materialist, I remarked: "The former foolishly believes there is nothing impossible to his God, and the latter that there is nothing outside or beyond his exceedingly small brain capacity." And I still think this to be correct.

It was not intended as a slur on anyone in particular, and was and is just as applicable to credulous Spiritualists, of whom, unfortunately, there are too many. I am not so deeply enamored of my own mentality as to feel to slur that of another. But I like level-headed people; I despise fools.

Since we hav started this correspondence, no doubt you hav noticed several communications from various parties concerning it, and I propose this to be the last time that I will pay particular attention to any of them till we are through.

I made another remark, simple and true, "There is as wide a divergence between theoretical and practical mathematics as it is possible to conceive," and in connection with it instanced a race between two athletes. Mr. Priestly jumps in with an algebraic solution, claiming that I may be au fait with ghosts, but know nothing of mathematics. He also insists that "it is impossible there should be two athletes and one of them run ten times as fast as the other."

It is very possible that the gentleman has been somewhat "too previous" with his remarks, and the very solution he offers may prove my case. For he givs a practical solution, and credits it to the theoretical.

As Mr. C. L. James, another correspondent, says, the question is an old one; but with all respect to him, it is not an attempt "to refute mathematics." It was simply to show the opposit sides that I quoted it. But, as Mr. James has given a difficult solution, if the question be of sufficient interest, let him and Mr. Priestly decide first which of them is right.

Figures hav at all times been a source of trouble, and some of our greatest minds hav stumbled while dealing with them.

The "divine Plato" proved (to his own satisfaction) that one and one made two owing to their "participation in duality." St. Augustine proved the existence of the trinity and man's likeness to it, because, "First, man is; second, he knows he is; third, he delights in the knowledge." And now Mr. Priestly adds his testimony that the race proposed must be run on the "installment plan."

Before I drop this, let me call your attention to an article by A. D. Swan, in the issue of December 8th, and entitled, "Why Deny?"

I feel to thank Mr. Swan for his effort. It is one of the best articles on the subject that has claimed my attention. If our "impossible" friends would read it carefully and then giv it their best thought, they might agree with him when he says, "Better plead Agnostic to what we do not know than deny what we cannot prove." And if Mr. Swan be not sufficiently high authority, I will add that Arago wrote: "The man who, outside of pure mathematics, pronounces the word 'impossible' is wanting in prudence."

These "impossible" gentry are too near akin to the dogmatic churchman to suit me. For ages the church governed the world with that word, for everything was possible only to their God. As the lightning flashed across the sky, the priest pointed to it as a manifestation of the wrath of his particular deity, and the people sought to allay this indignation by offering alms to his vice-regent.

But to the Infidel Franklin there was no such word as "impossible," for he dragged this lightning from the footstool of the deity and made it man's most humble servant.

Just one minute with J. K. P. Baker and then I am done. In the words of the immortal William (or Bacon):

Now, in the names of all the gods at once,
Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed
That he has grown so great?

Spiritualists, according to this gentleman, are illiterate, ridiculous, absurd, fools, knaves, and practice hoodooing. They are always "abnormal," and their "faculties are aberrant." Many other choice terms are used, showing that although one might question his attainments in any other field, yet in this particular and peculiar domain he is unquestionably "monarch of all he surveys."

"Induction," says he, "is the only key to unlock the universal storehouse of facts." Indeed, and pray who told him so? Does he know the meaning of the term "induction?" From his handling of it I should say not. Its primary meaning is simply "introduction," and, as used by Mill, whom he quotes but evidently does not understand, it means, "The act or process of reasoning from a part to a whole, or from particulars to generals."

Now, in the name of common sense, what are Spiritualists doing?

The "ghost-mongers," as he affectionately calls us, recognize no omniscient being, whether called Jehovah of the sky or J. K. P. Baker, of Irwin, Iowa, U. S. A.

But charges such as Mr. Baker so openly makes, and coming from such an unquestioned and unquestionable source, may cause serious consequences.

When THE TRUTH SEEKER reaches England, the queen, though a "ghost monger" herself, may be compelled by popular clamor to suspend the operations of the Royal Geographical Society, as a majority of its members are "illiterate." And the Royal Astronomical Society, also, presided over by that "hoodoo" the earl of Crawford, may be closed. Cambridge, too, may lose her professor of astronomy, that well-known "fool" Plumierian, and also Lord Rayleigh, who, until this charge of being "abnormal," was considered one of the most level-headed men in England.

Students of the electrical phenomena would miss that "knave" Varley, and evolution would lose her first advocate, "ridiculous" Wallace. Mathematics might be the gainer when that "absurd" Morgan stepped down and out, and physiology would receive a new impetus when Mayo and Barrett, "whose faculties are aberrant," were sent to the lunatic asylum.

The army would lose Lord Wolseley, and Dr. Robertson would be removed from the editorship of the Journal of Medical Science, and a new poet-laureate created in place of that "illiterate, hoodooing imbecil," Tennyson.

Then the works of Massey, the Howitts, Trollope, Bulwer, Lytton, Thackeray, Browning, and Bayard Taylor would be destroyed as tending to "immorality;" actors like Jefferson be prohibited the country, and Huxley sent to the penitentiary for daring to say that there was enough in the phenomena to claim his respectful attention and patient investigation.

The news would spread to France, and the president, another "ghost-monger," would banish his predecessors Thiers and Jules Favre and Flammarion the astronomer, and prohibit the works of Victor Hugo, Guizot, and Dumas.

Germany would expel her Goldschmidt, Hoeffle, Fechner, Weber, Scheibner, Fichte, and Hoffmann, of the universities of Gottingen, Leipsic, and Wertzburg, and close up the Royal Academy of Science, presided over by that "illiterate" Von Esenbeck, and destroy the works of Von Humboldt.

Russia would send to Siberia Wagner, Butlerof, Dahl, Yowkevitsch, Aksakoff, and all her Liberal leaders. The clergy of Spain would glory over the downfall of Castelar, and the pope would anathematize the memories of those "knaves" Garibaldi and Mazzini.

And Wm. Lloyd Garrison, Gerrit Smith, and Parker Pillsbury, who "hoodooed" the American people on the slavery question; that "ghost-monger" Ex-Vice-president Wilson; that "illiterate" chief justice S. P. Chase, and that "abnormal" Stephen Pearl Andrews would be consigned to oblivion in company with that "deluded" Abraham Lincoln.

This is a very poor pen-picture of what might be effected by such articles as that of Mr. J. K. P. Baker, of Irwin, Ia., U. S. A. By the way, where is Irwin? and, if you know the gentleman, do me a personal favor to ask him not to pursue those "poor creatures" any further. Please do.

Let us now proceed with the matter in hand, and consider your letter as far as is possible under the circumstances. I should hav suggested before this that you confine yourself to a relation of your experiences at one séance, or several of like nature, giving all the conditions, for what seemed a trifle to you might be of some importance to me.

I read your account of the first séance carefully, and from the eight lines it occupies, fail to find anything except the fact that you had a sitting with the daughter of a lady friend, who was not a medium, but was simply mediumistic, or, in other words, an undeveloped medium.

A few sentences were given, but nothing that could be called a test. You also discovered that, by a slight movement, imperceptible to others, you, too, could move the table. And that is all.

Now, this is not a séance. I had thirty-four sittings before I accepted table-tipping and raps to be facts, and that an intelligent power was operating through the medium. I might hav sat as you did for fifty years, and would, like you, not hav taken any stock in it. But at my séances all questions were mental, and I hav never heard of a séance being conducted under other conditions.

If you and I were to sit at a table and I, though not a medium, were to officiate, and you were to ask your questions aloud, I could very easily giv satisfactory answers.

So I must ask you again to go into details. And as we are to consider this table-tilting and raps first, let us confine ourselvs to them. They are practically the alpha. Although materialization is a fact to me, I should prefer not discussing it thus early. It is the highest known phase, and can only be proved after other points hav been taken up and discussed.

Now that we hav embarked in this discussion I suggest that we constantly bear in mind those noble sentiments of Ingersoll which head this letter, for surely they will commend themselvs to your intelligence.

Our Annual for 1889.

CONCORD, N. H., Dec. 25, 1888.

DEAR FRIEND AND EDITOR: Just a flying word to thank you most devoutly for the handsome Year Book. It is the first ANNUAL that has reached me, and probably is much the richest one that will reach me, this season.

It had never occurred to me that you contemplated so fine an investment. I am truly glad that so many of your patrons, readers, and friends responded to your proposal. The book is surely very valuable, and will be in time to come. Indeed, the calendar is not by any means the most important department; and yet you hav filled its pages so full of important historical events, as well as astronomical matters, that it will be worthy of preservation even for them alone.

With compliments and all good wishes pertinent to the holiday season, I am, my dear Editor and friend,

Faithfully and fraternally yours,

PARKER PILLSBURY.

The Truth Seeker.

We hope that as renewing-time for a large number of our subscribers has come around they will each make a little effort to procure us a new subscriber. Two subscriptions in this way cost but $5, and it is money in a subscriber's pocket when he procures another, to say nothing of the good done for the cause of mental freedom. If he can obtain more than one, the cost is diminished still more, and three subscriptions (one old and two new) make the paper very cheap to each.

There is no reason why THE TRUTH SEEKER should not hav a list of fifteen or twenty thousand. We need it to make the paper all that we desire, and if we had it Liberalism would spread with tenfold greater rapidity. When D. M. Bennett was alive, we knew that THE TRUTH SEEKER did more to disseminate Freethought than any other agency, except the lectures, writings, and life of Colonel Ingersoll. Since Mr. Bennett's untimely and lamentable death, we hav done what we could to carry aloft the standard dropped from his dead hand. By the aid of our friends, we trust we hav done some good to the world. We hav at least kept alive one free journal in which honest thought could find expression. But we want to push ahead a little faster. We want freedom to be the rule and not the exception. We want more power to our own and our contributors' elbows, and to obtain this we must hav more readers. And we ask every one of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S friends to see if he or she cannot find another Liberal who will take the paper.

Freethought during the past year has prospered and advanced as much as during any previous twelve months. The secular journals hav helped the work along, by reporting the utterance of Liberal thought, and magazines like the Popular Science Monthly and, especially, the North American Review, hav diffused our principles broadcast in regions where our own journals could never go. Our lecturers hav opened up new fields and hav done much missionary work with small reward. They, also, we desire to recommend to the good offices of all activ Liberals. They should hav more engagements and better pay. It requires the greatest courage and self-sacrifice to go personally among hostil forces, to carry the good news of freedom to slaves who hug their chains, and they should hav such reward and encouragement as Liberals can giv. Aside from the papers and magazines and lecturers, Freethought has been helped along by our national organization, the Secular Union. It is the only organization prepared to fight for our rights, but it, too, is sadly crippled by lack of funds, though it enters upon the new year with promis and resolution, and has already met the foe in the national Senate with, we are privately assured, exceedingly good effect. The Union should be generously supported, for it has much work to do. In England Charles Bradlaugh has pushed Freethought ahead by passing his Oaths bill, and Annie Besant now represents Freethinkers in the London School Board, where at the first meeting she made her power felt in behalf of Labor and Freedom. Across the border line of Canada, where superstition and ignorance reign almost supreme, are embodied in the very constitution of the country and appear in almost every law, Freethought has advanced amazingly. Even some of the ministers are fighting for the right of personal opinion against traditional enactments. More Liberal literature has been scattered throughout the Dominion than ever before in one year, and what is better, it has been read and its influence felt. On the European continent, in Germany and France and Italy Freethought, or anti-clericalism, as our cause is known in the two latter countries, has gone on conquering the legions of religion, until these countries are comparativly civilized. In Germany scarcely any educated citizen is Christian, and the governments of France and Italy are both controled by Freethinkers. Spain, the home of the bats and cruel beasts of religion, has an anti-clerical organization, and sent a protest one hundred and fifty thousand strong to Rome against restoring the temporal power of the pope. All along the line in the civilized world our cause is growing, because civilization is Liberalism. And, as Colonel Ingersoll says in our new ANNUAL, unless the race is to be a failure, the cause of Liberalism must succeed.

But we must keep on working and pushing and growing, and fighting in our courts a little if need be, to obtain our rights. It won't do to sit down and rest content with what we hav gained. We must get more. We must make the Christians honest enough to pay their taxes at least. And we ought to do this in some states this year. THE TRUTH SEEKER wants to help in this work more than ever, and that we shall hav the ability to do it we want a good many more new subscribers. Again we ask every friend to see if he or she cannot find another Liberal who will take THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is not much for each one to do, but if each one does it the aggregate will be very large, and result in an enormous amount of good for Freethought.

Something Gained.

At the meeting of the Board of Estimate and Apportionment of this city last week, the managers of the two Museums in Central park appeared and asked for an extra annual appropriation of ten thousand dollars. Mr. Marquand, treasurer of the Art Museum, said that the increase is necessary, since the building had been doubled in size and the collection increased.

Mayor Hewitt, Tax Commissioner Coleman, Comptroler Myers, and Alderman Dowling at once tackled the Museum deputation to open the Museums on Sunday. The Herald epitomizes the ensuing conversation as follows:

"'This Museum of Art is built on city property and the city contributes to its support,' said Mr. Coleman. 'I think it should be opened to the people on Sunday.'

"Comptroller Myers agreed with Mr. Coleman, but Spokesman Marquand said that the principal objection to Sunday openings was that many gifts would be diverted from the Museum were it opened on that day.

"Tax Commissioner Coleman then moved that the increase be allowed, and that it was the sense of the board that the Museum should be opened on Sunday.

"The mayor: 'My position in this matter is well known. I am in favor of having these institutions open on Sunday, and would be glad to hav the whole appropriation thus conditioned. I know that it ought to come, and that it will come. I hav suggested as an equivalent that the Museum be opened two evenings a week for free admission as a condition of the increased appropriation.'

"President Dowling contended for Sundays, because many people could not go to the Museum in the evening.

"Mayor Hewitt: 'You are right, Alderman Dowling. I hav fought inside and outside in favor of this step. I know there are many who would go to the Museum of a Sunday who cannot attend at any other time.'

"'Every day,' interjected Mr. Marquand, 'we get inquiries from persons who intend leaving us legacies in their wills, but these people say that they will not leave anything to the Museum if it is to be opened on Sunday.'

"Mayor Hewitt: 'I am only sorry for the man who is going to meet his maker who would deprive his fellow-men of an edifying Sunday among works of art.'

"Mr. Marquand: 'I suppose you hav read Friend Ruskin's opinion?'

"The Mayor (curtly): 'Ruskin is a lunatic.'"

It was finally voted to increase the appropriations for the Museums to $25,000, provided they were opened Saturday evening and one other evening each week, or on Sunday from noon to six o'clock.

The directors hav chosen to open the museums on Tuesday and Saturday evenings, and that is something of a gain. It is an admission that the people who really support the institutions cannot find the time to visit them in business hours. On Christmas the Metropolitan Museum was visited by sixteen thousand people, and this number would be duplicated every pleasant Sunday, provided admission were possible. That Sunday opening has got to come there is no shadow of doubt. The evening concession is a beginning. The Herald well says that it is a live topic, and one in which the public has taken, is taking, and will continue to take a very large interest. The pressure is growing stronger every month. Senator Langbein said to a Star reporter that one of the first bills he should introduce in the legislature this session is one opening the museums on Sundays anyway, without regard to appropriations, though the money to pay the expenses would be cheerfully given. "The citizens of New York," declares the Herald, "do not feel that it is morally wrong to spend an hour or two on Sunday looking at works of art. If they produce a bad effect on the mind, then the museum should be closed all the time. But if, on the contrary, the work of an artist is both an education and a spiritual impulse, then it is safe to say that a good picture or statue ministers to the wants of human nature more effectivly than a poor sermon. Some time that museum will be open every day in the week. The directors are rowing against the tide, and doing it for the present with entire success. But while there is a limit to their strength, the tide rolls on forever."

The Herald is right. The wave started by the Secular Union two years ago is rolling along, and within two years more the museums will be crowded every pleasant Sunday in the year. The managers must yield to public opinion or to legal force. Which, is at their own option.

The Christian Forgeries in Josephus.

A reader in Des Moines, Iowa, writes for "information concerning the Christ-forgeries in Josephus," as he is destitute of the facts. If this information has been supplied once in these columns it has been supplied at least a dozen times. And there is not a Christian scholar of any reputation to-day who pretends that the passage in Josephus's Antiquities, book 18, chapter 3, section 3, is genuin. Its authenticity was given up as long ago as the time of Dr. Nathaniel Lardner (born 1684, died 1768), author of the "Credibility of the Gospel History," and one of the most highly regarded of Christian writers. Gibbon, too, decided it to be a forgery. Bishop Warburton, the distinguished defender of Pope's Essay on Man against the charge of Atheism, and one of the most distinguished of Christian defenders, agreed with Lardner. The Rev. Robert Taylor quotes many other Christian writers as coinciding, and the Freethinker's Text-Book, Part II, by Annie Besant, adds still other reverends as holding the same opinion. The biographer of Josephus in the Encyclopedia Britannica says the passage is unanimously regarded as spurious. Drs. Oort, Hooykaas, and Kuenen, German Christian writers of great repute, in the "Bible for Learners" declare the passage to be "certainly spurious" and "inserted by a later and a Christian hand."

Gibbon says it was forged between the time of Origen (A.D. 230) and Eusebius (A.D. 315). The credit of the forgery, however, is generally given to Eusebius, who first quoted it. The distinguished authors of the "Bible for Learners" distinctly state that Josephus never mentioned Jesus, and cite Josephus's close following of the atrocious career of Herod, up to the very last moments of his life, without mentioning the slaughter of the innocents, as indubitable proof that Josephus knew nothing of Jesus. Dr. Lardner givs these reasons why he regards the passage as a forgery:

"I do not perceive that we at all want the suspected testimony to Jesus, which was never quoted by any of our Christian ancestors before Eusebius.

"Nor do I recollect that Josephus has anywhere mentioned the name or word Christ, in any of his works; except the testimony above mentioned, and the passage concerning James, the Lord's brother.

"It interrupts the narrativ.

"The language is quite Christian.

"It is not quoted by Chrysostom, though he often refers to Josephus, and could not hav omitted quoting it, had it been then in the text.

"It is not quoted by Photius, though he has three articles concerning Josephus.

"Under the article Justus of Tiberias, this author (Photius) expressly states that historian (Josephus) being a Jew, has not taken the least notice of Christ.

"Neither Justin in his dialog with Trypho the Jew, nor Clemens Alexandrinus, who made so many extracts from Christian authors, nor Origen against Celsus, hav ever mentioned this testimony.

"But, on the contrary, in chapter xxxv of the first book of that work, Origen openly affirms that Josephus, who had mentioned John the Baptist, did not acknowledge Christ."

The Rev. S. Baring-Gould, in his "Lost and Hostil Gospels," though considering it killing dead birds to again examin and discredit the passage, goes into the matter somewhat exhaustivly. He says:

"This passage is first quoted by Eusebius (fl. A.D. 315) in two places (Hist. Eccl. lib. i, c. xi; Demonst. Evang., lib. iii); but it was unknown to Justin Martyr (fl. A.D. 140), Clement of Alexandria (fl. A.D. 192), Tertullian (fl. A.D. 193), and Origen (fl. A.D. 230). Such a testimony would certainly hav been produced by Justin in his apology or in his controversy with Trypho the Jew, had it existed in the copies of Josephus at his time. The silence of Origen is still more significant. Celsus, in his book against Christianity, introduces a Jew. Origen attacks the arguments of Celsus and his Jew. He could not hav failed to quote the words of Josephus, whose writings he knew, had the passage existed in the genuin text. He indeed distinctly affirms that Josephus did not believe in Christ (Contr. Cels., i).

"Again, the paragraph interrupts the chain of ideas in the original text. Before this passage comes an account of how Pilate, seeing there was a want of pure drinking water in Jerusalem, conducted a stream into the city from a spring two hundred stadia distant, and ordered that the cost should be defrayed out of the treasury of the Temple. This occasioned a riot. Pilate disguised Roman soldiers as Jews, with swords under their cloaks, and sent them among the rabble, with orders to arrest the ringleaders. This was done. The Jews, finding themselvs set upon by other Jews, fell into confusion. One Jew attacked another, and the whole company of rioters melted away. 'And in this manner, says Josephus, 'was this insurrection suppressed.' Then follows the paragraph about Jesus, beginning, 'At this time lived Jesus, a wise man, if indeed one ought to call him a man,' etc.; and the passage is immediately followed by, 'About this time another misfortune threw the Jews into disturbance, and in Rome an event happened in the temple of Isis which produced great scandal.' And then he tells an indelicate story of religious deception which need not be repeated here. The misfortune which befell the Jews was, as he afterward relates, that Tiberius drove them out of Rome. The reason of this was, he says, that a noble Roman lady, who had become a proselyte, had sent gold and purple to the temple at Jerusalem. But this reason is not sufficient. It is clear from what precedes—a story of a sacerdotal fraud—that there was some connection between the incidents in the mind of Josephus. Probably the Jews had been guilty of religious deceptions in Rome, and had made a business of performing cures and expelling demons with talismans and incantations, and for this had obtained rich payment.

"From the connection that exists between the passage about the 'other misfortune which befell the Jews,' and the former one about the riot suppressed by Pilate, it appears evident that the whole of the paragraph concerning our Lord is an interpolation. That Josephus could not hav written the passage as it stands is clear enough, for only a Christian would speak of Jesus in the terms employed. Josephus was a Pharisee and a Jewish priest. He shows in all his writings that he believes in Judaism.

"It has been suggested that Josephus may hav written about Christ as in the passage quoted, but that the portions within the brackets are the interpolations of a Christian copyist. But when these portions within brackets are removed, the passage loses all its interest, and is dry statement, utterly unlike the sort of notice Josephus would hav been likely to insert. He givs color to his narrativs; his incidents are always sketched with vigor. This account would be meager beside those of the riot of the Jews and the rascality of the priests of Isis. Josephus asserts, moreover, that in his time there were four sects among the Jews—the Pharisees, the Sadducees, the Essenes, and the sect of Judas of Gamala. He givs tolerably copious particulars about these sects and their teachings, but of the Christian sect he says not a word. Had he wished to write about it, he would hav given full details, likely to interest his readers, and not hav dismissed the subject in a couple of lines.

"It was, perhaps, felt by the early Christians that the silence of Josephus—so famous a historian and a Jew—on the life, miracles, and death of the founder of Christianity, was extremely inconvenient; the fact could not fail to be noticed by their adversaries. Some Christian transcriber may hav argued either Josephus knew nothing of the miracles performed by Christ—in which case he is a weighty testimony against them—or he must hav heard of Jesus, but not hav deemed his acts, as they were related to him, of sufficient importance to find a place in his history. Arguing thus, the copyist took the opportunity of rectifying the omission written from the standpoint of a Pharisee, and therefore designating the Lord as merely a wise man."

The Rev. Dr. Giles, an English clergyman, author of the "Christian Records," adds to the reasons for rejecting the passage, as follows:

"Those who are best acquainted with the character of Josephus, and the style of his writings, hav no hesitation in condemning this passage as a forgery interpolated in the text during the third century by some pious Christian, who was scandalized that so famous a writer as Josephus should hav taken no notice of the gospels, or of Christ, their subject. But the zeal of the interpolator has outrun his discretion, for we might as well expect to gather grapes from thorns, or figs from thistles, as to find this notice of Christ among the Judaizing writings of Josephus. It is well known that this author was a zealous Jew, devoted to the laws of Moses and the traditions of his countrymen. How, then, could he hav written that Jesus was the Christ? Such an admission would hav proved him to be a Christian himself, in which case the passage under consideration, too long for a Jew, would hav been far too short for a believer in the new religion, and thus the passage stands forth, like an ill-set jewel, contrasting most inharmoniously with everything around it. If it had been genuin, we might be sure that Justin Martyr, Tertullian, and Chrysostom would hav quoted it in their controversies with the Jews, and that Origen or Photius would hav mentioned it. But Eusebius, the ecclesiastical historian (i, 11), is the first who quotes it, and our reliance on the judgment or even the honesty of this writer is not so great as to allow of our considering everything found in his works as undoubtedly genuin."

In Dr. Lardner's time the controversy over this passage was quite warm, and its defenders resorted to all sorts of verbal tricks to keep it as authentic. The Rev. Robert Taylor tells us that they introduced imaginary parentheses, made arbitrary omissions, and mistranslated it in order to make it harmonize with the style of Josephus, and to giv it even the appearance of genuinness. The Abbe Bullet, one of Dr. Lardner's chief opponents, argued that Josephus ought to hav known of Jesus, and that as he gave accounts of all the impostors or heads of parties which arose among the Jews, he must hav spoken of Jesus, and that as Eusebius was the first to discover the passage, Josephus might hav published two editions of his Antiquities, inserting the passage in that one which Eusebius obtained and omitting it in the other! "So struggles," says Dr. Taylor, "conquered sophistry against victorious truth."

Another forged reference to Christ is found in the Antiquities, Book XX, chapter ix, section 1, where Josephus is made to speak of James, "the brother of Jesus, who was called Christ." According to this passage James was put to death under the orders of the high priest. But according to Hegesippus, a converted Jew who wrote a history of the Christian church about A.D. 170, James was killed in a tumult, not by sentence of a court. Clement of Alexandria confirms this, and is quoted by Eusebius accordingly. Eusebius also quotes the line from Josephus, without noticing that the two do not agree. The statement is quoted in various ways in the early writers, and the conclusion is irresistible that the copies of Josephus were tampered with by copyists. Even had Jesus lived and taught as described in the gospels, Josephus, an orthodox Jew, a priest, and conservativ government official, would never hav given him the title of Christ, or messiah, a party leader for whom the Jews were looking to free them from their Roman bondage.

The third and last supposed reference to Jesus to be found in Josephus is found in his discourse on Hades, wherein he says that all men "shall be brought before God the word; for to him hath the father committed all judgment; and he, in order to fulfill the will of his father, shall come as judge, whom we call Christ." But this passage, says Mrs. Besant, supposing it to be genuin, simply refers to the Jewish belief that the Messiah, or the Christ, or the Anointed, was the appointed judge, as the prophet Daniel saw in his vision—the son of man who came with the clouds of heaven and to whom was given dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve him. This dominion of the Jews' looked-for Christ was to be everlasting. Josephus was a thorough Jew, and depended a great deal upon the Old Testament, as the fact that the material for his first eleven books of the Antiquities of the Jews is drawn exclusivly from that collection of documents shows. The passage is not quoted as evidence by any but the most ill-informed of Christian writers. The only quotation from Josephus upon which stress is laid is the longer description of Jesus first noticed. But the truth is, and it is universally admitted, that Josephus never heard of Jesus.

Pernicious Activity.

At the instance of the clergy the Philadelphia branch of Comstock's society has set the district attorney, Mr. Graham, after Sada Bailey Fowler's book, "Irene; or, The Road to Freedom." The book is Mrs. Fowler's solution of the question, Is marriage a failure? though it was written some time before that conundrum was propounded by Mona Caird. It is a novel, with propagandistic motivs, like "Robert Elsmere," and purports to show by the heroin's experiences that bond marriage is a most disastrous thing, while voluntary association leads to long life, health, happiness, virtue, chastity, and so forth.

The clergy allege that the book is blasphemous, and of course the Society allege that it is obscene. This latter charge, however, will be extremely difficult to sustain, as the book is in no sense obscene either in language or intent. But District-attorney Graham has had the impudence to demand that the publisher shall deliver the plates to the Philadelphia Society for the Suppression of Vice to be destroyed, and that the book shall be withdrawn from circulation. Mrs. Fowler and the publisher refuse to do anything of the sort, and hav engaged counsel to combat the censoriously disposed society. As yet, however, the legal machine of injustice has not begun to grind.

Comstock annually has an extra attack of virtue about this time of the year. His society holds its public meeting within the next sixty days, and he desires to advertise his doings that the contributions may be large. Hence his activity. This year his society's agents hav got so bad a blow in the face by Sullivan's revelations, that he must hustle with unusual vigor or the public will conclude that further contributions to the treasury of the S. S V. will be wasted. Perhaps some of them may even be irreverent enough to tell Colgate and Killy Van Renssaeler to levy on some of that $120,000 which Sullivan alleges that Britton, by using the society's prestige, blackmailed out of the gamblers of the city. Mrs. Fowler's book is no more obnoxious to the society's supposed purpose than any other heretical work, social or religious, and in threatening it Comstock has made a mistake. His society is on the defensiv even as to its legitimate work (if we can admit that religious organizations are ever legitimately engaged in enforcing laws—which we never can) in suppressing obscenity and gambling, and to undertake to punish an author for blasphemous writing is a stretch of authority very unwise for Comstock to countenance. He is very much better known now than he was eight years ago, and consequently the general public are less disposed to back him up in his iniquitous attempts to strangle heresy.

The hypocrisy of the pharisaical censors of other people's reading was never better illustrated than by J. A. Wilson's letter to the World, which we reprint in another column. When Wilson was sent to prison for selling Margaret of Navarre's collection of tales, Henry Ward Beecher, a member of Comstock's society, had the work in his library, and presumably W. C. Beecher, counsel for the society, or his mother, has the book yet. But either the great preacher was guilty of possessing and reading obscene literature, or else the conviction of Wilson was an infamous outrage. But if Wilson was justly convicted why was not Beecher, and why is not every bookseller in New York convicted? And why did Comstock take a heavy cash compromise from one New Jersey seller of the book, and put another behind the bars?

The fact is that the Society for the Suppression of Vice is a tyrannical and bigoted fool concern, which has no excuse to exist. It ought to be abolished, and would hav been long ago but for the cowardice of the publishers and artists of this city.

A FEW weeks ago the chief of police of Galveston, Texas, notified the people of that city that he should enforce the Sunday law. He tried it one Sunday, very unsuccessfully, and then gave it up. Public sentiment was too strong against him. It givs us pleasure to state, also, that the Galveston News is not quite so much in favor of the church running the town on Sundays as it used to be.

AT the evangelization meeting at Chickering Hall on Wednesday evening of the 5th ult., the Rev. Dr. Crawford said he could remember when the Sabbath was observed here; when chains were stretched across the streets so that not even a milk-wagon could pass; when few went out of doors except to attend divine service; and he believed that such a state of things would return. The audience applauded the idea. Dr. Crawford is an exceedingly optimistic old gentleman. When the Protestant churches again get the power to stretch chains across the streets of New York on Sunday to stop travel the millennium will be so close at hand that the effort will be unnecessary.

THE Rev. B. F. Da Costa, D.D., rector of the church of St. John the Evangelist, calls the Sunday newspaper the modern Anti-christ. It displaces religion, he says, and takes the place of the Bible. Its general influence is bad, very, very bad. One of Dr. Da Costa's reasons for condemning the Sunday editions of the newspapers was that it compelled Sunday labor, but the reverend did not allow that fact to deter him from sending special invitations to the reporters to labor at reporting him on the Sunday he preached that sermon. Another reason he adduced why Sunday papers should be abolished was that they made men think, and "man has only a given amount of thought." Probably he wants to get men into church where no thought is required to understand a sermon upon which no thought has been expended in preparation. On the first reason Dr. Da Costa's preaching and practice do not harmonize; on the second they coincide beautifully.

Letters from Friends.

BARRE, MASS., Dec. 16, 288.

MR. EDITOR: Please say to your readers that my solution of the puzzle in the issue of December 16th is incorrect.

Yours truly, ELLA E. GIBSON.

COLUMBUS, KAN., Dec. 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I glory in the way in which you subdued the board of registry and obtained your rights. "I still liv" and suffer. Bless you. J. H. COOK.

MILWAUKEE, Nov. 26, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Your paper grows better all the time, and is the best Freethought paper published in this country. I could not do without it. You hav my best wishes always.

A. B. SEVERANCE.

SHEPARD, O., Dec. 16, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: If 1½ hens lay 1½ eggs in 1½ days, one hen will lay one egg in 1½ days (not one day, there is the catch), or ⅔ of an egg a day. Answer, 28 eggs. If it be held that eggs are only laid at the end of each period of 1½ days, then the answer would be 24, there being but four full periods of that length. Respectfully, F. S. MONTGOMERY.

LISBON, IOWA, Dec. 19, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just finished reading the three letters on the hen-and-egg problem which are found in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 15th, and hav decided that none of the three answers is quite correct. My answer is 28. It can be worked out by compound proportion or by analysis. The proportion is between the hens and the eggs, and the time must remain as it is. Ella E. Gibson does not observe this; "Volunteer" does not in the first part of his explanation, but does in the last, and S. F. Hazeltine's answer is nearly the same as mine, but I do not understand how he gets his fraction. If my answer is wrong, I hope that some one will correct me.

A. LAURIE SAILOR.

DALTON, GA., Dec. 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am in full sympathy with the Secular cause, and cannot do without the paper, which I highly appreciate, pictures and all. Heston is a brick. The masses in this country are highly imbued with the Christian superstition, and very fond of the orthodox pastime of persecuting and proscribing Infidels. There are a few Liberals in this country, but the most of them hav not backbone enough to avow their sentiments for fear of church influence. Yet there are a few of us who hav the manhood to proclaim and defend our sentiments in the face of all opposition. I feel that I am getting old—sixty-five years—but hope to liv to see the day when there will be a change for the better.

Yours for universal mental liberty, W. W. BAKER.

MIDDLEFIELD, N. Y., Dec. 19, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: You may be surprised to hear from a lone subscriber living in Middlefield. There is not another near here. I hav not been able to place the paper in any family yet. They look upon me as a monster, but I hav a good many young gentlemen and ladies that are getting their eyes open. The darkness of superstition is dense. That imaginary God of the heathen rules supreme. I hav neighbors that believe in witches and the efficacy of horseshoes over the door. I take five papers; THE TRUTH SEEKER takes the cake. Find inclosed $1. Please send me as many back numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER as you can for the money. I want these to distribute among my friends.

Yours for truth and reform, ANGUS GRIFFIN.

MONTE VISTA, COL., Dec. 8, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Long ago, it has been my understanding, the Rev. DeWitt Talmage said that he "longed to see the Brooklyn Tabernacle spattered with Ingersoll's brains." Now, if he said this, I think he merits the scorn and contempt of every decent person. He should be refused a hearing in every civilized community. He should be refused space in every respectable journal. Yea, he should be ostracized from decent society. If he said it, he loses all claim to respect. A gentleman here undertakes to deny the charge. I told him I would ask you to publish what you knew about it. Will you giv us the evidence?

JOHN TRUEBLOOD.

[We never heard that Mr. Talmage said anything of the sort. Giv the devil his due; he's black enough now.—ED. T. S.]

A TRIBUTE TO THE MEMORY OF A FATHER.

GIDEON, KAN., Dec. 4, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I will announce that on the 24th of November, 1888, our father, R. W. Watkins, breathed his last, and has gone, as we believe, to that long, last, beautiful rest. He was a Freethinking Liberal, and made the request while living that some one of his near friends should make a few remarks at his funeral—one who knew his views and character, etc. His wishes were carried out as nearly as possible, or I might say entirely. The words which constituted the tribute to the memory of the dead were warmly and kindly spoken by Mr. Gideon Elias, who had known the deceased for more than twenty years. It was a just tribute. The deceased was sixty-eight years of age; was an honest man, a generous friend, and a kind and loving husband and father; believing that goodness was greatness, and that those attributes and the memory of such would cause a better feeling when we come to pay the debt of nature. He also believed that death is an eternal rest. He was of a bright, cheerful disposition, and the memory of his good deeds, kind actions, and loving ways will make an oasis in our lives that time cannot destroy, and will ever tend to elevate our lives. Rest, dear father, rest. LILAH C. WATKINS.

MILFORD, MASS., Dec. 9, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Saladin's "Woman" came to hand on the 5th, and what more "devotional" act can I perform than to write an acknowledgment of it by making a remittance? Inclosed find postal note for $2.28. You ought to sell many copies of "Woman." Any Liberal that has not read any of Saladin's works does not know what he has lost, and only has the old adage to console himself with, "What a man doesn't know doesn't hurt him." I am certain that what a man doesn't know doesn't help him, and is a detriment. Liberal women will read "Woman" if their attention is called to it, as I presume that "Tray, Blanche, and Sweetheart," who, Mrs. Stanton says, "bark the loudest," are not fouud among Liberal women. The priest, alias "Our pastor," has them in his charge and they do not even whine. E. A. Stevens's letter in the last TRUTH SEEKER as to attendance of women in Chicago holds true everywhere, and it is not changed by creed, race, or climate.

Fraternally, CHARLES C. JOHNSON.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Dec. 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Some time ago a writer in these columns called attention to a long-felt want, viz., a biography of Infidels who had benefited the world. Such a book would be of incalculable value to all Freethinkers, who are almost constantly being asked by Christians, "What good has Infidelity ever done for the world?" A little information, such as a brief sketch of the life, works, belief, and death of some of the world's noted Infidels, would be just the thing for an occasion like this, and what Freethinker has not felt the need of it? In commenting on this subject before, you suggested it as a good chance for some Freethinker ambitious of literary fame. Now, I would like to propose the the name of Prof. Felix L. Oswald as the author of this proposed work, for these reasons: Dr. Oswald is a writer of universal reputation; he is a fearless Freethinker, and an acknowledged scholar, whose name alone would commend the book. I would like to hear the opinion of some of the truth seekers on this subject. ALEX. D. BLAIR.

[Read "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," by D. M. Bennett.—ED. T. S.]

KEOTA, IA., Dec. 12, 1888.

GENERAL COMMANDING THE ARMY OF TRUTH WRITERS AND SEEKERS: I read that you need money, and as I farmed in Iowa when the rate of interest was twenty-five per cent, and hogs one to two cents, I know very well what need of this mercantil fluid, money, means, so I hasten to inter $3 for resurrection at your headquarters, to keep in rank and file with your army of seekers. No one will desert whilst the bullets fly thick and fast between Elmina and McArthur, Irwin, Parker, Burr, and others, and good, well-meaning Jeremiah Hacker is dividing and Robert Gunther defending the ground. If a man paid twenty-five per cent interest on the value of his land, but by sweating sixteen hours a day for a quarter of a century cleared his possessions from brush and mortgage, and provided a comfortable home for his family, such a man will ask, Why not divide first the millions absorbed from agricultural states by your Eastern speculators, and decide what to do with their palaces? But I will not write to-day, but will enjoy the rich selection of rations our TRUTH SEEKER general divides among us, and be proud, because he, like Belisar, came, saw, and conquered.

CHAS. NAUMAN.

CHICAGO, ILL., Dec. 18, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav to say that I think the cartoons on the first page of THE TRUTH SEEKER are excellent, and speak volumes on the subjects treated. Still, I must say that I fail to see that anything is gained by those on the last page. They strike me as being ridicule only. The last two front-page cartoons, viz., "When Reason Rules," and "When Rome Rules," are worthy of especial notice. They seem to express so much that I feel myself impelled to write some verses about them. Here they are:

When reason rules and honest thought
Is placed upon the fulcrum, truth,
Error's displaced and facts are taught
In all our schools to all our youth.

But when Rome rules then down with thought,
Burn all the books which science teach,
Destroy the press, all must be brought
To bow to priests and what they preach.

Yes, when Rome rules, farewell free speech,
The schools are into convents turned,
True liberty is out of reach,
Because its friends hav all been burned.

JOHN HUDSON.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., Nov. 13, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I was about to be very wroth with your correspondent "W. T. S. H." for injecting into the middle of a letter about the tariff the following sentiment: "The Chicago Anarchists were murderers, and had a fair trial. No man with any manhood can place these murderers with John Brown." But on second thoughts it occurred to me that he was partly right. No one doubts that John Brown killed people. No one doubts that he did so contrary to law. No one doubts that he did so deliberately. No one doubts that he did so without the sanction of any belligerent power. It follows that, whatever claims John Brown may hav to be considered a hero, there is no doubt that he was technically a murderer. But Judge Gary himself, in the act of refusing a new trial to his victims, admitted that they had not killed anybody. He rested his construction upon the ground that they had advised killing persons undesignated under circumstances non-existent, and that under somewhat similar circumstances some one else had killed some one. This way of making them accessory of an alleged murder he very correctly said was unprecedented. There is, therefore, a very serious doubt whether the Chicago Anarchists were technically guilty of anything. That doubt has been expressed by B. F. Butler, General Trumbull, Colonel Ingersoll, and others, who rank among the first lawyers in America. Besides, supposing it were clearly proved, instead of disproved, that one of those who suffered for it had thrown the bomb in the Haymarket, no less a legal authority than Judge McAllister, of Illinois, has declared that under the circumstances the law, fairly interpreted, would justify them on the ground of self-defense. Clearly, then, the Anarchists ought not to be classed with John Brown. But that they are not worthy of as much admiration as John Brown is a different proposition. John Brown's son would seem to hav thought otherwise. The dogmatical opinion of "W. T. S. H.," that they had a fair trial, opposed to that of such jurists as I hav mentioned, is worth as much as a parson's on theology. If you think of a stronger simile to express utter ignorance, please substitute. C. L. JAMES.

CHICAGO, ILL., Dec. 8, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: While being an adherent to the tenets and entertaining a warm interest for the work, principles, and Nine Demands of the American Secular Union at Chicago, I very seldom come to its instructiv meetings, lectures, and discussions, on account of distance from my home, and other impediments, but I could not forego the great pleasure of attending on Sunday evening last the lecture of Mrs. Mattie A. Freeman, so justly reputed for her profound thoughts, her brilliant ideas, her scathing, sarcastic exposure of superstition and religious dogmas, and her eloquent delivery, so well displayed on the subject of "Cross and Crown" of that evening, given to an admiring assemblage at the Forum. A feminin Ingersoll, I would call her, and if ever genuin Freethought has had in her sex a worthy defender from the rostrum, blending with her radiant sentiments of sense and reason those of pure American patriotism, it is in the person of Mrs. Freeman, of Chicago, and to whom I hereby beg leave to tender my most heartfelt thanks for the high enjoyment infused by her greatly edifying lecture. Some men, I had cause to remark on the occasion, "should not speak in meeting" when such a woman as she has spoken before, and to such a delightful perfection, on the subject under discussion.

Sincerely, CHARLES J. SUNDELL.

ROCHESTER, N. H., Dec. 3, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been taking your TRUTH SEEKER for about five years. I prize it very highly. It is food and drink to me. I distribute the papers wherever opportunity offers. While some portions of humanity are willfully blind, and "none are so blind as those who will not see," yet I do think there are others who do hunger and thirst for the bread and the water of fact, but they are weak—the weakness being brought about by the poor food furnished in the dark past—and they fear to express their dissatisfaction with their present condition or hav it understood that they desire something better to-morrow than they hav to-day for fear the God of popularity will be displeased—for fear they will lose some of their idols—forgetting they are injuring themselvs most by so doing. I liv in hopes, and can see a vast difference to-day compared with a decade ago. The death of the old is the birth of the new. Gradually the old heavens and the old earth are passing away; gradually the new are forming.

Don't talk to me of future bliss;
I want my heaven now.
Don't sing to me of the by and by,
In a thousand years or so;
Now, just now, is the only time,
And the best that ever has been.
Let the dead past bury its dead
With all its ghostly kin.
Wander no more in the wilderness,
Or grieve o'er the might hav been;
Instead giv thanks for the blessed to-day
And renew your courage again

Yours, etc., ELIZA CADIEUX.

KENT, O., Dec. 9, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed clippings from the Akron, O., daily Beacon, giving some of the doings by the citizens of that place, who, as you will see, are using every effort to close all places of business and amusement as well as stop all modes of travel, thereby restricting the laboring class from all chances of enjoyment, except those who derive enjoyment in hearing poured forth the stultifying opiates of the gospel teachings. They will make a big effort to hav the lawmakers of our country pass such laws as will compel the citizens to giv aid in some way to the support of the Jewish God. Everyone will soon be compelled to acknowledge the sacredness of the Sabbath by staying at home if in no other way.

Methinks I see the danger ahead and the coming crisis, when everyone will be compelled to "show his hand" and either acknowledge the God of superstition or defend the truth with a daring spirit. Which shall it be? The churches hav the law, the money, the ignorance, also the organizations on their side, versus the truth, scientific proof, honest investigation, etc., minus the wealth and deceitful power of enforcement. What are we to do with all this great difference against us? We must not yield to the enemy of truth one point uncontested. Truth is right, just, and must prevail. In the dark hours of adversity and discouragement is the time for each to giv battle to the storm that would close to us the rising sun of advancement. Hold high above our heads the martyrs of the past, whose blood is now calling for revenge, that the universal liberty of individuals, communities, and nations may be upheld.

P. S. Gilmore was advertised to giv one of his grand sacred concerts in Akron to-day (Sunday), but was induced by threats and persuasion to change the date to Monday afternoon. In consequence, many of our merchants, mechanics, clerks, and professional men who could not leave their occupation on a week-day, but who hav been as nobly endowed with the love and appreciation for fine music as the clergy, hav been deprived of the privilege of hearing the greatest musical entertainment in the land. Surely the God of superstition and persecution must rule. A. D. S.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Dec. 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Brother Hacker's letter has elicited some remarkable theories of economic reform; but I shall freely admit that "Mr. Gunther told much truth in saying that the labor of Brother Hacker had been a waste of time," for that appears to hav been the result thus far of all the labor that has been applied to telling the truth about the cause and cure of economical ills. Mr. Wood asserts that "only by taxation can the people be robbed of their land or home," and challenges any person to dispute it. Further on he adds that "to license as many banks as are asked for, and then tax the people so as to compel them to borrow bankers' debts to pay taxes with, is the only slavery that ever existed anywhere, and the only way possible to cause slavery, poverty, war, vice, crime, and misery to exist." Nevertheless, I shall challenge him and all others to successfully controvert the self-evident fact that except for ownership taxation, usury, and slavery cannot exist. That is the truth, briefly stated, that Brother Hacker has been telling us about; and it is not the fault of his theory if his labor has been wasted. Therefore, and notwithstanding present appearances, I shall venture to hope that final results will not prove that he has committed the indiscretion of casting pearls before swine.

Ownership without taxation, usury, and extortion would prove to be a ridiculous absurdity, if not an absolute impossibility. What purpose can ownership reasonably be expected to serve than to make every known or conceivable method of extortion possible, and necessary to procure the means of living? Other results are but incidental, not desired or intended. Taxation being but a simple effect of ownership, I think Mr. Wood has greatly exaggerated its importance by itself considered. For, it being obvious that ownership is the parent of all abominations, and capable of breeding them ad infinitum, it is equally obvious that we had as well talk of damning up the Niagara with sawdust as of suppressing evil but temporarily and partially unless ownership is abolished.

Mr. Wood proposes that the government shall abolish taxation and issue "fiat money" in payment of current expenses, and loan without interest to those who hav occasion to borrow. That will require a large and continuous issue of "fiat money," none of which will be available unless put in circulation through commercial exchange. I am unable to perceive how the issues can be absorbed through commercial exchange except by inflating the price of labor and product. The issue being continuous, the inflation will be so. Hence, if his theory is reduced to practice when wheat is a dollar per bushel, a thousand dollars borrowed of the government will be the equivalent of a thousand bushels of wheat; but inflation will soon make five hundred bushels of wheat, or its equivalent in other products, the equivalent of a thousand dollars. And in time one bushel of wheat, or even less, will become the equivalent of a thousand dollars. And "fiat money" will become plentiful as autumn leaves, and of but little more worth, and will make ownership such an intolerable nuisance that people will desire to abolish it and transact exchange and distribution without money and without price. I am not informed of any good reason why that method should not be more convenient and satisfactory than the present cumbersome and absurd method, whose results are a disgrace to civilization. What they are to Christianity I shall not venture to say, but shall respectfully submit the solution of that problem to Christians themselvs.

That theories of economic reform should logically lead to abolition of ownership is not surprising, for ownership has in itself the elements of its own dissolution that should make its extinction but a question of time. When the fruit is ripe it will inevitably fall, in spite of all efforts to prevent it falling, and those who would avoid the danger of being hurt will hav no recourse but to "stand from under." Therefore, I am not so much annoyed by the manifestations of hostility to Socialism as by the blind stupidity that such manifestations indicate, and for which, agitation and free discussion is the only remedy that I am aware of.

The thought comes to me that Mr. Wood, in a previous letter, alludes to Socialism somewhat contemptuously; nevertheless, I shall think there is danger of his becoming a Socialist himself, if he livs long enough to learn the A, B, and C of political economy, and the cause and cure of economic ills. For I shall award him the merit of a sincere desire that the world shall be relieved of the abominations that he enumerates, but having mistaken their cause he has mistaken the remedy. J. A. TUTTLE.

MARION, CONN., Dec. 9, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: That the writer is not a professional scientist is to be deplored, and for the sole reason that the forthcoming narration of facts will not receive the credit actually deserved from those who enjoy regarding themselvs descendants of that celebrated mythical pair Adam and Eve. Nevertheless, it is presumed a large majority of readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know at least a little concerning evolution of life—perhaps they read this valuable paper through natural selection. I wish to say a few words concerning animals, and propound a number of questions which I desire answered in these columns by anyone who can answer. I once kept a large number of domestic rabbits and had a fine opportunity to observe their relations, habits, etc. At that time, if I had been as interested in evolution as my limited knowledge of its doctrins allows at present, I should hav endeavored to carefully investigate the lives of these apparently remarkable animals. However, in devoting the necessary care to my rabbits, I was surprised at several wonderful cases of exhibition of intellect by one of them—a doe—which would not fail to attract the acute attention of an observer, and which became indelibly imprinted on my mind. I distinctly recollect what is about to be related, and although the facts seem highly incredible, marvelous, and almost miraculous, it is to be hoped parallel cases can be cited to keep my reputation higher than that of the doctors of faith, Christian science, and other supernatural nonsense. I commenced raising rabbits with one pair only, and should, if I had not learned something, probably hav had no more except by gift or purchase. I confined this pair in a box cage consisting of two apartments, so arranged that both had free access to each. In due time the female produced her young, but her mate stamped their life out, as soon, I suppose, as he became aware of their existence. This did not teach me the lesson it ought, for the same was allowed to occur again. In my opinion the conduct of that buck was an exhibition of—instinct, but I will say reason. It demonstrated his aversion to rivalry and declared him a monopolist. Possibly the inhuman millionaire monopolists who succeed in crushing out the life of American workmen took a cue from buck-rabbits. My original female rabbit proved very prolific. She occasionally gave birth to from ten to thirteen young at a time, and invariably ate on each occasion all over nine. It seems singular that this doe should devour her young, but more singular it appears when it is known that does usually hav ten nipples, and that she was provided with only nine. On one occasion this doe produced at one birth over twenty very small young ones. I am not positiv as to the exact number; I think it was twenty-three, but I well recollect counting over twenty. Suffice it to say she reduced this extraordinary number to nine by her usual process. I hav forgotten whether she ate the most puny ones of the litter—I do not recollect whether she evidenced a knowledge of the survival of the fittest. Accepting the truth of the immediately foregoing statements, it must be admitted that doe was far-sighted, prudent, etc. Subsequently I kept said doe with about fifty other rabbits in a house having a ground floor, and allowed them all together. Now, this doe savant would burrow in the ground, giv birth to her young therein, and after nursing would seal the outlet of the burrow. I believe the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER are thinkers, and therefore consider it not essential to offer further comment concerning the facts set forth. Perhaps, if they glance between the lines, a lesson will be revealed which, if rightfully interpreted and followed, may benefit the human race.

I will close with the following questions:

1. Is it absolutely certain that the brain is the commander of all power over the body?

2. What causes a chicken for a minute or more after it is beheaded to first run, then flop, then be comparativly motionless, and then, when disturbed, to invariably renew its energies to escape from death or the beheader?

3. What causes the loggerhead turtle after it is beheaded—and for at least an hour after—to attempt to crawl, and to strive to draw the extending portions of its body into its shell when pricked, cut, or punched?

4. What causes the body of this turtle to quiver after it is made headless, and for at least five hours after, when it is being cut and dressed?

5. What causes the heart of this turtle to quiver and beat after it is beheaded, and five hours after, and why will small pieces of the heart at this time quiver after they hav been knifed from it?

6. Can a headless body be vivisected?

7. If the brain is the throne of reason, instinct, etc., how is it that the headless bodies of said animals exhibit—at least instinct?

8. Is there no feeling in the bodies of said animals after decapitation? EDWIN N. BEECHER.

PACIFIC, MO., Dec. 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: No matter how a man may resolve, conditions are forced upon him. I resolved not to write to you, but that "old story," as repeated by Mr. J. K. P. Baker and applied as a criticism on Mr. McArthur's saying that "the evidence of one who has seen has more weight than the evidence of a thousand who hav not seen," forces me to upset that resolve. The "old story" with which he attempts to prove the negativ to that assertion has as much to do with and relation to it as the corncob has to the peach or the broom to the feather. He says of the advice of D. Higbee, M.D., as to proper conditions for witnessing Spiritual phenomena, that it is too lengthy and worthless to repeat, except for the use to which he is now putting it—to show the utter unreliability of those who giv such testimony. How does he know that it is "hoodooing?" Has he tried it? And did such a small affair upset his reasoning capacity? If it did, it upsets his own point and makes him the "fool," incapable of judging. A man with reason, and choosing the conditions, cannot be "hoodooed," and his brain cannot be upset when he sees a thing which is put there for his inspection. The shout, Ridiculous! Absurd! applies solely to such a one as he is. He talks of "poor creatures, fools, and knaves," as though he were not one of them and more deserving of the title. He says, "When I come to the logic of facts I find them on this subject alone disqualified from giving testimony." O thou bigot! Better men than thou art were imprisoned, tortured, and even murdered for what they "alone" saw, discovered, and invented, and what such as you could not understand or were too cowardly to investigate. Is there no law, no cause, above your state? Does a fact, a truth, of law and cause, depend only, and hav value only, on the assumption that it would hav been the experience of any other person in the same circumstances and conditions? Are, then, all men alike circumstanced and conditioned Hav all the same brain and reasoning faculties? Don't you see your own abnormal condition and false logic? Spiritualists do not wander from human experience. It is their experience, as well as it has been the experience of the past and thousands before you, written and proclaimed by men superior to you "He must see as we all see." Indeed we must! So says any Christian, "Believe as we do or be damned." And you claim to be a Liberal! Bigot thou art! You quote Mill. I do not know much of him. But what I do know is that you do not understand his meaning. What is true of a class or individuals of a class is true of the whole class. Are there no classes, no differences in classes; no higher, no lower classes, laws, and natures?

It is but too true that every observation and every induction draws its value from itself, but not from "similar" ones, where truth and bare facts only are called for.

I hav for twenty years and more had experience with unseen forces and intelligences, even against my will and well-being, which is not the lot and experience of common nature or mankind in general. Am I, therefore, incompetent to be a witness, and you competent to sit in judgment of the same? Ridiculous! Absurd!

Now, Mr. Editor, there ought to be a cessation of such provocation, of such insults, of calling people fools and knaves, etc. It kills the Liberal thought, disharmonizes. Spiritualists are more in number than those mere ranters.

I inclose a slip cut from the Chicago Tribune, to add another one who had experience that all the "ones of us" had not—one who was a man of worth and reputation, as you will see. A. H. K.

LORD TENNYSON'S TRANCE.

It is well known that among the higher scientific circles of England Spiritualism made a few years ago rapid and remarkable progress. Wallace, the co-discoverer with Darwin of the principle of natural selection; Professor Crookes, the eminent chemist on whom the French Academie des Sciences conferred a gold medal with an honorarium of three thousand francs for his discoveries in molecular physics; Sergeant Cox, the noted psychist, and Professor Huxley himself, a skeptic of skeptics, were concerned in a series of experiments, chiefly with the medium Home, which attracted wide attention at the time. None of the scientists could explain the phenomena produced by the medium, and the report made by Professor Crookes is held by the professors of the Spiritualist belief in overwhelming testimony to its genuinness.

The name of the poet Tennyson has never before been connected with Spiritualism. A letter written by him has come into the possession of the Tribune, which shows that he holds the conviction that consciousness may pass from the body and hold communion with the dead. This is essentially Spiritualism; but in Tennyson's case, at least so far as the letter indicates, he is his own medium. The statement he makes is curious.

The letter is in the poet's handwriting. It is dated Farringford, Freshwater, Isle of Wight, May 7, 1874. It was written to a gentleman who communicated to him certain strange experiences he had had when passing from under the effect of anesthetics. Tennyson writes: "I hav never had any revelations through anesthetics; but a kind of waking trance—this for lack of a better name—I hav frequently had, quite up from boyhood, when I hav been all alone. This has often come upon me through repeating my own name to myself silently till, all at once, as it were, out of the intensity of the consciousness of individuality the individuality itself seemed to dissolve and fade away into boundless being; and this not a confused state, but the clearest of the clearest, the surest of the surest, utterly beyond words, where death was an almost laughable impossibility, the loss of personality—if so it were—seeming no extinction, but the only true life."

As if conscious of the incredible significance of the statement thus compacted, he adds: "I am ashamed of my feeble description. Hav I not said the state is utterly beyond words?"

This is not a vulgar table-tipping Spiritualism. It is the most emphatic declaration that the spirit of the writer is capable of transferring itself into another existence almost at will; that the other existence is not only real, clear, simple, but that it is also infinit in vision and eternal in duration. For he continues that when he comes back to "sanity" he is "ready to fight for the truth" of his experience, and that he holds it—the spirit, whose separate existence he thus repeatedly tests—"will last for eons and eons."

It is pointed out by Prof. Thomas Davidson, who has seen the letter, that the same conviction, if not the same experience, only with another, is described in "In Memoriam," xcv. The stanzas are generally passed over as referring to a mere poetic frenzy of grief. But reading them in the light of the calmly penned prose puts an entirely different aspect on the incident contained in the lines:

. . . And in the house light after light
Went out and I was all alone.

A hunger seized upon my heart; I read
Of that glad year which once had been
In those fall'n leaves which kept their green,
The noble letters of the dead.

And strangely on the silence broke
The silent-speaking words, and strange
Was Love's dumb cry defying change
To test his worth, and strangely spoke

The faith, the vigor, bold to dwell
On doubts that drive the coward back;
And keen through wordy snares to track
Suggestion to her inmost cell:

So word by word and line by line
The dead man touched me from the past,
And, all at once, it seemed at last,
His living soul was flashed on mine.

And mine in his was bound, and whirled
About empyreal hights of thought
And came on that which is, and caught
The deep pulsations of the world,

Æonian music measuring out
The steps of time—the shocks of chance—
The blows of death. . . .

The idea of the actuality of the unseen is conveyed in the letter in terms which correspond nearly to those in the rhythmic expression. That "which is" is certainly a confirmation of the state, "surest of the surest;" and the lasting "for eons upon eons" finds its counterpart in "Æonian music." As Tennyson has never been connected in any way with psychic science or Spiritualism, the letter, not to mention the now clearer reading of the poem, will create not a little surprise.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

New Year's Bells.

Ring, bells, ring, with your mellow din,
Ring the Old Year out, and the New Year in,
Like the voices of birds from the old gray spire,
Let your silvery music rise higher and higher.
Floating abroad o'er the hillside bare,
In billows of sound on the tremulous air
Let it rise and fall with the fitful gale.
Tell over city and wood the tale:
Say that to-night the Old Year dies;
Bid the watches look to the eastern skies
For the beautiful halo that tells afar
Of the welcome rise of the New Year's star.

Ring the Old Year out, with its sighs and tears,
Its withering heartaches and tiresome fears;
Away with its memories of doubt and wrong,
Its cold deceit, and its envyings strong.
All its pandering lures to the faltering sense,
All its pitiful shams and cold pretense,
We will heap them together and bind them fast
To the old man's load as he totters past;
The ills he brought he may take again,
Keep we the joys, let him bury the pain.
Ring soft, O bells, as he goes to rest
Far in the shades of the darkening west.

Ring, bells, ring, with a merry din:
The Old Year has gone with its care and sin;
Smiling and fair at the eastern gates,
Clad in tinted white, the New Year waits;
Welcome him in with the rosy band,
Who wait the wave of his beckoning hand—
Hope, with her wreath of sweet spring flowers—
Joy for the summer's glowing hours,
Plenty and Peace for the fruitful fall,
And Love for all seasons—best of all.
Ring merrily, bells! o'er the blushing skies
See the beautiful star of the New Year rise.

More About Manshope.

Not long since you were told a tradition about a famous giant called Manshope. It is not likely that such a being ever existed, although it is probable that a powerful and eccentric Indian did liv in the long ago somewhere about Cape Cod. On account of his size, strength, or peculiarities, or perhaps by reason of all three combined, his exploits passed into tradition or folk-lore. Tradition means the handing down from father to son, mother to daughter, by word of mouth, a story that gains credence as it goes along, and is regarded as actual fact by credulous and ignorant people. The more ignorant men and women are, the more credulous they become. Imagination was very large in those who lived in the days gone by. Happenings they could not account for they attributed to gods, demons, fairies, giants, ghosts, and goblins. The past is full of myths concerning these imaginary creatures that hav appeared from time to time under various disguises and different names, and many of them may be traced to the changes and variations of nature.

The story of Cinderella has been traced away back to our Aryan ancestors, under the name of the "Sun and Dawn." The dark clouds are represented as the jealous sisters of Cinderella, her stepmother is the dark, grim Night, while she herself is the lovely Dawn. The fairy prince is the Rising Sun, who comes to claim the beautiful Aurora, or Cinderella, as we hav it, for his sweet bride. So of other popular tales, whose origin may be traced thousands of years backward to a period when humanity was in a state of childhood, and believed everything.

But, about Manshope the giant. The northwest point of the west end of Martha's Vineyard is called Gay Head. Here a cliff rises nearly a hundred feet, and is composed of clay or ochers in various colors—red, pink, blue, black, yellow, and white. When the sun shines upon these colors on the cliff, a dazzling and beautiful sight breaks upon the eye of the beholder. Hence you can see at once the appropriateness of the name, Gay Head. This part of the island has long been reserved by the state for the use of the Indians, the remnant of a tribe still inhabiting the spot. There is also a lighthouse here, and the place has become a famous resort for excursionists and pleasure-seekers. It is said that the old giant Manshope lived here once upon a time, and the spot he is said to hav called home is queer enough. Along the cliff there is at one place a deep depression, as if it might hav been fashioned for a large bowl, with an opening on the side facing the sea. It resembles somewhat the mouth of a volcanic mountain. It is said to be four hundred yards in circumference and one hundred feet deep. Before the white people had found Martha's Vineyard, the Indians say, old Manshope lived in this cave or dugout. He was looked up to with great respect by all the Indians thereabout. He was reputed to be so strong that he could pull up large oak-trees by the roots. With these trees, it is said, he made fires and broiled whales and other creatures for the Indians to eat.

There is a little island not far from Gay Head called No Man's Land, and this, the Indians say, Manshope cut off from Gay Head in a fit of anger. Although, in the main, reported as a very good giant, yet was he subject to passionate outbursts, when the earth would tremble as he walked. In one of these angry moods, it is related, he changed all his children into fishes, bluefish and tautog, and their descendants liv around Gay Head in the waters to this day. Some of the Indians who reside there will not eat bluefish or tautog for fear of devouring some of Manshope's great-grandchildren. At the time he thus turned his little ones into fish, the Indians say that his wife interceded in their behalf, imploring him not to be guilty of such cruelty, whereupon he seized her by the hair of her head and swung her over on Seaconnet Point, where she was immediately changed into a huge rock which anybody can see, even to the present day. The Indians think this has a preference over the story of Lot's wife being changed into a pillar of salt, as is related in the Bible, as the salt woman must be melted by the rain and sun, while Manshope's wife is still as solid as the rock.

Manshope undertook at one time to build a bridge across from Gay Head to the island of Cuttyhunk. He had thrown in several rocks for the foundation, and had just scraped up a shoeful of earth, when, as he stood knee-deep in the water, a crab came along sideways, and, having no respect for Manshope, bit his great toe, which made him so angry that he went away, and nobody ever heard of him afterward. The bridge, however, may still be seen, half finished, and is known as the Devil's Bridge.

The reputed home of old Manshope is also called the Devil's Den, because, it is said, flames were seen issuing from it in later days.

Now, how shall we account for the origin of these stories? The fires may be accounted for by the colors of the ochers, which are brilliant enough in the sunshine to giv the impression of dying embers and coals of fire. Fossil remains, too, hav been found here, skeletons of monstrous fish or sea animals, and this fact would giv rise to the story of a giant like Manshope, broiling these creatures upon the fire that was supposed once to hav blazed there. The rocks in that township farther on from Gay Head are of a singular shape. They are granit, and very curious indeed in size and form, and hav sometimes been mistaken for houses and barns. Some are conical, others are almost square, some look like elephants, and still again, the imagination might easily picture some as giant men and women. One is scooped out like a sugar bowl, and still another is called the Sugar Loaf, from its resemblance to a huge loaf of sugar. From this it may easily be seen that it was easy to think the strange-appearing rock at Seaconnet Point might be old Manshope's wife. The ignorant nativs, not being able to account for certain facts in nature, ascribed them to the workings of a giant. Nothing is more probable. The legend of old Manshope remains and his exploits hav passed into traditionary history. Science, however, has made such progress that the children of to-day are able to explain many things that perplexed the minds of grown men in former periods. The legends and traditions of the past are useful in showing the errors of ignorance, as well as the beautiful facts of nature.

Rainier, Ore., Dec. 12, e m. 288

Miss Susan H. Wixon, Dear Friend: I hav just been reading your "Apples of Gold" for the second or third time, and this morning our chapter has been "Forenoon Faces," "Little Nancy," and "Looking for Work," and when I come to where the brother and sister were talking over their father's death, and Augusta said, "Why should death take him when there are so many useless men and women all about?" it is, as you say, just what many hav pondered over and cannot see why. When we lost our dearest mother two years ago last September, how many such thoughts would come, and do yet, never to be answered!

I wanted to tell you how much we like your writings. I hav wanted to write you ever since we read the lecture of yours, "Where to Begin," in the Boston Investigator, and when we read such good things as your and L. K. Washburn's lectures, I do so long to be there in Paine Memorial Hall to hear and see the champions of freedom. It makes me feel almost homesick. I never hav heard a Liberal lecture, but hav read many, and that is much to feel thankful for; but I would like to see the very Liberals, and feel that at last we meet some of our kindred spirits and shake them by the hand, I am so proud of our Liberal lecturers and writers—but it is always a wonder to me how they know so much. I was born and brought up in a little, rough valley in Pennsylvania, seven miles from the Susquehanna river, and never went to any but the public school; but how dear the hills and valley are! I often think of the bright October woods where we gathered the hickory nuts, chestnuts, butternuts, and frost grapes and autumn leaves and ferns. Ma always kept the house decorated with them and the feathery clamatis and bitter-sweet berries. How I long for the old home sometimes! But if I was there all would be changed—the old home in strangers' hands, and the dear, loving mother gone! I should miss her more there where we always saw her. This world will never seem the same again, and we are never quite so happy; there seems to be a shadow over all our hearts, but we are happier now than most people, I believe, and try to liv for the living and not pine for the dead.

Our father is doubly dear to us now. Our father and mother hav been all the god we children ever knew, and they hav been Liberals in every sense of the word ever since before we were born. There are four of us, three girls and one boy, all scattered in the West. We came here in August, and are on claims in the woods. Pa livs with us, as his claim adjoins ours. I hav two girls, aged eight and three, and if one of them, or both, would turn out a Susan H. Wixon, E. L. Rose, E. D. Slenker, Annie Besant, or Frances Wright, I should be the proudest of mortals, but if they are good, honest, healthy women, I shall not complain.

You hav my heartfelt sympathy in your great affliction. Ever since I first read of your mother's death, I hav had a tender love and pity for you. I know from experience the heartaches and void.

The children and I are here alone now, as Mr. Graham and pa hav gone to the Columbia river, seven and a half miles, for work, and we are in the woods alone, where wildcats and cougars are plenty, but we don't go out after dark, and spend our time reading and working. It rains here most of the time.

I want to tell you about the children. While I was washing the dinner dishes they had got their dolls to sleep and had a long ride on the cars (the old lounge). I think Lou, the oldest, said they got off at Spokane Falls to get work. She came to my house and rapped on the door, when I told her, or them, to come in; and they wanted work. I asked Lou how much she wanted, and she said, "Five cents per day." I told her these were hard times, and there were so many idle and homeless that I thought if they got their board and clothes that would be better than nothing, so they agreed to work. Then I told Lou she should bring the night wood in, and I would do the dishes, so they sat down with papers to read, and Lou read, or pretended to read, about a little girl that was so naughty to her mother that she got whipped unmercifully, and finally made up her mind to be better and more cheerful, and not look so cross nor scold so; and the little girl Dorothy brought her ma some flowers, and they were happy. This story was taken from "Forenoon Faces," I suppose. She said at the end, "By Susan H. Wixon." Baby Gerty then repeated:

Ba ba bat seet, dot any wool?
Yessur, masser, fre bad foo;
One fo' a masser, one fo' a deem,
One fo' a little boy, sin in e leen.

And then read right on about, "Ma is a nassy dao [girl]; no, see, my ma is a dood dao," and laughed and said this all over and over, looking all the time on her paper. She went and took up her doll, and said, "Don't ty; I tate you and wead fo' you." She is on the lounge now with dolly. Now they are up and off for wood. Baby likes to help, and can bring quite an armful; it is raining, so Lou brings it to the door, and Gertie piles it up behind the stove.

We are poor and liv plainly, but we hav many things to be thankful for—plenty of wood, a dry house, if not very warm, and plenty to eat, such as it is. We miss a cow most of anything, and will hav one, if nothing happens, in the spring when feed comes. But we expected to rough it if we got a home of our own.

We are very thankful for the blessings, such as good health, the Investigator every week, etc.

A healthy body and a mind at ease,
And simple pleasures that always please.

With kind love, and wishes that you may liv long to do your good work,

Your friend and admirer,

Jennie Vose Graham.

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

Educational.—Aunty: "So you're studying Roman history, Robby? Why did Cæsar hesitate when he came to Rubicon?" Robby: "Oh, 'cause he wanted to see if he had the Gaul to cross it."

A widower married a second time, and his choice was a wealthy lady about fifty years of age. When the bride and bridegroom returned home from the wedding the husband, introducing the wife to the children, said: "My dear children, kiss this lady's hand. She is the new mother I promised to bring you." After taking a square look at the new mother, little Charlie said: "Pa, you hav been fooled. She ain't new at all!"

"Let us not cross the bridge before we get to it," says "Bill Arp," addressing those Southerners who feared the result of the election. "Not long ago a little girl, whose father lived by a creek, heard grandmother say with a sigh that her time was 'most out, and she would very soon hav to cross the river Jordan. Like a sweet little philosopher, she said: 'Well, never mind, grandma, I reckon you will find a foot-log there.'"

Little Flora, three years old, livs in the country, where pigs are numerous and are in the habit of rubbing or scratching themselvs against the fence or anything convenient. Flora saw one indulging in this one day, when she said: "Oh, mamma, there is another pig sharpening himself!"

Grandma is pretty well on in years, and time has left his marks in many wrinkles on her dear old face. Little Lucy was sitting in Grandma's lap the other day, and after a long, inquiring gaze asked, "Grandma, what makes your face all so mussed up?"

With References to the most Plain and Striking Self-Contradictions of the so-called Inspired Scriptures.

BY A. JACOBSON.

Third edition, carefully revised and enlarged.

Read the following extract from a letter by Ex-Rev. C. B. Reynolds:

"The 'Bible Inquirer' is better than a Concordance as a reference, to speedily find the teaching of the Bible, on any subject. It is a sledge-hammer in demolishing error, yet the most devout Bible-worshiper can find no cause of offense. Using no word of argument, it simply permits the Bible to destroy all faith in the Bible, by giving chapter and verse—word for word—showing its palpable absurdities and contradictions."

Every Liberal needs a copy for ready reference. As a pamphlet to loan to Christian friends, it is the most effectiv Iconoclast ever published.

THOUGHTS ON SCIENCE, THEOLOGY, AND ETHICS.

By JOHN WILSON, M.A.

The object of the book, as expressed in the preface, is to giv a correct sketch of the main lines of modern thought in small compass, and in language simple enough to be easily understood. In other words, it is a condensation of more voluminous writers, and classification of their definitions of science, theology, and ethics, and a statement of what belongs to each. As a text-book to clear thinking and logical reasoning, and a guide in forming scientific conclusions, this book is invaluable. The Literary Guide ranks it as "one of the foremost works of the present century;" while the Freethinker, in "heartily recommending it" as "simple and lucid in style, correct in thought, and ample in information," declares that it "is just the thing to put in the hands of a plain man who desires the best ideas on evolution in relation to science and ethics in a moderate compass."

THE STRUGGLE
FOR Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

Poetry.

Poems from Puck.

NEW YEAR.

O Happy New Year's day of yore,
To rich and poor a pleasure,
Your memory forevermore
Some old-time folks will treasure!
You still are dear to grandpapa—
A memory of Madeira
He drank the day when grandmamma
"Received" with Cousin Sarah.

He met her—sweet and guileless Eve—
The cup of love she proffered.
Her duty was but to receive;
She took what then he offered
And so they went their love-warmed way
Amid the snow a-falling—
The Cupid of our New Year's day
Is far too fine for "calling."

O happy New Year's day of yore!
Because we overdid you,
When now you knock upon the door
We haughtily forbid you.
Go, in your last gay pageant's tail
Good form and you are strangers—
E'en the "Fantastics" soon will fail—
Go, join the "Squarback Rangers."

And when you're gone, and gone for aye,
When your last horn has sounded,
And you are just a common day
By common days surrounded,
Perhaps, old friend, the very men
Who found your pleasures palling
Will vainly call you back again—
But you—
You let them do the calling!

BETWEEN THE DANCES.

Two waltzes? Yes. A polka? Yes. Another waltz—that's four;
And please do take a lanciers, Jack—well, then, there's nothing more—
But when I gave the rest away, you were not on the floor!

Four dances. Now, that isn't bad. Oh, yes; I did wait, dear!
I really thought you wouldn't come, and—other men were here:
I couldn't watch the door all night, in hopes that you'd appear.

What? No, indeed! Make Arthur giv his galop up to you?
And this third waltz? The poor dear boy, he only has these two—
(Your face is like a thunder cloud—oh, smile a little, do!)

And so you think I should not waltz with any other man,
Nor dance round dances—that's absurd; just reason, if you can,
And don't be such a jealous thing, and please don't break my fan.

Oh, yes! Of course, those other girls you mention will, no doubt,
Take pity on your lonely state, and try to help you out;
But I will not be jealous, dear. I will not scold nor pout!

Only—don't dance with Maud—you know that puts me on the rack;
You will? Then, you don't love me—(oh, here is my partner) Jack—

UNCLE SAM AND MISS CANADA.

UNCLE SAM:

O fair and frigid northern maid,
Excuse me if I woo
With a string, so to speak, tied 'round my heart,
To yank it back from you!

To tell the truth, I am not yet
Dead smitten with your charms—
But Erastus Wiman says I must Invite you to my arms.

And likewise Butterworth the bold
He giveth me the steer—
Though you ain't smit, nor me not a bit—
Come to my arms, my dear!

MISS CANADA:

I don't know that I've ever tried
Your heart to fascinate—
When I do, good sir, you'll snap that string—
In the interim, kindly wait!

UNCLE SAM (solus):

I'll take my banjo under my arm,
And I'll travel south alone;
And next time, my dear, I'll take my own steer,
When I seek you for my own.

Church Incidents Among the Bald Knobbers.

The stranger who visits Taney county, Mo., and talks to the Bald Knobbers, and to no one else, will gather the idea that the organization, if not exactly a lawful one, was wholly beneficent in its effects on the county. The Bald Knobbers say that their only acts in that county were the frightening of young Hervale, the lynching of the Taylor boys, and the procuring of a man to investigate the county books. They had intended to do more, but circumstances arose which, to their regret, prevented their doing anything more. They say they never whipped anyone, and never ordered anyone to leave the county. By this they mean that they never did these things upon a formal order by the chief Knobber and his council. They just did it informally. A gang of a suitable size for the job would get together and make matters uncomfortable for the citizen who was obnoxious to them, and then ride away and disperse.

Among the citizens who became obnoxious to the Knobbers were the Coggburn boys, sons of John Coggburn, at the time the master of the Masonic lodge of the county, and a man of excellent repute. The boys were good average boys, even according to the Bald Knobbers. Lots of Knobbers had boys quite as bad, and some had worse boys. Like all other Taney county boys, they carried concealed weapons, and sometimes fired their guns in the public highway, and yelled in cowboy fashion, contrary to the statute in such case made and provided. Worse than this, however, in the Bald Knobber mind, was their avowed hostility to that order. They even threatened to shoot if attacked. The Bald Knobbers determined to hav the boys arrested and punished for carrying concealed weapons and threatening the lives of citizens. A warrant was easily obtained, and a squad of Knobbers went with the officer to make the arrest. The boys resisted, and were victorious. A larger and more discreet squad got the drop on the Coggburns, and the two were taken before a magistrate and fined $25 each, which they paid. This was in the summer of 1885.

At about this time Captain Kinney, chief of the Bald Knobbers, made up his mind to try the gentle suasion of the Christian religion, in addition to the halter and revolver, in his efforts to promote the moral and intellectual growth of his neighbors. There never had been a Sunday-school in Taney county before 1885, and Captain Kinney organized the first one. It was at the Oak Grove church, not far from Forsyth. Captain Kinney was the superintendent. Among his pupils were the Coggburn boys. The Knobbers say the boys went there solely to scoff. The rest of the community deny this. The Coggburns say, however, that they did not see much religion or solemnity about a Sunday-school conducted by a man who had hanged two men unlawfully, shot no one knew how many more to death, and whose chief claim to respectability lay in the clearness of his vision when looking at the sins of others.

That the Coggburns acted irreverently is not disputed, and Robert Coggburn made blasphemous responses during the service. This was during the early and conservativ days of the organization, or both boys would hav been severely whipped before Monday morning.

A few weeks later a Sunday-school convention was held that lasted all day. The Coggburns had been warned to keep away, but they were not easily frightened. While everyone else there was dressed in store clothes, the Coggburns were in their shirt-sleeves. The boys carried no weapons themselvs, but their sisters and sweethearts carried several revolvers under their skirts for them to use in case "Old Kinney got mad at their little joke."

When Captain Kinney reached the church and opened the door, he found hanging on the inside a coat with a little coffin on it and a piece of paper with a rude sketch of a skull and cross-bones pinned beneath it. Inside of the coffin was a bit of paper directed "To Old Kinney," and marked within "Pizen" and "Death in his favorite role." A buckshot was wrapped in the paper.

The people crowded into the building, and Kinney showed the coffin and papers to everyone. The Coggburns snickered audibly. They called it a good practical joke on the Bald Knobber chief. Going to the pulpit, Captain Kinney pointed his finger at Andrew Coggburn, and said:

"The man who did that is here, and he will need a box before I do."

There was no claptrap about that. It was a promis that Kinney would kill Andy Coggburn at the first opportunity that, in Taney county ethics, would warrant the deed. Everyone so understood it, and had Coggburn shot Kinney dead at any moment thereafter, provided he did not shoot from the brush, that threat would hav cleared him before any Missouri court of justice. The threat proved to be a prophecy as well as a warning.

During the exercises of the morning Captain Kinney made the little coffin a text, and scorched the boys verbally for their sins. There was a novel spectacle at the afternoon services of this Sunday-school convention. Teachers and pupils came carrying loaded guns and revolvers in the right hand and the gospel in the left. There were two mottoes on the walls of the church. One read, "Peace on Earth and Good Will toward Men," the other, "God is Love." A double-barreled shotgun leaned against the wall beneath the first, and a Kentucky rifle, with broken stock that had been mended with wire, was beneath the other.

There were no converts made at this meeting.

"Of course we watched each other pretty closely as time went on when he was in the neighborhood," said Captain Kinney, in talking of the case afterward. Had this occurred in the Big Sandy region in Kentucky or West Virginia, one or the other would hav been shot to death from behind the brush. Business is not done in that way here. The Ozark mountaineer is not a coward by any means, although an occasional cowardly murder has been committed. Kinney and the Coggburns were of reckless courage.

They met at last after months of watchfulness, on the night of Feb. 28, 1886, at the same place—the Oak Grove church. Andrew Coggburn and Sam Snapp, a chum, were in attendance at the meeting. A Bald Knobber parson was in the pulpit preparing for the service. Seeing Coggburn there a Bald Knobber ran away to tell Deputy Sheriffs K. and M. Branson that Coggburn was there if they wanted to arrest him on a warrant they had for him for shooting at a man named Andrew Watson some time before. The Bransons were told that Coggburn was armed.

At this one of the Bransons sent his son to tell Kinney. The lad met Kinney a short distance away, and Kinney at once went home and got his revolver. There are two stories about what followed. The opponents of the Bald Knobbers say that Kinney sent in and called Coggburn out. The Knobbers say that Coggburn heard that Kinney was coming and slipped out with Sam Snapp, and lay in wait in the shadow of the building (it was a moonlight night) for the Knobber chief.

The undisputed facts are that Coggburn came out of the church with Snapp as Kinney was hitching his horse. Kinney walked toward the church door revolver in hand, while Coggburn walked out into the moonlight. Coggburn stepped to one side of the path and said aloud:

"Who is it?"

"Now's yer chance," said some one.

"Hold up your hands!" thundered Kinney, leveling his revolver.

Coggburn turned his left side partly toward the Knobber chief, threw up his left hand, and with his right drew his revolver. It was a lightning motion, but Kinney's finger was quicker. Pressing the trigger, the Knobber chief sent a bullet into Coggburn's left breast, through his heart and out under the right shoulder. The young man was leaning partly forward, but the impact of the bullet straightened him up, and over he went on his back, dead before he struck the ground. As he fell his revolver, thrown by his swaying right arm, flew from his grasp and struck on the gravel twenty feet away behind him.

The parson in the church was just giving out the first hymn. It began:

Sweet hour of prayer, sweet hour of prayer,
Thy wings shall my petition bear.

The sweet hour of prayer was interrupted by the report of Kinney's pistol, and a moment later Sam Snapp walked into the church with his hands up and the muzzle of Kinney's still smoking pistol close to his head. Kinney had held him up the moment Coggburn dropped.

"That was one of the most interesting passages of my life," said the Bald Knobber in speaking of the homicide afterward. He "came clear," as they say here, easily. A Bald Knobber justice of the peace impaneled a Bald Knobber coroner's jury. The Bald Knobber chief told his story, not defiantly over the butt of a shotgun, as his opponents hav since said, but in regretful tones as became a Sunday-school superintendent under the circumstances.

Sam Snapp was not called as a witness. He would not hav heard the call had it been made. He was not in the country. He had involuntarily become an assisted emigrant. The Knobbers provided the assistance.

The Knobber jury heard Kinney's story respectfully and sympathetically.

"He jest done had t'," said the Knobber justice when the recital was ended, and thereupon the Knobber jurors returned a verdict of justifiable homicide.

It is an interesting matter of fact that the Knobbers, many of whom were members of the Masonic order, were able to wield enough influence in the lodge to expel Worshipful Master John Coggburn from the order because he bitterly denounced the murder of his son and the acquittal of the murderer. The ties that bound the Bald Knobbers were stronger than the ties that bound the Masons in a land where Masons often do go afoot and barefoot because it is necessary to help a brother Mason.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this they will probably do so at once.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; [illegible] and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

BALAAM FINDETH THE LORD AND RECEIVETH INSTRUCTIONS.

And God met Balaam: and he said unto him, I hav prepared seven altars, and I hav offered upon every altar a bullock and a ram. And the Lord put a word in Balaam's mouth, and said, Return unto Balak, and thus thou shalt speak.—Num. xxiii, 4, 5.

Gems of Thought.

MAN paints himself in his gods.—Schiller.

GOD is a white sheet of paper which contains nothing save what thou hast written thereon.—Luther.

OUR ideas of God arise from reflecting on ourselvs, contemplating our own intellectual and moral qualities, and ascribing them to an imaginary being, beyond the range of the senses, and connecting this being with the operations of nature. Jupiter, a brave and amorous god, was a projection of the Greek mind. Jehovah, a partial, changeful, vindictiv being, was a representation of the Jewish mind in early times as faithful as though reflected from a mirror.—B. F. Underwood.

AN honest God is the noblest work of man.—Ingersoll.

THE primitiv uncultured man worshiped external objects in love and in fear, ascribing to them quasi-human powers and feelings. There is the germ of religion.—Frederic Harrison.

THE ideas of the divinity hav been created by the affections of the human heart; they became necessarily divided into two classes, according to the sensations of pleasure or pain, love or hatred: the powers of nature, the gods, the genii, were divided into beneficent and malignant. good and evil; and hence the universality of these two characters in all the systems of religion.—Volney.

THE historical progress of religion consists in this: that what by an earlier religion was regarded as objectiv is now recognized as subjectiv; that is, what was formerly contemplated and worshiped as God is now perceived to be something human. Man is seen to hav adored his own nature.—Feuerbach.

IN the ruder forms of savage life, we find the belief in witchcraft universal, and accompanied, in most instances, by features of peculiar atrocity. The reason of this is obvious. Terror is everywhere the beginning of religion. The phenomena which impress themselvs most forcibly on the mind of the savage are not those which enter manifestly into the sequence of natural laws and which are productiv of most beneficial effects, but those which are disastrous and apparently abnormal. Gratitude is less vivid than fear, and the smallest apparent infraction of a natural law produces a deeper impression than the most sublime of its ordinary operations. When, therefore, the more startling and terrible aspects of nature are presented to his mind, when the more deadly forms of disease or natural convulsion desolate his land, the savage derives from these things an intensely realized perception of diabolical presence. In the darkness of the night; amid the yawning chasms and the wild echoes of the mountain gorge; under the blaze of the comet, or the solemn gloom of the eclipse; when famin has blasted the land; when the earthquake and the pestilence hav slaughtered their thousands; in every form of disease which refracts and distorts the reason; in all that is strange, portentous, and deadly, he feels and cowers before the supernatural. Completely exposed to all the influence of nature, and completely ignorant of the chain of sequence that unites its various parts, he livs in continual dread of what he deems the direct and isolated acts of evil spirits. Feeling them continually near him, he will naturally endeavor to enter into communion with them. He will strive to propitiate them with gifts. If some great calamity has fallen upon him, or if some vengeful passion has mastered his reason, he will attempt to invest himself with their authority; and his excited imagination will soon persuade him that he has succeeded in his desire. If his abilities and his ambition place him above the common level, he will find in this belief the most ready path to power. By professing to hold communion with and to control supernatural beings, he can exercise an almost boundless influence over those about him; and, among men who are intensely predisposed to believe in the supernatural, a very little dexterity or acquaintance with natural laws will support his pretensions. By converting the terror which some great calamity has produced into anger against an alleged sorcerer, he can at the same time take a signal vengeance upon those who hav offended him, and increase the sense of his own importance. Those whose habits, or appearance, or knowledge, separate them from the multitude, will be naturally suspected of communicating with evil spirits; and this suspicion will soon become a certainty, if any mental disease should aggravate their peculiarities. In this manner the influences of ignorance, imagination, and imposture will blend and co-operate in creating a belief in witchcraft, and in exciting a hatred against those who are suspected of its practice, commensurate with the terror they inspire. In a more advanced stage of civilization, the fear of witches will naturally fade, as the habits of artificial life remove men from those influences which act upon the imagination, and as increasing knowledge explains some of the more alarming phenomena of nature.—Lecky in The History of Rationalism.

Notes and Clippings.

THIS is Cardinal Manning's idea of what his church is: "The Catholic church is not a mere vehicle for the propagation of a doctrin. It is a kingdom; an imperial power."

IT is said that Saxony furnishes the largest percentage of suicides of any civilized state. The number last year was 1,104, or one to about every 3,000 of the population. In 1881 the total number was 1,248.

THE Savannah News reflects: "The New York ministers hav been giving their views concerning the Sunday newspaper. They are opposed to it, almost to a unit. And yet the Sunday newspaper in New York seems to grow bigger every Sunday."

THE pope has published an encyclical in which he complains that the tendency of the age is toward material interests and that this tendency is strengthened by worldly pride, an evil press and drama, demoralization of the arts and a changed education in schools, Materialistic and Atheistic teaching obscuring true notions of right. Poor pope! It is a pity that the world won't let him run it!

ARCHDEACON MACKAY SMITH says, in Harper's Magazine: "The Sunday newspaper has arisen within a generation, one of the greatest dangers to the churches which hav ever threatened them. Every Sunday morning it takes the multitude of our towns up into a mountain, and displaying the treasures of the world, gathered with incredible pain, from every land, during the preceding week, says, 'All these will I giv thee, if thou wilt forsake the house of God to-day.' Pastors know the result only too well."

THE "Catholic Directory, Register, and Almanac for 1889," shows that the total of priests in England and Wales is 2,380, who serve 1,306 churches, chapels, and missionary "stations;" in Scotland there are 341 priests; the churches, etc., served by them being 423.

M. COQUELIN has been very much pleased with California. In fact, he likes the West better than the East. He says that the people are more broad-minded in San Francisco than in New York. The World thinks this is doubtless because the people of this city are all trying to walk in the strait and narrow path.

AT the opening of the Players' Club on Monday night Commissioner W. S. Andrews spoke of his experiences as an actor on the stage, and some of his friends who had seen his performances years ago expressed regret that he had left the dramatic profession. He had appeared chiefly in light comedy parts, but he had given signs of his ability to take up tragic roles and win success in them. But Mr. Andrews himself, who prefers politics to play-acting, says that no man can be a politician and an actor at the same time. W. S., as his relativs distinguish him, would hav made a great success as an actor, and has achieved considerable fame as a politician, and some fat offices. Samuel J. Tilden regarded him as one of the best of political organizers. He inherited a good deal of Stephen Pearl Andrews's intellectual shrewdness.

ONE of the most amusing things the editor of the Boston Courier has heard in relation to the recent election is the conversation which a gentleman overheard in the horse-cars on Saturday morning. A lady who had charge of getting voters to the polls in a Roxbury precinct was relating her experiences to a friend. "And there was Mrs. S.," she said. "She had moved into town after she registered, and of course she had to vote in Roxbury. So I took a carriage and went after her. First she said she'd go round the corner to a voting-place that was near, and when I told her she couldn't do that, she said then she wouldn't vote. Then I argued with her and told her it was her duty and all that sort of thing, and when she said she had no time, I said I had a carriage at the door, and so at last I persuaded her to come. But," she added, with feminin glee, "I didn't tell her she'd hav to go home in the horse-cars. That must hav made her mad, but I didn't care for that after she'd voted."

THE Pittsburgh Volksblatt procured for its issue of New Year's day brief dispatches from many governors concerning the condition of things in their respectiv states and territories. They are mainly in one strain, and that is the exultant strain. Governor Taylor says that Tennessee is "on top of a rolling wave of prosperity;" Governor Adams says that Colorado has just passed through the most "prosperous year in her history;" Governor Lee says that the "rapid development of the resources of Virginia points to a new era of prosperity;" Governor Taft says that Rhode Island is "confident of the prosperity of her industries;" Governor Perry says that Florida is "making marvelous advancement;" Governor Riggs says that Delaware is "prosperous and happy;" Governor Leslie says that Montana "has the brightest and most prosperous outlook;" Governor Semple says that Washington territory will soon be "the richest commonwealth on the Pacific," and so it goes to the end of the chapter, according to the Volksblatt's dispatches from the states of the North and South, East and West.

THE Mirror prints this apostrophe to Cuba by Colonel Ingersoll: "Nearly four centuries ago Columbus, the adventurous, in the blessed island of Cuba, saw happy people with rolled leaves between their lips. Above their heads were little clouds of smoke. Their faces were serene, and in their eyes was the autumnal heaven of content. These people were kind, innocent, gentle, and loving. The climate of Cuba is the friendship of the earth and air, and of this climate the sacred leaves were born. The leaves that breed in the mind of him who uses them, the cloudless, happy days in which they grew. These leaves make friends and celebrate with gentle rites the vows of peace. They hav given consolation to the world. They are the companions of the lowly, the friends of the imprisoned, of the exiled, of workers in mines, of fellers of forests, of sailors on the desolate seas. They are the givers of strength and calm to the vexed and wearied minds of those who build with thought and dream the temples of the soul. They tell of hope and rest, they smooth the wrinkled brows of care, drive fears and strange misshapen dreads from out the mind, and fill the heart with rest and peace. Within their magic warp and woof some potent, gracious spell imprisoned lies, that when released by fire doth softly steal within the fortress of the brain and bind in sleep the captured sentinels of care and grief. These leaves are the friends of the fireside, and their smoke, like incense, rises from myriads of happy homes. Cuba the smile of the sea."

First Principles.

There is very great difficulty in accepting the theory that there ever was a creator of what we call temporal things, at least such a creator as the "Jehovah" of the so-called holy writ. In fact, after much study of the situation, viewing it from every conceivable standpoint, I am forced to the conclusion that neither the great solar, or other systems, the vegetable, animal, or mineral kingdoms, are the result or product of any personal, spiritual, or other being, or of any intelligent sympathetic cause, but that everything belonging to either system or kingdom is the necessary temporary result of an unsympathetic, natural, unalterable law, of modalic essence. That all things are temporal only, so far as this earth and, perhaps, many other planets are concerned, and that they are only the "fungi" of the "ego"—the great eternal, all-prevailing principle, governing all things, itself an unsympathetic Law per se. Some one will say, Who made the Law? To which we reply, Laws are never made—never were made—they are modalities, or first principles, and always were, always will be, the same. We sometimes discover some distinct feature of the ego principle, or law of "the self," and accept it, or declare upon it, as being law. These laws permeate our social compact, and by the use of our intelligence we discover them, or think we do, but sometimes are mistaken, which we will call antagonizing the true principle; we finally discover the error and repeal the supposed law. But there are certain laws of which we hav no control; they are uncontrolable by any agency or power, for they are of the ego. When we accept this theory, everything is in harmony; without it, all is confusion and discord. This law of the ego justifies itself by the result. It has no moral quality. Morals are temporal and local; a certain act is moral here and immoral there, moral there and immoral here, this being governed by the education and circumstances of each particular case. We insist that none of the modalities, or first principles, or laws, are subject to the caprice of any will or power.

Let us examin a few of them by the light of our intelligence. Take the law of the divisibility of matter, applying it to an imaginary entity—i.e., an apple exactly divided would make two equal pieces; multiply them by saying twice one are two, and you hav the whole of the law and the apple. This law was always as you find it. Through all the dim vista of inexhaustible eternity it was always the same—semper idim.

Jehovah could not change that law any more than your school-teacher could—more than you could. Take any other of the modalities and you find them idim sonans. Gravitation, for instance. You may imagin a time, perhaps, when there was nothing to gravitate to, but still there was the law, waiting to perform its office. The law of specific gravity, the law of space, the law of force, of decomposition and absorption, the allies of the law of force, are all the same and utterly incapable of change, always requiring a given result, always obtaining that result. There has never been furnished us an authenticated circumstance of any suspension of any of these modalities, and, notwithstanding all the miracles of the Bible, each and every one of them is predicated upon some violation of these laws. I maintain that the commonest dictum of reason givs them the lie, and our experience furnishes the proof of the error.

Under these laws let us examin into the possibilities of a Jehovah with the attributes and powers given, or rather accorded, him by Moses, and by him called "Jesus Christ." We will first examin his creativ capacity. In the first place, his own existence merits our attention. They make him to say: "Before anything was, I am." One of the unalterable modalities is that whatever exists, exists upon some law or principle. Then the principle upon which Jehovah existed was before him, as he could not, from a non-existent state, hav created the principle upon which to liv, any more than the boy could lift himself by the straps of his boot, which is another law of force which he is unable to change. The law of space also; let us try and think of a time when there was no space, and speculate as to where Jehovah was while he was creating a place to put himself, and this creativ epoch will look chimerical in the extreme. The Bible student shuts his eyes at all this and looks only to the gentility with which he may maintain himself quite easily through life, and commences his study at a more advanced condition of things, to wit, a garden of Eden in a little corner of Asia. Well, let us go there and help him fix things in shape for investigation aided by a little fair reasoning. But here we come in contact with another of those stubborn laws that seems to spend all its force among the temporal conditions of every kind, and will admit of no interference from any source, and seems to laugh the smile of derision at the suggestion of sympathy. This law of which we now speak all Bible authorities from the Ulema down to Moses say the Jehovah made; they say it is a beautiful conglomeration of his wisdom, mercy, justice, and love. We mean the law of personal antagonism, in obedience to which all of the larger, more powerful, more subtle, more intelligent specimens of temporality, animal and vegetable, hav since the creation by Jehovah been mercilessly devouring each other in a selfish desire to sustain in turn their own lives. The quintessence of this law is, that first, change of form, or evolution, is the law of temporalities, and this law seems so closely related to the eternal ego as to be a part of its ramifications or activ principle, and makes the condition of life depend upon a previous death, which in reality is merely a change of conditions, the one as desirable as the other, when we come to fully understand the effect. And to this law no creature, animal or vegetable, has ever interposed the slightest protest, except it be in those instances where the resulting change has been artificially produced or hastened, and thereby operates to suspend another intermediate law, that of purpose and design (let some one snap bait at this), from which we get still another law, that of self-preservation.

After a vain and tedious attempt to accept the legal inconsistency hurled by Moses at the law of matter and its capability of divisibility, we lay down as silly the proposition that from a choice selection of nothings, with no space in which to place them, Jehovah made a great quantity of material somethings possessing all kinds of properties, qualities, and conditions, and gave them names in the tongue of Moses, such as sun, moon, stars, seas, land, etc., all of which was of the most momentous nature, yet Jehovah did not deem it of sufficient importance to giv it a record until the lapse of over five hundred years.

After regulating the days and nights and the seasons, then comes the proposition, "Let us make man," for the purpose of dominion over the cattle of the field, and the beasts of the forest, the fishes in the sea, and for the purpose of husbandry and the praise and glory of his maker. Adam and Eve were, as the story goes, the first product of this resolve, and they came forth in all purity and virgin loveliness, naked as a ramrod, knowing neither good nor evil—and of course were not ashamed, as they did not understand all of their functions which Jehovah had implanted within them—and they were placed in the garden of Eden to dress it, where the poet Milton finds them joyfully acquiescing in their dual necessity, of which they were denounced by their creator and their God, whose purpose it was that they should only liv upon the fruits that grew therein, and upon other trees than that of knowledge of good and evil. It was the evident design of Jehovah that his two only children should liv forever in a state of benighted ignorance of good and evil; and as these heads embrace about all there is to know, Adam and Eve—to brush away the figure—were destined to go down the vast stretch of eternity with abject ignorance their only companion. Suppose that this plan had been carried out to the letter, and the figure of the forbidden fruit left out of the chapter, would that important factor in the character of Jehovah, mercy, hav remained intact? By no means. If the record is true—and it is, in the law of this case—the beasts, the cattle, the fishes, had been given to this virgin pair for food, which involved their agony in death. Where was the attribute of infinit mercy, which would hav averted the agonies of a painful death? In our feeble way of thinking, the merest smattering of mercy would hav abolished the law of personal antagonism, if that law were under the control of Jehovah; or, in the absence of such control, and in the combined exercise of wisdom and mercy, these innocent victims might hav been so constituted as to hav been incapable of enduring or suffering pain, and the same purpose hav been accomplished independent of the law of self-preservation. But charity suggests that we excuse Jehovah on the grounds that the educational advantages of Moses's day were too meager to admit of his acquisition of the necessary erudition to enable him to get up a more plausible story, or a record that would bear the investigation of a race of philosophers whose advent he knew not of.

But here is a harder nut to crack, and I hav wished it could hav been thrown out as a bait for some Ulema of theology, theocracy, and theogony, on either side of the sea. We learn from the holy writ, and from every orthodox pulpit in the land, that pain, sickness, and death, with all their concomitant evil attendants, are the resulting consequence in the human family of the disobedience of Adam and Eve in eating the forbidden fruit in the garden. In justification of the entailed punishment we are also taught that from this one act of disobedience of Adam and Eve all other sins sprang, and which hav been handed down from generation to generation, while we in our turn transmit them to our children that—in the praise of God, I suppose—they may not be lost to posterity. Here we get our moral qualities, which are of mental origin, and under the physical law are good or bad according to our brain quality, location and condition, which rule holds good in all of the lower order of animals. We find that we are possessed of three leading moral qualities—love, hate, selfishness. The first two are regulated by the law of affinity, the latter by the law of personal antagonism. All crimes and lesser sins may be properly attributed to hate and selfishness. For indulgence in these sins, then, we are under the curse of Jehovah since Eve took the apple. Now let us return to the lower branch of the animal kingdom. From the most vicious and dangerous to the most docil, in water, air, land, forest, or plain, every individual, species, or genus possesses these same leading moral qualities, and is vicious and dangerous, tame or docil, as these qualities predominate. With due allowance for the correctness of the deductions of Darwin, neither disputing nor accepting him here, it is not supposable that at the time of taking the forbidden fruit by Adam and Eve there was such sanguineous affinity between the human family, or the first sinful pair thereof, and the lower order of the animal kingdom, as to admit of a transmission to the cattle, fishes, birds, and beasts of these three moral qualities or deformities, whereby pain, sickness, and death became a just penalty to them under precisely the same circumstances and conditions in which these penalties were visited upon the actual sinners, Adam and Eve. If Adam and Eve were disobedient a suitable penalty might be justified, but why punish the unborn descendants? And still another why. If it is true that all pain, sickness, and death is the direct sequence of the sin of Adam, why in the name of justice and mercy were these consequences visited upon the fishes of the sea, the birds of the air, and the cattle of a thousand hills? They had not sinned; there was no apple in their crop. These things may not be reconciled with wisdom, mercy, and justice, much less truth, therefore either Moses and all others who wrote of these things were wrong, or Jehovah was unjust, cruel, and knew not mercy, and was himself a lawbreaker to the law of right and equity. Leaving Jehovah out of the case and looking to the law, the great ego principle, as the cause and source of all temporal conditions, we hav no trouble, meet with no inconsistencies. For instance, under the activ principle of the ego, in a prehistoric age there were certain resulting conditions favorable to animal organizations. Protoplastic affinity being a law or principle of the ego, by absorption of one minute animal entity, another of a little higher order caused thousands of instant deaths and instant lives (just the same as we are doing today to sustain our own lives—millions of them in air and water), resulting in the formation of higher organizations. Varying conditions caused varied results, such as shape, size, kind, and quality, among all of which, when they had arrived at a perfected temporal state, we find they all possess intelligence in a graded degree, suited and necessary in every case for their self-preservation in their temporal condition, and here it stops. They all hav a common destiny, which is a restoration through the law of decomposition and change to the original self, the ego. When we dispense with the error of punishment beyond this life, the more intelligent animal, man, when his organization is worn out by natural wear and tear, will also recognize the mortuary condition to be as desirable as any, and he will no more think of offering a protest to the demands of the ego than the birds of the air, or the fishes of the sea, or the cattle of a thousand hills. Oh, die like a horse! some one will say. Yes, if you are equal to the occasion. You, like the faithful horse bearing the scars of a cruel master, abnormal causes and effects being avoided, the mental and physical organization having gradually yielded to the law of friction and combustion, will think no more of a protest at the legal process of dissolution than at the protoplastic process of formation, since it is all the property and law of the ego. Some one asks, Is there no punishment for the wicked? I answer, No; there are no wicked people, except as we declare them to be such by the local temporary law of our social compact. I might in turn ask you what you mean by wickedness. Is it when some one has done so nething you don't like? Your likes or dislikes might not affect the equity of the act you complain of. Has some one done what you would not hav done to him or her? Maybe what you would not do to your neighbor is just the thing you should do. Has a horse kicked you? there are so many theories upon which to justify the horse that I will leave this matter to you. If you had learned of Pope, you would hav known that "all that is is right," and you would then see that it is not wicked or sinful to do right. But you demur at the law Pope laid down, or rather discovered, but never analyzed. This is because you do not understand legal propositions, and that law is a modality and cannot be changed, and is therefore right, and the results of the law are also right.

You ask if it would be right for me to kill my mother, my best friend on earth. Most certainly it would. But your trouble will be to get the law upon which to act just at the time I giv my consent to the killing, and you cannot do it unless the conditions are lawful. If you think I am mistaken, try it, and you will see I am right and your mother safe, unless you are insane. Here is another line of proof of the correctness of this theory, under the law of gravitation. There is an apple on a tall tree and rain in the distant cloud. You want the apple—not the Adamic apple—to eat, and the rain to water the plants and to drink. The law of gravitation gets you both, and you say this is right, though the law has not considered your case at all in the matter and was not in sympathy with your want, but, in fact, was entirely indifferent as to whether you were drowned by the water or poisoned by the apple. Mrs. Jones's child, just large enough to get up to the attic, went over the open scuttle to the roof of the house. Losing its balance, it fell and was killed. The law of gravitation would hav but one result, viz., that the child should fall to the earth. It was not in sympathy with the child or its frantic mother. It cared nothing for the future possibilities of the child—whether it might be the instrument for the conversion of one or a thousand souls to the faith of Christ or Jehovah. Nor would the law hav been offended if the father had opportunely appeared upon the scene and caught the innocent and saved it alive. The law would not be tampered with, and had all the prayers, offerings, and sacrifices from the day of Adam to the moment the child began to yield to the law which compassed its destruction, been directed as a unit of appeal to Jehovah, either for the suspension of the law of gravitation or for a change in the law of the physical organization of the child to meet successfully the contingencies, the result would hav been the same. When the child fell a brick was also loosened from a pilaster and the same law brought it to the ground. It incidentally struck soft ground upon the end, and, the law of resistance being equal to the conditions, the brick was preserved intact. Be it said to the credit of the Jehovah of Moses, the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, he was not there, and was wholly ignorant of the circumstance, which he was also powerless to prevent.

The thief robs us by a law of his moral organization, caused by predominant selfishness and inertia or indisposition to activity. He acts in direct obedience to the blended qualities of his mental and moral organization. The law of self-preservation on our part prompts us to provide a temporal law, social in its nature, to restrain the thief by a penalty—which, in justice, must be only temporary, for he has committed only a violation of a temporal law, as to us, while he acted in obedience to the law of his make-up. Some one says he was a free-will agent, knew good from evil, and voluntarily chose the evil, "because the carnal heart is at enmity with God." But you are mistaken in this also, for there is no such thing as free-will agency. If you desire proof of this, try and exercise your free will to believe that three times two are eleven, or while some deluded or hypocritical priest is preaching a funeral fraud over your dead child try to whistle "Yankee Doodle" or "Rory O'More" and feel indifferent to the lovely babe. By these experiments you will demonstrate that you can not exercise free will in those cases where the subject-matter is of vital or serious importance—such, for instance, as being contrary to the force or law of reason, of love, of hate, of self-protection. Let the law of reason, of love, be wanting in its apprehension, as in case of a non compos, and the whistling at the funeral, or that three times two are a hundred, are quite possible. Did you ever see an innocent babe under an acute attack of cholera infantum or diarrhea, unable to lisp its mother's name, much less to make complaint of the racking pain it must endure, but knows not why, until its precious life is tortured out by some abnormal condition? I hav heard a lying priest, with saintly voice, tell the bereaved mother, who gladly would hav borne thrice o'er the pain and suffering of her darling child, that God in his infinit mercy had sent this dire affliction upon the child to draw the mother to him, "for whom he loveth he also chasteneth," which caused me to regret that indeed there was no hell for such as he. In this case also an unsympathetic modalic law was doing a work under conditions where a temporal physical law had been violated by some superinducing cause, against which error to the physical law there came the protest of pain. Whosoever charges such a case to even a mythical God has so violated a sense of justice and mercy by his ignorance that his final pardon could hardly be expected, unless he began repentance very early in life, with a license for eternity. There are in the Bible very many essential truths, but they were true before they were placed there, and receive no strength by being there; and to burn every Bible in the land would not destroy or alter them, for they are modalities or first principles, and had all been recognized as such long before they were thus made the subject of plagiarism. It has long been a conundrum to me why so much that is unprofitable and filthy can be tolerated in a book of its pretensions, to the exclusion of what inspiration might hav furnished with great profit to mankind. But as inspiration has otherwise been satisfactorily disposed of by other writers time and again, I will leave this matter to the reflection of the credulous. There are many other vital propositions, of both Mosaic and gospel economy, that invite careful and candid scrutiny, and which are now receiving a generous share of Liberal, intelligent investigation, to which they yield their essence of truth, as a morning fog in the presence of the regal sun. Some Opinions on Liberalism.

The general principles of Liberalism are right. They are easily proved. Every fact in nature is a testimony against church dogmas and creeds. As a whole the facts of history furnish evidence against church organization. Yet organized Liberalism makes slow progress. Why?

The church is well equipped for war. Her social and business influence is a thousand times more than a match for our arguments—facts. She makes it a social and financial object for men and women to pay tribute to her. It is in her power to injure those who refuse to do so. Where necessary she uses that power. Against such power and influence right, justice, and truth are of little moment. The majority of people never reason beyond dollars and cents. Church theology and church organization are not the same. We see very few pious or even religiously inclined people, but many who want to be called Christians. Men do not fear the hell of theology, but organized church power they do fear.

The church is constantly doing little things to attract people. It builds up its power by catering to the weakness of human nature. The influence of music, women, and social gatherings are its elements of strength; the preaching is of little or no account. Not one in twenty of the average church-goers discusses the sermon, but nine-tenths of them can remember all the social appointments announced from the pulpit. The best minister of an orthodox church is not the man of great ability and learning, but the one of great social qualities, of whom the ladies will say, "Isn't he lovely!" Efforts made against Christian belief are in a great measure lost; the efforts that count are those directed against the organization. In Liberalism the church has but a feeble opponent. At best it is an unequal fight, but the odds might be reduced. Liberalism has been so long showing up the follies of religion, etc., that it has not found time to criticise itself. A battle cannot be won by simply attacking the weak points of the enemy; our own weak points want to be strengthened. It is important that we look to ourselvs, and tell our faults right out "in meetin'." The word Infidel is not a good one; its use is a detriment to the cause. Referring to it in a public address, the writer used about the following language: "I hav thought the epithet Infidel might be made popular as the name of the great movement in religion that is to lift the human race from the slums of error, and place it on a basis where knowledge and not belief will guide its destinies; but am now satisfied that the prejudice against 'Infidel' is too deep-rooted to be overcome, and for the good of the cause shall discontinue its use." We can throw this word overboard to the advantage of our cause, and not sacrifice a single principle. Let us avoid its use, and employ the better and more popular term Liberal. Many will acknowledge themselvs Liberals who shun the idea of Infidelity.

Many of our Liberal writers do not treat Spiritualism with proper respect. Spiritualists are Liberals. They are progressiv, and can always be depended on as anti-church people. We need strength. Lose sight of their theories regarding spirit return; that is not all there is to Spiritology. Extend the hand of Liberal friendship. Do not be guilty of saying, "Thou lunatic," for there is a chance that they may be right. If they are, the great principles of our reform will not be injured thereby.

Unthinking men and women judge of the merits of a cause chiefly by the men who are its leaders or advocates. Thus the church takes great pride in pointing out the good and prosperous leaders in the church. This is not argument, but it has more weight than a thousand sermons on the masses who are not capable of reasoning. Its force is doubled if a comparison fails to show equally substantial men in the Liberal ranks. Now, the church is strong and can stand the strain of a great many drawbacks. She has her dishonest preachers, deacons, etc., and the prayer-meeting always brings out a crop of cranks. But she is not troubled thereby. But among Liberals, few in number, a bad egg spreads its disagreeable odor over us all; and much to our hurt. I remember but one or two Liberals of any prominence who hav proved dishonest. Our record is clear in that respect.

Religion develops lunatics and cranks in great numbers, but Liberals do not set them up as representativ Christians; while the church always makes a great splurge over an unbalanced Liberal. They make him appear at his worst, and claim him as a representativ of the cause. It goes that way among the people, much to our reproach.

A word further on this subject. Cranks are generally made by getting one particular idea into their brain and harping on it so much that they lose interest in everything else. Then, also, men often take up some theory which seems so plain to them that they think the world only needs its attention called to it and it will adopt it. They promulgate it; try to reform the world; the world doesn't reform, but laughs the reformer to scorn—treats him with derision. His idea is perverted, motiv misunderstood, character maligned. He essays to defend himself, talks extravagantly and without judgment, broods over his wrongs, imagins he is a great reformer, begins to adopt all kinds of uncouth theories, and almost before he knows it develops into a modern crank. Now, if such men, as is often the case, make Liberalism a hobby, they do so to its everlasting injury. They prevent many people from joining the ranks. To lose them would be gain. They hav the right to advocate their peculiar idea. They can please their fancy with the thought that they are great reformers; but morally they hav no right to giv the impression that the ideas they hav form any part of the great principles of anti-churchism. Liberals should make an effort to keep such men under cover. Make them think they were born "five hundred years too soon," when in fact they belong to the Shaksperean age—anything to keep them quiet—unless they cease to associate their anti-modern theories with advanced Liberalism.

As I hav said, we hav but little to fear from church creed or Christian belief, but everything to fear from their organization.

We hav a great battle to fight with that. We hav just one point to assault that promises a victory for us. Our entire force must be concentrated on this one issue. That this issue is presented to us is lucky, because it makes it necessary for Liberals to unite on a single issue—the one thing we need. The Blair bill is a desperate attempt by the church to attach itself to the government. Such a thing never has been attempted in the United States before; and the traditions, the spirit and letter, of our Constitution being radically opposed to it, it hardly seems possible that the bill can become a law. Yet a fight must be made against it; and it is a great opportunity for Liberalism to form an organization that will become popular. Rightly managed, "The flag above the cross" can be made the popular battle-cry the country over.

Organization for some special object, with due regard to social requirements, will accomplish more in one year than ten years of disorganized, hit-and-miss arguments on a thousand different subjects. I do not mean to exclude the minor matters, but, having a chief object to be attained, keep it as the rallying-point. Now, as a closing summary, I set down the following as necessary for the progress of our cause:

1. The word Infidel must be expunged from our vocabulary.
2. The friendship and coöperation of Spiritualism must be courted.
3. The cranks must be controled.
4. The creeds of the church must be left to die of their old age, and our efforts directed against the organization.
5. Our organization must be more thorough—with some live issue—some definit object to be attained.

A LIBERAL.

Worcester, Mass.

Foreign Items from the London "Freethinker."

Christianity in Spain resists all the efforts of the Liberal government to render it tolerant. A Jesuit father at the head of twenty Catholic students has attacked an agent of the Bible Society at Biscay, and seized his Bibles, Testaments, and tracts, which were then torn up and consumed in a holy bonfire. The Spanish judges decline to deal with the case. While Protestants are treated thus, journalists are sentenced to penal servitude for criticising the state religion. Who says that Christianity does not make men fair and just and brotherly in their conduct toward each other?

Both the candidates of the London Secular Federation for membership in the school boards hav been defeated, and we are not altogether surprised, although we expected a better polling. Freethinkers hav—we regret to say it—been so long unused to work together for anything practical, that it will require more than one such struggle to bring them into line.

Mrs. Besant, we are glad to say, is returned for the Tower Hamlets at the top of the poll. We rejoice at it, but we can not regard it as simply a Freethought victory. Mrs. Besant's candidature has turned on many other questions than Secular education. She was recommended by the daily News, the Star, and the Pall Mall Gazette. The Radical clubs favored her as a politician. Above all, perhaps, there was Mrs. Besant's personal popularity and her womanhood, which is at present a distinct advantage. We frankly admit, however, that a good deal of Mrs. Besant's success must hav been due to the energy with which she fought the election, and the wide publicity which a good subscription enabled her to secure. Anyhow, Mrs. Besant is in. So is her friend, the Rev. S. D. Headlam. Both are in favor of Secular education, and we look forward with great interest to their work on the London school board. Mrs. Besant is a woman of great ability and energy, and she can do drudgery as well as make eloquent speeches. Mr. Headlam is more easy-going, but he is an honorable man who may be counted on to redeem his pledges.

The French clericals are much annoyed at the Paris municipality having ordered the cross to be taken off the Pantheon, late the church of Sainte Genevieve. But this is only part of the secularization which was decreed at the time of Victor Hugo's death. The cross had been only permitted to remain on account of its extreme hight. It is understood that the remains of Gambetta and possibly also of Blanqui will be removed to the Pantheon.

Our high church and conservativ journals continually speak of the French republic putting the clericals in the same category with other citizens as persecution. M. Lemoine points out that it is nothing of the kind, and that it was only by sheer and unmistakable persecution that popery was got rid of in England. The clericals hav never returned to power without reënacting their old persecuting laws, and were Englishmen in the place of Frenchman, they would doubtless put a wholesome restraint on the ancient mother church.

Brother Smith's is the kind of an Epistle from a Corinthian we are most happy to receive, holding that it is more worthy to be incorporated in the grand gospels of common sense than both of Paul's, giving evidence of a gentleman of culture, a student of history on whom its lesson is not lost, and a Liberal of broad ideas of nature and humanity. He writes:

Inclosed send draft on New York for $20, for Campaign Fund of the American Secular Union. Under a misapprehension of the time of the meeting of the late congress I did not send my communication quite soon enough to reach you at Pittsburgh. I am one of the few who hav never changed my opinions, having, like J. S. Mill, always regarded the "modern as I did the ancient religions, as in no way concerning me." I am aware that it is no easy task to combat the errors and superstitions resulting from education, tradition, and example. But the sentinels round about the posts of liberty must exercise unceasing vigilance in order to avert the calamity which has befallen the downtrodden millions of Europe, Asia, and Africa, who are being crushed by the iron heel of despotism.

Yours respectfully, WILLIAM C. SMITH.

My good friend S. D. Moore, a sturdy Secularist, whose seventy-six eventful years hav not cooled his ardor for liberty—for his brain is as clear and his heart responds as patriotically as when he championed the antislavery cause—enrolls among those Americans who do not propose to be ruled and duped by myths and dreams. Brother Moore is delighted with the work of the congress, the setback Brother Wolff gave the Sabbath Association, and believes that the American Secular Union is completing the true foundation of American freedom, and declares:

I must renew my stock in this noble work of complete Secularization and keep watch on these Christian meddlers, that they get no more unconstitutional laws palmed off on the American people. . . . That movement in reference to taking Girard College out of the hands of these meddlers meets my most hearty approbation. I feel that the congress was fortunate in putting at its head such a worthy and able leader as R. B. Westbrook. I trust that he, in company with Mr. Ingersoll, will giv this matter a thorough canvassing, so as to be able to meet the shabby plans the church party will muster up. Then those who hav a regard for justice and the rights of individuals will come solidly together to support this movement and hav the college where Stephen Girard willed it to be.

Yours ever for truth and right, S. D. MOORE.

John D. Powers stands as firm as the granit hills of his nativ Vermont for Secular justice, and though surrounded by superstition, can be depended on to keep our banner bright. He did not forget the American Secular Union when sending for his holiday presents to our jeweler treasurer at Rochelle, a circumstance which I know would make Brother Wettstein as proud as though it were for himself. For the American Secular Union is the "crown jewel" with both these gentlemen.

From the sparkling Southern orator and brave Texan Secularist, J. D. Shaw, of Waco, we are in receipt of a contribution of $5 worth of his able pamphlets, "The Bible—What is it?" "The Divinity of Christ," "Studies in Theology," "A Myth Exposed," and a renewal of our subscription to the Independent Pulpit, which is booming the Secular campaign as a political movement, and is growing brighter every issue. May Brother Shaw liv long and prosper, is the sincere desire of the secretary.

Owen Thomas Davies is another life member who openly maintains his Liberal convictions, and—more, much more—sustains them, too. In that beauteous garden of the world, California, nature seems to lure men from the solemn absurdities of the past, and they become ardent lovers of liberty. The name reminds us forcibly of for it is of decidedly Welsh flavor, and if Mr. Davies possesses the sterling characteristics of that hardy race, we can hav no more valuable ally.

Arthur and Merlin of yore,
Of Griffith, of Conan, and Owen Glendour,

Brother Pepper has kept his nurseries for thirty years in Petaluma, and the place and occupation are suggestiv of buds and blossoms, of luxurious flowers and fruit-laden vines, and when to this is added that inimitable climate which we hear so much about, it is little wonder that the genial spirit of justice asserts itself where intellect abides.

From Portland Friend Neunert sends generous words and substantial aid. He is a stalwart iconoclast who is every ready to stand by our colors.

As the first contribution the present secretary received from a Union was, I believe, from San José, he has a warm regard for that activ host, at the head of whom are Mr. and Mrs. Schwartz. We are as grateful for their confidence as their assistance.

Emmetts is most fortunate, for Vice-President Wardwell is full of splendid enthusiasm, having built a fine hall entirely alone, and will donate it to the Liberals if they will organize and make a success. Surely there ought to be an awakening. O that some good Liberal would do that in this city! Brother Wardwell promptly redeems pledges made to his friend Putnam by Liberals whose names are given above, and promises to do what he can in future for the cause, and would giv $100 a year toward keeping a lecturer in his neighborhood who is not a crank, for he remarks: "A Liberal crank is worse than a preacher crank." Jas. Wardwell is determined the flag shall tower above the cross. To his generous associates we tender our grateful salutations.

In Frederick, Md., it seems there are still those who, like Barbara Freitchie, possess the pluck to defiantly shake the flag in the face of ecclesiastical rebels. However, we prefer that

Peace and order and beauty draw
Round the symbol of light and law,
And ever the stars in love look down
On Aaron Davis of Fredericktown.

Brother Conley is the kind of man from which heroes are made. He writes: "We hav a hard fight for our right to life, liberty, and happiness, but if we lose, the smoke of battle will obscure from view the taunting jeers of priestcraft over our defeat. They may take our lives, but our liberty—never!"

In San Pasqual Brother Rockwood is our standard-bearer, and bravely stands the brunt of the battle. There will be no retreat at that point.

Utah is looming up in the fight for liberty, and may soon be the banner state or territory of Secularists. A faithful friend of our cause there is Charles de la Baume.

Fresno's activ friend of Freethought is Joseph Lee, and he does not propose to giv up to ministerial dictation.

At Volo, Ill., headed by Brother Howard, Messrs. Russell and Tiffany form our "band of hope," and a right royal trinity they are. The amount they forwarded was a New Year's gift for the secretary, but I know they will excuse me if I turn it in to the Campaign Fund. My sincere salutations to this splendid trio.

Friend Corbet is anxiously watching the progress of mental liberty. He is a great reader, a deep thinker, and always willing to aid the cause to the extent of his means. We are going to wake up Minneapolis soon.

W. O. Williams is enthusiastic for reform, and often enlightens the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER as to the status of affairs in his locality. He will keep the flag floating.

Henry McElsander, of Eagle Creek, even if the current is not favorable is perfectly willing to pull against the stream in bringing up the forces of freedom.

Katie Kehm is the brilliant young pagan "schoolmarm" of Iowa, who is thinking of entering the lecture field. From all reports she certainly would win fame, if not fortune. She is worthy of both.

The philosopher and writer of Ogden is our earnest ally John A. Jost. His work evidences the higher inspiration of humanity.

Chas. Crane, president of the Utah Wool Growers' Association, has no use for the churches, and though an importer of fine Merinos, does not take any stock in the lamb's book of life. Wm. Reynolds, of Wanship, is gathering them in.

Brother Leitch is a worthy worker who puts his shoulder to the wheel in his Wisconsin community.

Wm. Luke Gallup is another Golden state Secularist whom every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER well knows. He sends words of cheer and aid.

Brother Brewer is another careful student, radical, but not iconoclastic. He forwards $1 for the Girard College redemption fund.

A. D. Cornwell, of Bristol, is one we are glad to greet, as he is not afraid to express his opinion, and certainly is willing for others to do likewise. An honest man is always welcome.

Brother Geeting's new home is at McKeesport. He will be remembered as the representativ of our cause at Washington, Indiana. To all these friends we bid a Happy New Year and many of them.

FREE SPEECH.

It appears rather strange that citizens of Chicago, in the state of Illinois, should be eagerly pursuing their papers this bright new year morning to ascertain whether Master in Chancery T. G. Windes, in his report on the Arbeiter Bund case, has affirmed or denied the people's right to free speech and free assemblage, or whether our blue-coated official despots shall be permitted to continue suppressing the heretofore acknowledged Constitutional right of citizens to peaceably assemble and discuss their grievances. That these uniformed bullies, under Bonfield, hav become the most-to-be-dreaded Anarchists, there is not the slightest doubt. For instead of protecting the people's rights they hav unwarrantably and premeditatedly violated them. Instead of preventing Anarchy they hav created it, and hav inaugurated a system of espionage on law-abiding citizens which would hardly be tolerated in Russia.

To the Chicago Times all honor is due for rescuing and vindicating the reputation of Chicago, the state, and the nation from the blind prejudice which had so insidiously been warping the judgment of our people, and arousing a reaction of sentiment. Through the bold and unwavering efforts of this public benefactor the people now realize the danger of placing the greatest fundamental right at the discretion of an ignorant and brutal police.

The Arbeiter Bund was treated by Bonfield with less consideration than a riotous mob. In vain was the representation made that the Bund was a lawful organization. The word of Bonfield was omnipotent, and the meeting was suppressed. Its attorney applied for an injunction to restrain the police from their threatened interference. The matter went to Master in Chancery Windes, who, while reporting his inability to find authority to issue a writ to preserve a personal right (as there are no property rights involved), yet very clearly and forcibly declares that the course of the police is without warrant of law.

He declares that the police hav no discretionary power given them to prevent the peaceful assembling of citizens, saying: "It is hostil and even dangerous to the genius of our institutions and in conflict with those upon which they are based to assume that a policeman, without judicial responsibility, shall exercise the judicial power to grant or withhold the right of citizens constitutionally to meet in public assembly." This is a black eye for Bonfield. Not one of the complainants was shown to be a lawless person. The Constitution of the United States prohibits Congress from making any law "abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the government for a redress of grievances."

What Congress has no right to touch Grand Inquisitor Bonfield felt competent to knock down with a club.

Chicago has established its title to a liberty-loving community, as Mr. Windes says: "The complainants may also at any time hereafter in a peaceable or orderly manner insist on their right to assemble, and if the mayor or chief of police shall prevent or use force to prevent their peaceable and orderly assembly or cause their arrest, they and each of them hav a right of action in case, trespass, or for false imprisonment against said officers."

As the Chicago police hav shown no regard for the institutions of this country, and are so lacking in humanity and decency, it is high time that this check-rein be placed on their mad career. An eleventh-hour-repentance letter was sent to police headquarters from Mayor Roche when the report of the master in chancery was already well known on the streets. It was to the effect that the police must obey the law. Small thanks to Mr. Roche for his procrastinated missiv. However, the matter is referred to Judge Tuley for decision, and I think it safe to say that the injunction will be granted, and the reign of the club removed from Chicago. E. A. STEVENS.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

Omaha, Neb., is situated on the Missouri river, and has a population of one hundred and fifty thousand, increasing with amazing rapidity. This city has eighty miles of graded streets, thirty-eight miles of paved streets, and seventy miles of sewers. It has one gas and two electric light plants. The gas company hav sixty miles of pipe already laid. The two electric light companies furnish twelve hundred incandescent and two hundred arc lights. The Omaha horse railway company has thirty-six miles of road in operation, the electric motor company ten miles, and the cable company five miles. There is an abundant supply of good, pure water. The waterworks company's plant cost over $1,000,000; they hav ninety-five miles of pipe already laid. The new bridge and electric motor, now in operation across the Missouri river, virtually make Omaha and Council Bluffs one city, but I prefer to confine this letter to Omaha alone.

The city has a very large number of magnificent buildings of immense size and cost. Among the most gorgeous are the Paxton on Sixteenth and Farnham streets, the New York Life, and the Bee building, which covers an entire block. But always to me the most interesting buildings in any place are the public schools.

Probably no city in the Union has better school facilities than Omaha. The high school, situated in the heart of the city on a handsomely fenced ten-acre lot, has a capacity for seven hundred pupils. The value of the grounds and building is $1,250,000. The aggregate value of school sites in the city is $1,400,000. The school buildings cost $706,000; available school fund for this year, $300,000; number of pupils in daily attendance, 9,000. These facts and figures refer to public schools only. There are a good many private schools, besides colleges, academies, and seminaries.

The city abounds in churches, nine-tenths of which should be promptly converted into science schools, gymnasiums, and workshops for youth to practice in, and the other tenth should be furnished as musical academies. Until this great desideratum is attained, all church property should be taxed exactly at the same rate as the theaters, hotels, stores, etc. Why not?

Manufactories abound, and the famous smelting and refining works, affording steady employment for five hundred men the year round, are unsurpassed.

Down by the bank of the Missouri river is a cluster of many buildings, the majority of which hav the appearance of great sheds, but are surmounted by tall and characteristic chimneys which send forth black smoke, white steam, and gases that make their existence known by strong and disagreeable odors. Railroad tracks run on each side, and wagons loaded with coal, coke, lime, ore, and gravel are continually dumping their contents. The mere smelting of ore into bullion pigs is a comparativly simple and inexpensiv process. But refining, which is extracting from them their gold, silver, and copper, and freeing them of their impurities, is both costly and complicated. A bullion pig, such as comes in vast quantities from the Colorado smelters to this institution, contains ninety-eight per cent lead, and in a ton there will be from $20 to $100 worth of gold, and from $100 to $250 worth of silver, besides considerable copper. But the main work is to make pigs of refined lead, which go from this place all over the United States. The resources and future of Omaha can scarcely be overestimated. The salubrity of the climate, the richness of the soil, and the extent of the country tributary to it are a sure guarantee of her glorious future. Her immense stock-yards, packing-houses, smelting and refining works, machine-shops, foundries, etc., disburse millions of dollars every month, and her industries are in their infancy—sure of rapid, healthful, continual growth. Omaha, so prolific in all else that makes a great, thriving, prosperous city, is sadly lacking in genuin Liberals who possess the courage to openly avow their honest convictions. If organization could be effected, it would do much to impart stamina to the weakly ones. There are a few noble, independent Infidels who rejoice in their mental liberty, and liv out the ennobling principles of Liberalism. Vodrie T. Boyle is of this number, and so is that sturdy old veteran Liberal E. L. Emery, to whose kind help I am indebted for aid in collecting the exact facts in regard to Omaha. There is no better-posted man on actual values of real estate in Omaha and vicinity than E. L. Emery, of the Weir block. After much of effort I only succeeded in delivering one lecture. That was on Sunday afternoon at the Germania Hall. Local election excitement and other causes interfered so that there was but a small audience, yet those in attendance evinced great interest.

I found a pleasant home with that hard-working, self-sacrificing worker for Liberalism Andrew Jacobson, author and publisher of that most excellent aid to Bible study, "The Bible Inquirer." He has just issued a third edition, revised and enlarged. Most decidedly "The Bible Inquirer" is just the pamphlet to present to any honest investigator, and is needed by every Liberal. It is better than a concordance, enabling one who is unfamiliar with the Bible to readily turn to texts on any given subject. Besides one hundred and forty-eight palpable contradictions, it contains a fund of important information, cleverly arranged for ready reference. The price of the little book is only twenty-five cents, for sale at THE TRUTH SEEKER office.

Mr. Hacker's Needs.

It is not the first time I hav had the misfortune to be poor, but when I read Mr. Hacker's letter in your last issue I greatly wished I had a $1,000 check to send to help him and Mrs. Hacker in their failing yet brave years. As you know, he was one of the first and the ablest to revolt against theological despotism in New England—quite as notable and serviceable as editor and publisher of his Pleasure Boat, a heretic man-of-war in Maine, as Abner Kneeland was in Massachusetts. The Christians down there were not so savage, or they would hav imprisoned or hanged Hacker before they jailed Kneeland in Boston. If ever a man did great and serviceable work, this man has done it. I trust those able will feel privileged to giv Mr. and Mrs. Hacker a lift in their old age.

A Consensus of Opinion on One Subject.

E. C. Walker in Fair Play.

In these columns I reproduce from the Symposium in the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 289 the expressions of twenty-three Liberal speakers and writers touching the question of Prohibition. Of these, fifteen—Robert G. Ingersoll, Helen H. Gardener, Samuel P. Putnam, E. A. Stevens, Robert C. Adams, E. B. Foote, Jr., Lucy N. Colman, J. H. Burnham, John Peck, W. S. Bell, E. C. Walker, Juliet H. Severance, Elmina D. Slenker, John R. Kelso, and G. H. Dawes—declare unequivocally against Prohibition.

Two—Charles Watts and Mattie A. Freeman—think that the question is one with which Liberals or Secularists, as such, hav nothing to do. But it is quite clear that they also are opposed to the principle of Prohibition.

Parker Pillsbury's answer is not very clear, although he concedes that, "in themselvs," Liberalism and Prohibition do not hav "much" relation to each other.

J. D. Shaw does not touch upon the principle of Prohibition, contenting himself with a remark regarding the relation of Liberalism to the Prohibition party.

Frederic May Holland is inclined to favor high license, with Prohibition "at particularly objectionable places and times."

L. K. Washburn is a "disinterested spectator."

Ella E. Gibson says nothing regarding the principle of Prohibition, but thinks its expediency is yet an "undecided question." At the same time she holds that "the political Prohibition party is a fraud and a snare."

Susan H. Wixon is evidently somewhat unsettled in her views upon the subject.

Of the twenty-three not one declares unreservedly for Prohibition. This is encouraging.

Of the seven women who take part in the Symposium, four antagonize Prohibition while none of the remaining three squarely indorse it. This is still more encouraging.

L. K. Washburn's idea that the relation of Liberalism to Prohibition is that of a "disinterested spectator," partakes both of the comic and the tragic. How any Liberal can look upon a denial of liberty disinterestedly is a mystery. And Mr. Washburn should be aware of the fact that, abstract principles aside, the success of the Prohibition party means the triumph of the church; means national Sabbath laws, the Bible in the schools, God in the Constitution, and, in short, the enthronement of Christianity and the extirpation of Liberalism. Instead of looking upon Prohibition from the standpoint of disinterested spectators, Liberals should know it for what it is, the most deadly weapon that the church wields to-day, a poisoned dagger driven by the relentless hand of fanaticism through every defense straight to the heart of Freethought.

Miss Wixon remarks that "all laws are necessarily prohibitory, nature's laws included." In a sense, yes, but not in a sense justifying the government of man by man. It is a law of nature that fire burns, and, in burning, hurts the one who puts his hands in it, and by that pain he is "prohibited" from doing so, but I am not aware that a statute is needed to keep men from putting their hands in the fire.

While declaring that Liberalism and Prohibition are antagonistic, Elmina D. Slenker seemingly qualifies this declaration by adding, "and yet a generous prohibition of all evils is best." This is a sad misuse of words—a misuse both of "generous" and of "prohibition." That she does not by "generous prohibition" mean legal Prohibition is proved by her next sentence, "Prohibit by good advice and a higher education." Good advice and education are not Prohibition; no straining of meaning or construction can make them such. On the contrary, Prohibition renders it impossible for good advice to be heeded; no matter how much good advice you giv a man he will not act upon it so long as you stand over him with a club to compel him to heed you. And education acts from within, and through external moral influences, not by the law, by pains and penalties, by confiscation and imprisonment. One of the first lessons reformers should learn is precision in the use of words. To call Prohibition "generous," to say that we can prohibit by "good advice," is to employ language to conceal thought, is to use words so loosely as to culpably mislead inquirers and sadly retard the solution of vexing problems.

Upon the whole, the attitude of Liberals toward Prohibition is a cheering one for the cause of all-around liberty.

The Bruno Statue at Rome.

The contributors to the Bruno fund and the friends of liberty and Freethought generally will rejoice at the following news from Rome, which shows that the statue to Bruno is to be a fixed fact, "his holiness," the pope, to the contrary notwithstanding.

The committee pledged America as good for $1,000 for this noble work, of which about one-half has been raised. At the earliest opportunity the state of the account will be published and the work of completing the fund continued.

"Still the world moves." T. B. WAKEMAN,
On behalf of the American Committee.

New York, Jan. 5, 289.

ROME CORRESPONDENCE OF THE MAIL AND EXPRESS.

The municipality of Rome has decided to giv up, in the square Campo die Fiori, the necessary space for erecting the statue to Giordano Bruno, already sculptured by the clever sculptor Signor Ettore Ferrari. The statue will be raised then in the same place where the poor friar-philosopher was burnt alive by the popes. It is a great homage to free examination that the Roman citizens hav given. The Romans hav been for some time too indifferent to the electoral struggles, and to political life in general, and they had allowed the clerical party to spread in the municipal council elements which, if not all openly clerical, wished at least to be in accord with the Vatican. They did not wish the statue to the martyr of free examination to be raised in Rome, and a solemn protest of the human mind against the Vatican seemed to them an excess. Last winter, after a lively debate, it was decided by the municipal council that all deliberations on the erection of the statue should be remanded.

The clerical party had a moment of joy, but it was of short duration. The majority of the Romans made a hostil demonstration toward the resolution of the council, and a favorable one to Signor Crispi, to whom a deputation of citizens presented themselvs to express the sentiments of disgust of the Roman population at the resolution taken. Signor Crispi gave the best of answers. The government, he said, cannot, and must not do anything, because it is a thing that concerns the citizens of Rome. If your representativs hav not interpreted your sentiments you know what to do. Next summer there will be new elections. All the electors in Rome go to vote.

And so it happened. The next summer an immense number of electors went to vote, and all the members of the municipal council whose time of office had expired, and who were suspected of having a sympathy or meekness for the Vatican, were excluded. The other evening, when they were to deliberate on the concession of the Piazza de Campo dei Fiori for the monument to Giordano Bruno, the hall of the Campidoglio was full of people, and a great crowd was round the Campidoglio. Marchese Guiccioli, the mayor, put the question and opened the debate. Nobody asked to speak, and they ordered the voting to begin. Excepting a few, all rose to approve. When the mayor declared that the resolution had been carried by a great majority there was a storm of applause inside and outside of the Campidoglio. The statue, then, will be erected as a symbol of the emancipation of the Italian thought.

P. Mason, box 1,073, Salt Lake City, Utah.

THE death of Judge Krekle left his wife with no estate, and dependent upon her own exertions for a livelihood. She has decided to enter the lecture field, and L. B. Leach, manager of the Opera House, of Wamego, Kan., has become her business manager for general purposes. Her subjects are nearly all such as will interest Freethinkers, and we can cordially recommend Mrs. Krekle to societies and individuals desiring one or more lectures. She is able, entertaining, and eloquent. The following is a list of the topics she treats: 1. Evolution of Thought and Progress of Ideas. 2. Religion vs. Theology. 3. The Unity of Ideas. 4. The Brotherhood of Prophets. 5. Religion and Church of the Future. 6. Natural Morality Superior to Theological Restraint as a Safeguard to Society. 7. The Decay of Protestantism. The Cause. 8. The Ethical Movement—Culture. 9. Mental Enfranchisment. 10. Cause and Cure of Crime. 11. Woman's Equality Before the Law. 12. Woman as a Social Political Factor. 13. Marriage—The Home. 14. The Divinity of Motherhood and Fatherhood. 15. The Rights of Children. 16. The Relationship of Poverty and Crime. 17. Am I my Brother's Keeper? 18. Religious Amendments to the Constitution. 19. Thomas Paine as a Patriot and Reformer. 20. Thomas Paine, one of the World's Saviors. 21. The Modern Inquisition. Address L. B. Leach, Wamego, Kan., or Mrs. Mattie P. Krekle, 1101 Charlotte street, Kansas City, Mo. Her terms are $10 for a single lecture, or $25 for three lectures, and expenses, which will be made as economical as possible.

HERE is a fact for Sir Wilfrid Lawson. In Cardiff, Wales, in the year before the passing of the Sunday Closing act, the number of persons summoned for drunkenness on the Sabbath was 43. Since the passing of the act the numbers hav been 118, 127, and 139. The publicans should no longer oppose the passing of a similar measure for other localities. It seems to increase their takings considerably.—London Tattler.

A Plea for Atheism.

Among persons of pious reputation, there seems to be a constant desire to attack, in one form or another, the now established and generally accepted ideas of Atheism. They speak of it in unmeasured language, and of those who profess it as persons who are necessarily immoral and decidedly wicked. The cumulativ arguments from men of creed hav awakened in the minds of the people not merely a doubt but a positiv conviction that the opposition, in form if not in fact, must indicate a weakness which now and in the future will be the cause of the total break-up of the churches belonging to the popular creed; and to-day superstition, bigotry, and intolerance are seen trying to work themselvs into a more subtle, threatening, and dangerous attitude, and the result thereof has been the erection of a mental arena in which the self-elected gladiators can display their skill; but as yet the Freethinkers hav obtained the victory, for their arguments and evidences are still unanswered, i.e., irrefutable.

The researches into modern science hav dissipated the original and most ancient notion and belief in a God. The telescope has chased him from the heavens, and navigation has left him no heaven above, and just in proportion as man has grown in knowledge God has diminished in extent, and each acquisition of truth has lessened the domain of uncertainty over which he spreads.

In entering upon a discussion of this kind, Mr. Beecher must not forget that the onus probandi lies with the affirmer of every proposition; and if it can not be supported, then, as a matter of course, it refutes itself. No logic can be more simple or more conclusiv than this. The definition of terms is the first step in all philosophy, therefore the Theist should lay down the precise terms of the nature and existence of his God; in fact, it is his duty to do so, else where is the argumentativ ground for reason to explore and discussion to elucidate?

If the Theist does not define his position, what right hav we to argue with him? We are, as it were, fighting with shadows, on a quagmire which every moment sinks us deeper and deeper with our burden. What is Atheism? It is a negativ, a mere intellectual state respecting Theism, and therefore has no strictly definit existence. To what are we Atheists? To what description of God are we renegades? When we say to the Theist, "Prove to us that God exists," it is no answer for him to say, "Prove that he does not." Until a proposition has been proved or demonstrated to be true, it practically remains untrue; and the man who would be imposed upon by such methods has yet to learn the rudiments of Freethought. Atheism does not "deny" God, as Mr. Beecher informs us; but in demonstrating the Atheist's position I will endeavor to do so in such a manner as to enable you to form a conception of what I mean. The Atheist does not deny God; he does not say, There is no God, but he says, I am without "idea" of God; the word "God" is to me a word without meaning, a sound conveying no clear or distinct affirmation. If the Theist says to me, "I believe in God," it means nothing to me, because the word "God" represents to me no idea. If a man says to me, "Thought is of a black color," or, "The square of eighteen is sweet to the palate," or, "Jesus is the son of God," I should not understand him, for the three phrases are alike absurd and ridiculous to me. I cannot adopt them as truth. But the Theist can accept a phrase quite as mystic as these and adopt it as truth, repeating it from his cradle, until the constant repetition, like the dropping of water on a rock, has worn away the opposition which the absurdity of the phrase would hav created in his mind. That man's belief in God was inevitable, I admit, because Theism is a stage in civilization through which the race must pass; but, while such belief was inevitable, human progress has consisted in growing out of it. In the early ages of man's history he perceived forces that appeared superior to his own and independent of his will—the sun gave him light and warmth; the fire burnt, the thunder terrified, the winds buffeted, and all the various elements acted upon him despite his resistance. Therefore he attached to them ideas of power. Their action upon him produced sensations of pleasure or pain; he conceived a like or dislike for them; he desired or dreaded their presence. Then he prayed to the sun; he prayed to the moon; he prayed to the stars. He thought by vain sounds and useless practices to govern the elements, to change existence. O fatal error! But it has lasted till now, and, although we place the lightning conductors to guide and convey the electric fluid, although we hav learned to control in a great degree, and to use for our own purposes, fire, air, earth, and water, we hav still retained the practices of those ignorant men. Now, to a person who really believes that a God is ordering all things for the best, everything must be necessarily good, and he can for his own part care very little about his wrongs here, for it is the will of God, he says, and there the matter ends.

Mr. Beecher then states, with some degree of certainty, that "Belief in God is necessary as a preventiv to crime;" and asserts that "The Atheist may plunder and rob without fear of the consequences." Let me ask Mr. Beecher, "Do Theists ever steal?" What will be his answer? What can it be? "Yes." Then is not the belief in God and his power to punish totally insufficient as a preventiv of crime? You cannot brand a man as a liar, thief, and hypocrit because he cannot accept certain disputed doctrins or propositions, however reasonable they may seem to you. Who has not been amazed at the utter powerlessness of Theistic ethics to abolish or even restrain wrong-doing? The belief in God has at all times encouraged murder and bloodshed; it has led to human sacrifice; and sin is just as rampant and widespread as if the name of God had never been uttered. Surely there must be a better way to reform the world. Sad, indeed, would be our lot if we had no better. But the Atheist is convinced that he has a better; for while the Atheist needs no further inducement to virtue than the simple love of virtue for its own sake, the Theist does need such further inducement in the love and favor of God, and generally in the selfish hope of heaven and the base fear of hell. Thus the morality of the Atheist, even in theory, is higher, nobler, better, and purer than is the morality of the Theist. Atheism teaches that everyone in society has an obligation to his neighbor, and that he can never be held to be moral if such trust is broken. Honesty is manly; dishonesty is a social evil. What more can Theism advocate? Does the Theist believe that he is one whit the better because of his belief in a comprehensible something than I am? I advocate no robbery, fraud, or murder. Thus it seems to me that the Theist has a most degrading view of human nature when he asserts that Theism is necessary as a preventiv to crime. I venture to think that if Mr. Beecher will make a tour of inspection to our prisons and penitentiaries he will find that their inmates are all, without exception, "believers in God;" and, indeed, it would occupy a lifetime to tell all concerning how the believers in God hav persecuted and even murdered each other. Ignorant and miseducated men often mistake the true path to happiness and commit crime in the endeavor to obtain it. But Atheism would preserve man from lying, stealing, and murdering, not by fear of the anger of God, but because these crimes make this life itself a cause of misery. The belief in a future life is to my mind a great and dangerous obstacle to present reform. The Atheist who expects no hereafter says that if good is ever to come to man at all, if peace and justice are to prevail, it must be for him right here and now. But the Theist, on the other hand, who has his thoughts fixed upon heaven, generally regards this life as a vale of tears through which man must pass on his way to that land whose streets are of shining gold, and where we shall hav nothing to do but sing psalms, twang harps, and blow trumpets all day long; therefore his only desire is to quit this world as soon as possible; hence he can hav but little thought of human welfare. Atheism affirms one existence, the existence of which it knows, and refrains from speaking of an existence of which there is not a shadow of foundation.

It is said that Atheism has relation only to this world and to this life. Admitted. But does not Mr. Beecher think that it is necessary to liv well here—that a well-organized society, clean, healthful children, a society whose only noblemen would be men of noble deeds and noble thoughts, would be far preferable to the society now existing? And the society we should hav if man would only perform the duties he owes to his fellow-man would be a society coinciding with the burden of Massey's song when he said:

> This world is full of beauty as other worlds above,
> But if we did our duty, it might be full of love.

There are three words, says Shelley, by which kings and priests

> Support the system whence their honors flow,

And these are:

> "God," a vengeful, pitiless, and almighty fiend;
> "Hell," a red gulf of everlasting fire;

And

> "Heaven," a meed for those who dare belie
> Their human nature, quake, believe, and cringe
> Before the maker of earthly power in wonder and fear; and it remained for the light of science to dispel the darkness and to remove the mental manacles by which men were fettered. Then one by one the myths began to fade away; one by one the phantoms disappeared, and facts, truths, and realities hav taken their place. The gods hav vanished, but man remains. As Byron remarks in his passage upon the ruins of Athens:

> Son of the morning, rise; approach you here;
> Come, but molest not yon defenseless urn.
> Look on this spot—a nation's sepulcher;
> Abode of gods whose shrines no longer burn.
> Even gods must yield, religions take their turn;
> 'Twas Joves's, Mohammed's; and other creeds
> Will rise with other years, till man shall learn
> That vain his incense soars, his victim bleeds,
> Poor child of doubt and death whose hope is built on reeds.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH.

The Function of Capital.

When first I read Colonel Ingersoll's Reply to Cardinal Manning, I did not notice his view of capital and interest because I wanted to congratulate him on his rapid approach to those sound views of the relations of the sexes, which always seemed to me the most important and fundamental part of Anarchism. But I am glad my friend Cook has taken up the subject. Colonel Ingersoll says: "In no other way [than by borrowing money on interest] could a capital great enough hav been formed to construct works of such vast and continental importance" as railroads. He should hav added, "under the existing bourgeois, or capitalistic system." And this is what I call the original sin of political economists—assuming the universality of the bourgeois system, which, in fact, is quite modern; or, in other words, confounding wealth in general with money. The most signal instances of this error are the so-called commercial theory of trade refuted by Adam Smith, and the doctrin still held by some of our Greenback theorists but refuted long ago by Ricardo, that money, meaning any medium of exchange, is wealth, and that a high value of paper money means a low value of gold, while in truth the value of gold is relativly constant, and a high price of bullion means depreciation of notes. But the same fallacy pervades all economic reasoning, and every improvement in economic theory consists in partly getting rid of it. With respect to the employment of labor by capital, it has been so lucidly refuted by Henry George—a writer whose works in some other respects leave much to be desired—that I can do no better than condense his argument in the third, fourth, and fifth chapters of "Progress and Poverty." To begin at the beginning, Mr. George says in effect that when a man works for himself, as if he gathers eggs, picks berries, or makes shoes in his own shop, it is very evident that his labor is not employed by, nor his wages drawn from, capital. In the case of the eggs or berries, the possession of these things is his wages, and there is no capital in the matter. In the case of the shoemaker, his wages are the difference between the value of the completed shoes and that of the leather, thread, and pegs with which he began, and this value is in no way derived from his capital (the aforesaid leather, etc.), but solely from his labor. So, again, where one man works for another on shares—a common practice in all agricultural countries—it is evident that his wages are not advanced by his employer but created by his own labor.

Sometimes, as in the whaling trade, the wages, though paid in money, are estimated in kind—such a share of the ship's catch, or, what amounts to the same thing, of its value. Here it is really as evident as in the former case that the wages are created by labor and not paid out of pre-existing capital. Only where the returns of the business can with a fair degree of certainty be estimated in advance is it customary to pay fixed wages, and the reason is evident in these, but not in other cases. The employer knows what fixed sum it is safe to pay for the work. In these, as in the other cases, the work precedes the payment, and is expected to yield more wealth than is paid out in wages. It is, indeed, true that in these cases the laborer has a legal claim for his wages, even if the enterprise should wholly fail. But this circumstance is accidental and immaterial. If the enterprise fails the legal claim is liable to become worthless. The actual payment of wages depends, law or no law, on the previous production of wealth. It is also true that where wages are paid, as most generally they are, by the day or week, a considerable amount may be disbursed by an enterprise which eventually fails. But in all such cases the employer, before becoming bankrupt, has received more wealth in stock than he paid out in money. It may perish through his inability to convert it at a forced sale; but it has been created all the same. Wages properly so called are never paid in advance of production. The few apparent cases are either charitable advances to a poor man, or else bounties required to bind the contract. Again, the subsistence of the laborers while at work is not drawn from previously accumulated wealth, but from contemporaneous production. At the harvest season scarcely any of last year's crop remains unconsumed. The groceries, pork, flour, etc., which a farmer uses to feed his hands are, in nine cases out of ten, neither his own produce nor purchases made with last year's produce, but advances made by the country merchant on the very crop which the hands are sowing or cutting. The real functions of capital are very different from either feeding or paying employees. They are to facilitate production by the use of machinery, to facilitate production by breeding or sowing, to facilitate production by the division of labor. That a railroad may be built there must be mines for iron, smelting works for pigs, factories for rails and nails, shops for rolling stock, horses, wagons, wheelbarrows, and the directly applied labor of surveyors, engineers, navvies, woodchoppers, etc. But it is no more necessary that money enough to pay the actual constructors of the railroad in cash should be accumulated, than that the railroad company should own the mines, smelting works, factories, forests, shops, and so on. What is needed is only that mutual confidence among the producers engaged in all these different branches, which would enable them to deal with one another as the country merchant does with the farmer. And it is thus they actually do, with the exception of those who, having nothing to sell but manual labor, hav neither motiv nor opportunity to wait for that sole remuneration, their daily bread. Were the laborers on a tunnel paid in tunnel, which, if convenient, could easily be done by paying them in stock of the company, no capital for the payment of wages would be required, observes Mr. George. This is the just and reciprocal method of Socialism, which, generally applied, would render the accumulation of money unnecessary. C. L. JAMES.

The Sabbath Day.

While thousands of Christians preach that Sunday should be made a compulsory holiday and that we should hav a Sunday law, they forget that Christ himself was a violator of the Sunday law. Should they read what Christ said and did they would find he was not so crazy as one-half of our fanatical Christians of to-day. Mark credits him with saying:

And it came to pass that he went through the corn-fields on the Sabbath day; and his disciples began, as they went, to pluck the ears of corn.

And the Pharisees said unto him: Behold, why do they on the Sabbath day that which is not lawful?

And he said unto them: Hav ye never read what David did when he had need and hungered, he and they that were with him?

How he went into the house of God in the days of Abiathar the high priest and did eat the shew-bread, which is not lawful to eat but for the priests, and gave, also, to them that were with him?

And he said unto them: The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath. Therefore the son of man is Lord also of the Sabbath (Mark ii, 23-28).

He not only breaks the Sabbath, but upholds David, who did likewise, and ate the holy bread that was made for the priests only; and again, he says the Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath, and the son of man was Lord also of the Sabbath, yet the so-called Christians of to-day reverse this, and instead of man being lord of the day, they want the day to be served as a lord and tyrant. It is plain, according to their inspired book, that man was to do as he pleased on that day, i. e., he was to be lord of the Sabbath; and, again, even the old God—God No. 1. or God the father—called it a day of rest. And he himself rested after talking to nothing for six days, saying: Let there be this, etc. So if God No. 1 rested on that day, and God No. 2 said the day was made for man and he was Lord of that day, there is no reason why he should not rest and enjoy himself upon his day, for as man is lord of the Sabbath, God must be Lord of the other six days. And it is plain that the six must be the holy days, or God's days, and the seventh is man's. However, this is another biblical tangle that they hav not yet unraveled. Yet it is plain that David and Christ did not respect the Sunday law.

Social Economy.

I wish to call the attention of some of the Liberals in the United States to the fact that there is something else required of them besides a continual expenditure of mental strength against Christianity. Whatever may hav been the evil disaster resultant from the dominance over human thought of that system of speculation, there hav been, and there are now, at work, other evil factors, whose tendency to prevent human development and retard the advancement of the intellectual world is quite as conspicuous in its results. Clear-sighted men perceive that the greatest obstacle which the reformer has to overcome is the blind faith with which men regard the institutions of their fathers. This does not refer solely to religious institutions by any means, but to every custom, habit, peculiarity in line of thought, etc. Is there a Liberal in America who would say that theology is the only institution which is, or can be, radically wrong without attracting the attention of the masses of men? Are there not institutions which the majority of people consider fair and desirable which in themselvs produce vice, misery, and poverty?

Why do people starve in a land of plenty? Why are thousands of healthy and willing men and women crushed into a premature grave by anxiety, by the pressure of competition and the fear of poverty? Why do strong men groan in large cities when winter comes and work is scarce, and feeble women and children cry for bread they cannot find?

Why is the life-blood of our country drained away by a mortality double among the poor that among the rich? Is nature niggardly? Is there not food enough for all? Is all the land occupied or put to productiv uses? If not, why, then, is it that thousands hunger for the bread which nature holds within her breast, which may be had for the digging? Is it that men are lazy, that they prefer the chance of charity to the regular but scanty fare of honest labor? No. Is it that there is not sufficient wealth produced, or can be produced, which, after consumptiv desires are gratified, may remain as capital for increased productiv purposes? No. Is religion the cause of poverty, of actual starvation? Does theology condemn men to work for wages whose tendency is always toward a minimum which will but support an animal existence? I hardly think it. Then why is it that we thus suffer from the effects of an evil constantly augmenting?

The duty of a Liberal is double—to free the intellect; to free the animal. Bear in mind that it can only be in the elevation of the advantages of the latter that the former can assuredly advance. Men must hav leisure for improvement; and that leisure can only be found in the diminution of the hours required for the gratification of animal needs. Time is what is wanted. Time for improvement. Time to progress in knowledge; that is, time to study, to develop, to acquire the ideas and arts of others, to benefit by the experience of the whole world. And every moment devoted, beyond a certain number, to exertion for the acquisition of actual necessities deprives the brain of an equivalent amount of energy necessary for its development. Does any sensible Liberal (for all Liberals are supposed to be sensible) imagin that the complete extirpation of theology and its concomitant disadvantages would benefit the world economically to any appreciable extent? Would poverty decrease? crime diminish? Would it hav a tendency to check the mighty waste of wealth in luxury and dissipation and turn it to productiv uses? Would it change the tide, and make the poor grow richer and the rich poorer? There is not a Liberal in the land who will say Yes. Then what will?

That's the question, and discovery of cause precedes application. I do not write this for the purpose of supporting through this column any theory, but simply to call the attention of a great number of Liberals to the fact that while their efforts are directed against one monster a many-headed devil in the rear is rising and gaining strength. It lies in the fact that under our present economical institutions the tendency of the fruits of labor is to unequal distribution. I appeal to all Liberals to take up the study of social science with reference to the fact stated above. I do not wish them to relax any efforts to crush out mythology, but to giv more attention to this; for it is through this means that the salvation of the race will be worked out. H. W. HAMMOND.

Charles Bradlaugh On His Victory.

From the National Reformer.

No person need now on any occasion whatever take an oath unless he desires to do so. By section 1 of the Oaths act, 1888, any person who on any occasion, or under any circumstances, where an oath is required, shall say either, "I object to be sworn, I hav no religious belief," or, "I object to be sworn: the taking of an oath is contrary to my religious belief," is at once entitled to affirm. The judge or commissioner or officer charged with administering the oath must allow the affirmation, and has no right to ask any question whatever. There is no obligation on the person to say one word beyond either of the forms of words already quoted. No counsel or attorney or other person has any right on this head to question the person so claiming to affirm. The person claiming to affirm after he has used one of the sets of words quoted may legally, and in principle ought to, refuse to answer any question whatever touching his claim to affirm. The objection and statement should be made slowly, quietly, and very distinctly, but most respectfully, on the witness entering the witness-box, or on the juror being told to take the book to be sworn. There should be a complete avoidance of anything like defiant or self-assertiv declaration. There is now only one simple form of affirmation, that given in section 2 of the Oaths act, for persons whether religious or without religion. In the event of any magistrate, coroner, or commissioner offering any insult or making any hostil comment on a person so claiming to affirm, the exact words should be at once carefully written down and at once sent to me, verified, if possible, by independent testimony.

All Freethinkers in any part of the United Kingdom can now, under this act, affirm as jurors without question.

All Freethinkers are now, and for the first time, competent as witnesses in Scotland. It is trusted that all will avail themselvs of the affirmation.

In any case in which the oath of allegiance is required, affirmation of allegiance may now be substituted. Freethinking justices of the peace who hav already taken the oath of allegiance are now protected from penalty, as the oath is made valid by section 3. I, who hav been liable to be again sued by the crown for £500 penalty for each vote I hav given, and for each debate I hav taken part in since the general election of 1885, am now protected, as the swearing at the table in 1885 and 1886, which the courts declared would be null and void, has been made valid by section 3.

The whole of the difficulties as to written affirmations in lieu of affidavits are now cleared away by sections 1 and 4. Many judges and officials hav hitherto refused to receive written affirmations under the Evidence Amendment acts, 1869 and 1870. Those acts are now expressly repealed by the present act, and the words of section 4 giv the form of written affirmation; while by section 1 affirmation is permitted, "instead of taking an oath, in all places and for all purposes." The most grateful acknowledgments of Freethinkers are due to Earl Spencer, the earl of Aberdeen, Lord Coleridge, and Lord Esher, for activ help given in passing the bill through the House of Lords, especially remembering that each one of these peers is earnestly opposed to our Freethought, and has been moved only in this legislation by a desire for justice. If I might without offense, I should like to add my most respectful tribute to Lord Esher. As law officer of the crown he prosecuted me twenty-one years since; as puisne judge he held at chambers that my evidence was not receivable before an arbitrator under the act of 1869, and the full court upheld his judgment; I hav had very many times to argue before Lord Esher as master of the rolls in the court of appeal; and this very "Oaths act," which he has generously helped to pass into law, is in effect the repealing of the common law as interpreted in the judgment he delivered against me four years since. The judge was sometimes a little hard, but I knew he always meant to be just. I always bowed without complaint to his decision, even though I did not accord with it, and continued to struggle against it. I knew that my opinion might be colored by my strife, and that he on the judicial bench was authorized to interpret. The member of the House of Peers, though opposed in religion and politics, has been very generous to his lesser adversary. I am sorry that I am unable to write anything kindly of the lord chancellor. He preferred fighting me right through, and I thought, and still think, with unfair weapons. Some who know him better than I profess to do, say that he has a kindly nature. In more than ten years' continuous fighting he has never let me find a trace of it, though I trust that I am never too unwilling to find a pleasant phase. It may be that he thought me too bad to be ever treated well. At last for me, at any rate, the oaths fight is over, and the parliamentary struggle is more than half finished. No other duly elected member can hav the 3d August, 1881, happen to him in the future for similar cause. On the 23d of June, 1880, standing at the bar, I asked the House:

Do you mean that I am to go back to Northampton as to a court, to appeal against you? that I am to ask the constituency to array themselvs against this House? I hope not. If it is to be, it must be. If this House arrays itself against an isolated man—its huge power against one citizen—if it must be, then the battle must be too.

And after this I did go back, and the battle was bitter enough. Reëlected, I spoke again from the bar on April 28, 1881, and told the House, as I stood with my return in hand:

I hav been hindered in every way that it was possible to hinder me, and it is only by the help of the people, by the pence of toilers in mine and factory, that I am here to-day, after these five struggles right through thirteen years. I hav won my way with them, for I hav won their hearts, and now I come to you. Will you send me back from here? Then how? You hav the right, but it is the right of force, and not of law.

And in a third speech, at the same bar, on Feb. 7, 1882, I told the House:

If I am not fit for my constituents, they shall dismiss me, but you never shall. The grave alone shall make me yield.

And now all this seems long ago. I hav sat in the House and worked as a legislator through three full years, doing at least a little each year to justify my presence there. The House since 1885 has been very generous to me, and has helped me to achieve work which I could not hav done had it been hostil, or even if it had been indifferent. If the House would be as just to my constituents as it has been generous in its audience to myself, and would voluntarily erase the obnoxious resolutions from its journals, then the page of the struggle story might be well closed. CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

"IT is not safe," warningly to his brethren says Dr. J. O. Murray in the Homiletic Review, "for the minister to quote from the pulpit what his scientific professors taught him ten or twenty years ago in the class-room. Some of the so-called scientific statements made by divines in a late general assembly were, as viewed by scientific men, so much hopeless blundering. They only made men of science laugh. But they were uttered with a sublime unconsciousness of their egregious folly." Just so. The average Methodist minister knows as much about the conclusions of modern science as a horse knows about astronomy.

THE Mid-Continent groans over the alleged fact that in three-fourths of the garrisons of the United States army there are no chaplains. Our government, says the Mid-Continent, has from its foundation recognized its obligation to provide religious instruction for its army and navy. This is not true. The founders of the government recognized their obligation not to provide religion for anybody, and embodied the obligation in the Constitution, but the churches hav prevailed upon the politicians to override that instrument and saddle a burden of several thousand dollars per annum upon the people for their benefit. The arrogance of the religious folks of this country is equaled only by their skill in maintaining their religion at the expense of the public.

New Editions of Good Books.

A new edition of "The Brain and the Bible" is now ready for the buyer, improved and illuminated by a splendid portrait of the handsome author, Mr. Edgar C. Beall. The Preface to this work is by Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, and he says the arguments it presents cannot be answered by all the theologians in the world. The author's contention is that the universe is natural, that man is naturally produced, and that there is a necessary relation between character and brain. Among subjects Mr. Beall treats are: The Fall of Man; the Plan of Salvation; Is Nature Self-Existent? the Design Argument; Scientific Theism, and the Logic of Jesuitism. The book contains nearly three hundred pages and sells for one dollar. It is one of the best books Liberalism ever produced.

Helen Gardener's "Men, Women, and Gods" is another book the popularity of which has demanded a new edition—the seventh. This work, we presume, will be read and admired when the men and women of to-day hav all gone where the gods of yore hav gone. This book likewise contains a portrait of its beautiful writer. Price fifty cents in paper, and one dollar in cloth.

Mr. B. F. Underwood's "Woman" has also been honored with another edition by the reading public. In these days of discussion of the failure or success of marriage, so much of either of which depends upon the woman in the case, this book is worth careful study. Price ten cents.

Voltaire's "Pocket Theology," being sharp and pertinent definitions of theological terms, viewed from the point of view of a philosopher and satirist, is again in print. It is a splendid book to read to a Christian friend. Price twenty-five cents.

The Truth Seeker Annual for 1889.

From James Hedden, Publisher Dowagiac, Mich., Times.

The ANNUAL is certainly a gem, and $5 would not induce us to part with our copy if we could not get another one. It hits us squarely, as we hav had many a tilt with literary friends whose eyes for the old would not let them see the genius of the new, by claiming that Ingersoll was at once the poet laureate of the living and the dead. This almanac settles it to everyone who reads it.

From the Denver, Col., Arbitrator.

A valuable publication. Well worth the price. Contains answers of twenty-four distinguished Liberal writers to fourteen pertinent questions relativ to the status and prospects of Liberalism in this country. The answer to the fourteenth question, "What do you advise as a remedy for economic troubles?" we hav perused with care; and, while they contain evidences of anxious interest, we regret to say that they generally show a lack of technical acquaintance with those philosophies that are calculated to suggest the adequate remedy for social ills. The comparison between the poetic thoughts of Shakspere and those of Ingersoll is highly entertaining and is far from disadvantageous to the latter.

From the Investigator.

This large, useful, and handsome pamphlet of 124 pages, published at the TRUTH SEEKER office, 28 Lafayette place, New York city, is valuable and interesting for two important reasons. It contains twenty-five very good articles from able writers—Colonel Ingersoll, Messrs. James Parton, S. P. Putnam, Charles Watts, E. M. Macdonald, E. A. Stevens, Parker Pillsbury, L. K. Washburn, W. S. Bell, J. H. Burnham, G. H. Dawes, Mrs. M. A. Freeman, Mrs. E. D. Slenker, Mrs. Lucy N. Colman, Miss Susan H. Wixon, Miss Helen H. Gardener, and a number of others, all devoted to the subject of how Liberalism can be best sustained and promoted. This ANNUAL also contains a calendar or chronology of Liberal martyrs, dates of their births, deaths, etc.; likewise a picture of the statue of Bruno at Rome. An excellent publication to refer to and preserve.

Superstition in Crime.

A most savage exposition of the result of the Christian belief in witchcraft is the picture on the title-page of this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The Massachusetts tragedy is historical evidence to the brutality of the Puritans; as is the English murder committed nearly two hundred years subsequently. Between these two, as well as before the first, hundreds of persons perished at the hands of ignorant and ferocious Christians. The existence of witches is recognized by the Bible, and in that barbaric book is also the law by which the Christian church has justified their murder. The latest crime of this nature occurred in Kansas on the 19th ult., and was the direct result of superstition engrafted upon ignorance. The horrible story is as follows:

Several weeks previous to that date, an old negro servant of Eugene Bartlett, a wealthy cattleman of Kingman county, who was known as "good old Rebecca," conceived the idea that she was bewitched by Jennie Bartlett, who was about twenty years old. While gradually showing an increased dislike for the girl, she kept on with her work, but two days before the commission of the crime, in the presence of the family, she told Miss Bartlett that she was being hoodooed by her and she would hav to cease or there would be trouble. This created considerable merriment, but the old colored woman watched her opportunity for breaking the spell of witchcraft.

Monday evening, December 19th, early, all the family except Jennie went to visit neighbors. Shortly after their departure Robert Donnelly, a young man who livs at Bross, called to see Jennie, as had been his custom for some time, and remained until about 9 o'clock, when Rebecca appeared and stated that there was a very sick horse at the barn and she wanted him to go up to Bross for some medicin. He left in response to the request.

As soon as the young man was out of hearing the servant caught the young lady, and tying a rope around her hands swung her up to a joist with her feet about two feet from the floor. This done, she stripped her of her clothes and covered her body with paint and then tar. In a short time she had placed a kettle filled with kindling-wood under her, and after putting a large amount of oil on it applied a match.

While the flames were curling around the poor girl's feet and limbs Donnelly returned with the medicin for the sick horse. Before reaching the house he saw a bright light shining through a window and heard frantic screams. He supposed some one had caught fire from an exploded lamp and hastened to the door. The front entrance was locked, and going to a window the horrible spectacle met his eyes. For a moment he scarcely knew what to do, but finally rushed back to the door and broke it open. Then he removed the kettle, cut the rope, and conveyed the girl to a resting-place. For a few minutes she was unconscious, but she soon recovered sufficiently to tell the story of her fiendish treatment. Her feet and lower limbs were burnt into a crisp, and a few minutes later death relieved her of the intense agony.

Except in details, and in its nearness to us, the religious tragedy is no more horrible than the witch burnings and hangings and drownings of Europe and America. In the heart of the old woman still linger some relics of African religious superstition, reinforced by the teaching of the Bible, which the colored race takes with fearful literalness, just as our New England ancestors did before heresy crept among them. Probably the old negress will be hanged; but how shall the cause of her crime be reached? Isn't the one who taught her her superstition as culpable as the instigator of a murder for revenge or greed?

The Sabbath Bill.

The Milwaukee, Wis., North Side Vorwaerts and South Side Turner societies hav indorsed the Secular protest against the Blair bill, which declares Christianity to be the official religion of the United States, and the Turners want the government and public schools to be secular. Copies of the protest will be sent to Congressmen Smith and Van Schaick. The Kalamazoo, Mich., Gazette reprints Mr. Wolff's speech against the bill, as it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the Washington Sentinel will reprint the speech entire. A protest, as follows, is also being distributed from the office of Freethought, San Francisco:

"We, the undersigned, adult residents of the United States, twenty-one years of age or more, hereby respectfully but earnestly petition your honorable body not to pass any bill in regard to the observance of the Sabbath, or Lord's day, or any other religious or ecclesiastical institution or rite; nor to favor in any way the adoption of any resolution for the amendment of the national Constitution that would in any way tend, either directly or indirectly, to giv preference to the principles of any religion or of any religious body above another, or that will in any way sanction legislation upon the subject of religion: but that the total separation between religion and state, assured by the national Constitution as it now is, may forever remain as our fathers established it."

Dr. Westbrook, president of the American Secular Union, will also hold some public meetings in Philadelphia, the headquarters of the God-in-the-Constitution party, to protest against the passage of this bill. The California protest is a good form, and we urge Liberals everywhere to cut it out or copy it, and obtain signatures, sending them direct to the Senators from their states, with letters of the same purport. The Baltimore American and scores of other papers hav spoken out in denunciation of the bill, and the Sabbath Union will find its road a harder one to travel than Crafts and Shepard imagined.

Marriage and Divorce Laws.

The New York Herald, for the sake of making a sensation, has gone in for an amendment to the United States Constitution, in these words: "The Congress shall hav power to make a uniform law of marriage and divorce." The amendment was embodied in a joint resolution and introduced in the House by Representativ Springer, of Illinois, and referred to the judiciary committee.

This is an old scheme of the church, the idea being to make marriage a religious instead of a secular ceremony, and to make divorce possible only on scriptural grounds. If the amendment is adopted and such a law is passed, it ought to be entitled, A Law to Make Marriage a Fight to a Finish. The clergy hav always opposed the secularization of marriage, because that event is one of the three chief acts in a man or woman's life which brings money to the church and magnifies the position of the minister or priest. Their claim is that marriage is a sacrament, and that as it was "ordained by God" the representativs of that personage are the only proper officers to solemnize it. The legislatures of the various states hav made various laws, but all more or less ignoring the "sacredness" of the act and placing it on the basis of a civil contract, or partnership. Hence the tears of our self-constituted guardians.

There could be no objection to a uniform marriage law, provided that law made it a simple contract between the parties, and provided also that the law on divorce allowed the bonds to be slipped as easily as a partnership is dissolved, with due care for the assets and collateral issues of the firm. But to make a law that adultery only shall be a cause for divorce is to put a premium on that act. If men and women cannot be divorced they will separate, and the chances are about a hundred to one that if they can not legally take another partner, they will do so illegally. It is not good for man to be alone, and in this case man certainly does embrace woman. To force disagreeing husbands and wives to continue to dwell together is extremely bad for the present and future generations. Homes will be converted into arenas for scolding matches, if not worse, and the children will early learn how to make things unpleasant for their future partners. A law the effect of which is to do this is the worst possible policy; it is bad statesmanship, and is unpatriotic, inasmuch as it will destroy homes and families, which political economists assure us are the foundation of the republic.

The founders of this republic never contemplated that Congress should interfere in domestic matters, and it is not wise that it should. To increase the functions of Congress is to decrease the independence of the states. Home rule, from the family to the nation, is better than to hav all power lodged in a huge and unwieldy machine, which once started can commit a thousand crimes against liberty and justice before it can be stopped. Our cities should attend to all municipal affairs, the states to those things affecting its own citizens, and the general government to interstate, foreign, and national concerns. For Congress to meddle with marriage laws would be an intolerable usurpation of state rights as now existing, and to giv the national government such legal power would be to set the prying and domineering clergy—for they are the fellows who are going to draft that law—astraddle the necks of the whole people, firmly fixed in their seats by the enormous power of the entire nation.

The fact that it is a clerical move is of itself sufficient reason for opposing the scheme. It might be going too far to say that no clergymen ever were engaged in any good work, but it is the absolute truth that whenever the clergy set about securing laws for their own benefit, the welfare of the people suffers. The clergy's interest and the people's liberties are diametrically opposed. When the ministers made the laws were the times when those frightful enactments which stain history's pages were conceived. The clergy put the barbarism of the Old Testament on our statute books, and it was only when the ghosts were retired from politics that they were repealed. The Herald is supporting the proposed amendment as a sensation to get advertising, but behind the buncombe scheme are the ministers and lay bigots of the country, who long to get a firmer grip on the lives of the people, and to regulate their conduct by the word of God as interpreted by themselvs. They are about the only advocates of the proposed amendment and law, and their reasons may be given in their own words, as told to a Herald reporter. The Rev. W. A. Leonard, of Washington, said:

"The canons of the Protestant Episcopal church are simple and very explicit as to divorce. Her clergy are permitted to remarry 'persons as God's word doth allow,' viz., (a) divorced parties 'seeking to be united again' and (b) 'the innocent party in a divorce for the cause of adultery' (canon 13, title 2, section 2). The easy and corrupt methods for securing absolute divorce prevalent in many parts of this country are abhorrent to the church. The holy rite of marriage should be performed by some authorized minister of religion, for it is a divine institution. And the ministers of religion should be made justices of the peace, as in New York state, so as to cover the civil rights of contracting parties.'"

The Rev. John H. Eliot, Jesuit, said:

"As a disciple of Christ, I believe that divorce from the bond of matrimony should be regulated by his word. I believe that the contracting of marriage without a religious ceremony has contributed greatly to the deplorably low views prevailing in this country. The highest authority on the subject, the Rev. S. W. Dike, says: 'The current was set wrong in part by the early Puritan dread of everything like ecclesiasticism. Marriage at the first was made a civil contract only, and a religious ceremony was forbidden or discouraged.' The civil aspects of marriage are recognized; the state ought to recognize its religious aspects."

These are the sentiments of all the church authorities, and the whole scheme is one to augment the power and prestige of the clergy, both of which are gradually dwindling away before the advance of civilization. There is small prospect of the amendment finding the necessary two-thirds vote in either house, and still smaller of its being ratified by three-fourths of the state legislatures. But the attempt, first made by the clergy themselvs some two years ago, shows that our spiritual rulers itch for an empire temporal as well as ghostly.

The Eugene City "Debate."

The unwisdom of noticing such scamps as Clark Braden is again shown by the result of the Eugene City, Oregon, debate between him and B. F. Underwood. It appears from resolutions adopted by the Liberals of that place printed in San Francisco Freethought, that Mr. Underwood was induced by deception of persons acting in the interest of Braden to visit Eugene City, the Liberals not being consulted at all and knowing nothing of the proposed debate until Mr. Underwood landed in the town. The resolutions further set forth that Mr. Underwood behaved himself well and Braden ill, and conclude by asserting that Braden should be condemned by all honorable men and women. This last sentiment, it will be noticed, coincides with those often expressed in these columns.

Braden, too, has not been idle. We hav received three printed copies of his side of the story. Between every line can be plainly read the man's dishonesty, charlatanry, and brazen meanness. We presume that there is not a statement made which is not either a falsehood or a fact distorted. But we do really hope that the following is true so far as Mr. Underwood's part therein is concerned.

"When Mr. Braden, after the audience was dismissed, Monday night, December 10th, announced that persons who had been inquiring for his pamphlet could come forward and obtain it, Mr. Underwood roared out, 'I forbid my opponent selling that pamphlet in this hall,' and denounced it as false and Mr. Braden as a liar. Tuesday night he demanded that the moderators forbid the sale of the pamphlet, and when they refused to do so, he vociferated, 'I take this opportunity to denounce that pamphlet as a mess of unmitigated lies, and I denounce that man'—pointing to Mr. Braden—'as an unmitigated liar and unprincipled scoundrel.'"

If Mr. Underwood made the remark attributed to him it was as truthful a sentence as any spoken during the debate.

We do not believe that the cause of Liberalism needs, or can be advanced by, further notice of this man. Dignified discussion will do much good by enlightening such Christians as can be induced to attend, but to oppose scholars to clowns is not dignified discussion.

Freedom to Speak.

The master in chancery, Chicago, has decided that the police hav no power to prevent the meetings of the Arbeiter Bund, which he declares to be lawful. He says:

"It is hostil and even dangerous to the genius of our institutions, and in conflict with those upon which they are based, to assume that a policeman without judicial responsibility shall exercise the judicial power to grant or withhold the right of citizens constitutionally to meet in public assembly.

"If the mere belief of a police officer that projected public meetings are for unlawful purposes shall operate to their prohibition of such meetings, such belief, created by error, malice, bigotry, or political partisanship, may be resorted to for the effectual extinguishment of a fundamental constitutional right.

"When citizens hav assembled, if they advocate or proceed to the commission of unlawful acts or the overthrow of government or the destruction of property, then the conservators of the peace may exercise their discretion in dispersing them."

The police did not claim that at the meetings of the Bund dangerous doctrins were advocated, but said that after these meetings the audience would gather in groups and denounce the government as tyrannical. Therefore they had prevented the gatherings.

It strikes us that the police is the more dangerous force of the two. If they can say arbitrarily who shall and who shall not meet in public halls, then Chicago is under monarchical rule, unauthorized and irresponsible, and the liberty of the citizen is gone.

But this whole scare about Anarchists is a political dodge to keep the present officials in power. Their charges are buncombe and blow and lies.

Monotonous Puerility.

Mr. E. C. Walker is dancing around like the Irishman at Donnybrook looking for a head to hit. There seems to be something in the philosophy of Anarchy which leads its followers to fight every other person in the world, and to be particularly belligerent toward friends. Here is Mr. Walker's latest blow:

"Sunday should be a non day, made so by law, that business may be suspended by all without injury to any. But no law should apply to that day that does not apply to other holidays, and no law should ever hav religious significance, or take cognizance in any way of religious reasons for its being.—Truth Seeker, New York.

"Why should Sunday be made a non day by law? Why, says THE TRUTH SEEKER, 'that business may be suspended by all without injury to any.' But suppose there are those who prefer to continue to perform their business duties on that day? Will you compel them to abstain from so doing? If so, wherein does your despotism differ from that of the church? But if not, if you 'let' them do as they please, what becomes of your 'non day,' the day whereon business is 'suspended by all?'"—Fair Play.

Mr. Walker is hard up for a head to hit when he writes such unmitigated nonsense as this from Fair Play. We did not say that business, under a secular Sunday law, shall be suspended, but that it may be, by those who so choose. If anyone desires to work, let him, precisely as he can work now on the Fourth of July. Let anyone who wants, keep his store open, and let anyone who so elects trade with him. Sunday should be a legal non day simply to protect mercantil paper, and those persons who feel the necessity for rest or recreation.

Our Anarchist editor appears to hav great difficulty in being pleased by anyone but himself, and his captious criticisms are becoming childish.

Two Loving Bodies of Christians.

The Northern and Southern Presbyterians hav failed to unite, because the Southern Christians can not yet recognize the negro as a man and brother. The Northern Calvinists demanded that at the South colored Presbyterians shall be admitted to full equality with white Presbyterians in the Christian brotherhood, but the Southern committee insist that they shall be kept apart in an organization of their own, and which shall not hav the right of representation in the general assembly of a united church.

It is apparent that the Northern Presbyterians are moved by hypocritical motivs in making this demand, for they do not comply with it themselvs, and neither do the other Protestant denominations. The black Christians always hav their own churches, and we doubt very much if Dr. Hall, for instance, would admit a full-blooded negro to the communion table. But the Northern Presbyterians having extended their mission work in the Southern states and established some hundred black churches, desired that the Southerners should take them to their bosoms, admit them to their presbyteries and synods, and then the entire Northern and Southern Presbyterian bodies could dwell in harmony. The Southern Christians wouldn't. They wanted the negro churches to hav separate presbyteries and synods, and mingle with the whites only in the general assembly. The Northern churches in turn refused, and the two bodies of loving brethren could only agree to disagree.

It is probable, therefore, that the hypocrisy of the Northern and the prejudices of the Southern Presbyterians will always prevail to keep alive sectional animosity. But what will they do when they get to heaven? Will the negroes hav separate apartments in Abraham's bosom, and sit on the far-off corners of the stools around the throne of grace?

The Pope's Italians.

The pope has written to the bishops in this country that the Italians now here are in great danger of losing their souls because of the difficulty in meeting priests who speak the Italian language. This danger, the pope says, attends them both on the voyage over and on their arrival. Hence he proposes to send over some Italian reverends, and desires the bishops to extend to them all possible facilities for a successful hunt for souls.

To one conversant with the physical degradation of our Italian population it would seem that the pope's solicitude should be for their bodies rather than for their souls, the possession of which even may be reasonably doubted. On the voyage over they are crowded into small spaces, ill fed, and often brutally treated, and they arrive here hungry, dirty, and diseased. Morality is almost unknown. Almost every girl of sixteen has a child, whether married or not. Quarrels are of the most frequent occurrence. Honesty is a word for which they hav no Italian equivalent. They are sober only when deprived of the means of getting drunk. When ashore they herd together in the filthiest of tenement houses. They gather stale beer and drink themselvs into beastly intoxication. They obtain only the most menial of occupations, and liv in dirty barracks wherever they are digging aqueducts or railroad cuts and tunnels. They squander their small wages for drink, fight, and steal from the people dwelling near the field of their occupation. They are swindled by unscrupulous contractors, and they revenge themselvs by being about as low down in the scale of civilization as it is possible for human beings to descend. Compared with the Roman Catholic Italians the heathen Chinese are respectable citizens.

If the pope will set a lot of his priests to looking after their physical welfare, if he will make them honest, moral, peaceable, sober, and clean, he will find that their souls will take care of themselvs. They hav religion enough now. What they need is a bath.

Editorial Notes.

THE Buffalo Courier publishes a paragraph intimating that George Chainey has turned Methodist. This would not surprise us. George hasn't called in here for a long time, though his office, from which he proposed to publish Psyche, a Theosophical magazine, is but three minutes distant. The magazine has not appeared, but perhaps we shall hav it soon as a Christian Advocate. If his reversion to his old faith is really a fact, he might get up a debate with his old colleague Charles Watts. It would be worth traveling a long way to hear.

THE volume of Horace Seaver's writings, compiled by his friend Washburn, is now for sale. It is called "Occasional Thoughts from Fifty Years of Freethinking." There is much sound wisdom, deep philosophy, and knowledge of human nature displayed in the articles, and the writer can shake hands with himself for not having been once betrayed by his pen. The book was compiled with the desire to preserve the writings of one who has honored the cause of Freethought by his ability and devotion, and who is honored and respected by thousands of his fellow-beings as the Nestor of Liberalism. As we hav said before, it is a sort of memorial volume which every friend of the aged editor will certainly desire to possess, not only for the book itself, but for its author's sake. The price is only one dollar.

LEIGHTON, ALA., Dec. 17, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav seen several solvers in THE TRUTH SEEKER about the hen-and-egg question, so I thought I would send my answer. I worked a long time on it, and got twenty-eight eggs every time. If one hen in one and one-half days can lay one egg, six hens in one and one-half days can lay six eggs; one hen in seven days can lay four and two-thirds eggs; six hens in four and two-thirds days can lay twenty-eight eggs—answer. I hope this is correct.

LIBBIE C. TROUTMAN (aged fifteen years).

NATIONAL MILITARY HOME, WIS., Dec. 22, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 15th I perceive the hen-and-egg question is still worrying some of your readers. I offer this as the solution. If a hen lays an egg in a day and a half it will lay four eggs in six days; consequently six hens would lay twenty-four eggs. The good hens performed all their work in six days, and on the seventh rested—keeping it holy. S. F. Haseltine would hav been correct had he omitted the seventh day, as the time had not arrived for another egg to be laid. No hen that I hav ever heard of laid two-thirds of an egg.

CHAUNCEY BROWN.

BUSHNELL, ILL., Dec. 19, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I see three attempts to help out "Constant Reader," in the issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 15th. They all differ, like the different religious creeds, and I think they are all wrong. I will giv my statement of the problem. If a hen and a half lay an egg and a half in a day and a half, how many eggs will six hens lay in seven days?

Hen.		Hens.		Eggs.
1.5 days.	:	6 days.	:	1.5
2.25		42

2.25) 63 (28 eggs.

S. WEST.

BRONSTON, KY., Dec. 17, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I would not hav said a word about the hen-and-a-half, egg-and-a-half, and day-and-a-half puzzle if Miss Ella E. Gibson had not said that the six hens would lay forty-two eggs in seven days. Now, this is the way I work it. I divide my six hens into four squads, a hen and a half in each squad. At the end of three days I collect three eggs from each squad, which givs twelve eggs in three days for the six hens. That is undoubtedly four eggs per day for the six hens. The balance is easy—four times seven are twenty-eight. If that is not correct, Mr. Tribune and Mr. TRUTH SEEKER, I will engage to eat all the eggs the six hens will lay in a twelve months' scratch. Now, Ella dear, you must not make such a mistake soon again. J. N. BROWN.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., Dec. 3, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The pathetic appeal of "Constant Reader" in your issue of the 1st inst. touched my heart, and I set to work at his hen problem, which really at first did look puzzling. But it is only the ridiculous verbiage of the statement which makes it so.

"If a hen and a half lay an egg and a half in a day and a half, how many eggs will six hens lay in seven days?"

Let us translate the data into decimal fractions, and we hav 1.5 hens lay 1.5 eggs in 1.5 days. All these may, according to a familiar rule, be multiplied by ten without changing their relations. Therefore fifteen hens will lay fifteen eggs in fifteen days; and therefore, again, one hen lays one egg a day. Six hens in seven days will lay six times seven, or forty-two eggs. There are many similar questions which depend for their puzzling qualities solely on a labyrinth of words. In England, where twelve pence make a shilling, one of them was, "If a herring and a half are sold for three half-pence, how many can be bought for a shilling?" The answer, of course, was twelve; but many people lost themselvs among the words, and could not find it.

LITTLE EGG HARBOR, Dec. 16, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Your egg puzzle by "Constant Reader" has awakened some responses, and they greatly differ. Let us work it out by putting the hens to work, loaded up, so to speak, as Si Slokum would say. On Monday morning we will put a hen and a half a hen in our coop. On Monday the whole hen, feeling industrious, lays an egg. That is her part fairly done. On Tuesday forenoon our half hen gets in her work, and at 12 has a half egg on the nest. On Tuesday, immediately after 12, we gather the other half of our hen, put her in the coop with our whole hen and half hen, and she attends to her knitting, and the result is another half egg. On Wednesday morning we put in a fresh whole hen, and she adds an egg by night. At the close of Wednesday, the third day, we hav two whole hens, two whole eggs, two half hens, and two half eggs in our coop. Now, two half hens will make one whole one, two half eggs one whole one, and the three whole hens hav put three whole eggs in the nest in three days, or one egg a day for each hen. Now, six hens at one a day will lay forty-two eggs in seven days. What says Si Slokum? SAGE OF WINTERSETT.

PINE WOODS, N. Y., Dec. 16, 288.

MR. EDITOR: The replies of several of your correspondents in your last paper to "Constant Reader" in regard to the hen-and-egg problem, seem quite likely to place him in the quandary of the "Puzzled Pilgrim," illustrated in your paper a short time since. I hope to persuade him he is not so badly mixed as he might be. I think it fair to assume that the rate of laying should be considered as uniform, and the laying of half a hen equivalent to half the laying of a hen. Then, if a hen and a half lay an egg and a half in a day and a half, they will lay at the rate of an egg per day. If a hen and a half lay at the rate of an egg per day, six hens, being four times one and a half hens, will lay at the rate of four eggs per day, making twenty-eight eggs in seven days. Poultry-keepers, however, sometimes observe that actual experience "knocks out" the nicest mathematical calculations. Perhaps, after all, the most reliable way of ascertaining just how many eggs six hens would lay in seven days, would be to procure the six hens and make an actual test. I do not see how even the Tribune man could withstand the logic of a demonstrated fact. B. M. KNAPP.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., Dec. 18, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Hundreds ask the author every day what it was that exempted his family, him, and his clerks from the yellow fever. The reason, I presume, is because there was no such disease as yellow fever here at Jacksonville. What was it if it was not the yellow fever? Yellow fever consisted in the effect of a false rumor. It scared the public. They advocated the theory that yellow fever was a germ, a microbe, which after sunset floated on the air. They thought that it could be destroyed by concussion, or by adulterating the pure air with powerful poison, which we had to inhale, hence many took sick and died from the remedy employed for the destruction of the microbe. No such silly theory was advocated by me, therefore no poison to rid myself of the microbes was used, and as a natural result we all enjoyed the very best of health. AUGUST BUKSING.

NORSE, TEX., Dec. 17, 288.

MR. EDITOR: We had the pleasure of having Prof. W. S. Bell deliver an able and interesting lecture upon the "The Gods" at Norse, on Nov. 22, 1888. The Old Testament or Bible Jehovah-God was shown up in his true hideousness and moral depravity, as being in fact a moral monstrosity, a mere imaginary being, the fictitious creation of a designing and mercenary priesthood. His attributes ought to create abhorrence, instead of enlisting the adoration of all rational beings.

Some of the young people, nominal Christians, who were present at the lecture will not soon—no, never, perhaps—forget the convincing arguments the professor made. Their old idol was indeed shattered. Seed was sown that undoubtedly will bear fruit.

I only regret that our financial and other circumstances will not permit our having such lecturers oftener. We find our struggle for existence to be indeed hard. Millionaires, trusts, and vast combinations of capitalists are fast gaining control of everything, including the government itself, and we, the people, are being reduced to poverty and serfdom.

HANNIBAL, MO., Dec. 31, 1888.

MR. J. R. PERRY: Your article of Dec. 15, 1888, in THE TRUTH SEEKER, referring to the Brotherhood of Agnostic Moralists as the mushroom society, headquarters Hannibal, Mo., has been perused. You say much of the constitution of the Brotherhood of Agnostic Moralists you cannot object to; your only objection is against article 2, section 4, stated to be to eradicate from the mind all belief in spirits, etc. The framers of the constitution fully comprehended the importance of a separation from all supernaturalism. The true Liberal disbelieves the old book called Bible being of divine inspiration. To it modern Spiritualism adheres to prove its position of a world hereafter to exist, spiritual or otherwise. Such delusion has called forth a disregard of any such belief and created the constitution of the Brotherhood of Agnostic Moralists, to which over five hundred, in one year, of the brightest minds in the United States and Canada hav signed their names and given their support. Judging from the success so far obtained, we hav reason to believe that this society will not be so short-lived as you predict.

F. H. RAU.

TO THE REV. GEO. W. SWEENEY, EDITOR CHRISTIAN INDEPENDENT, OAKLAND, CAL.

MY DEAR GEORGE: I use the adjectiv prefixed to your name, because I do still hold you dear in memory. Six months now hav gone since I wrote you an open letter in these columns offering you a fee of $25. I hav not been drawn upon for the money, although the First National holds the stakes, thus to say, and I can only conclude that you hav not earned the cash. It was my hope that you would come forward as all your brethren do when a fee is lying round and take the same in for the benefit of the Lord, who, poor and dejected, so much needs the last scrapings of the widow's locker. You did not see my offer? Well, I iterate. If you will write a little article for THE TRUTH SEEKER and separate the foreknowledge and foreordination of God almighty, you will be sent a draft for $25. To you this ought to be a bonanza—bigger than marrying some poor wight—or better than the pay for words of doubtful import spoken at a funeral. Of course, you get pay for a "send off" when you start a couple, telling them and their friends and the bystanders that God has joined them, and no ruthless hand should sunder the ties. Yes. By the authority of God you start them along life's fitful journey, and when the ruthless hand that never tires does part them, one to go down to hades, you appear again, and for another fee set the lost one going on a final "send off" to that place of which you know just nothing. Being, as thusly apparent, in the fee business, why not respond to my call? I make it in behalf of a large and intelligent body of men and women who are constant readers of their cherished paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER. When I say intelligent, I mean that I will pit them against ten times their number of readers of so-called Christian papers, for intelligence and real appreciation of all facts and theories presented. These friends are now panting for knowledge. If God's skirts could only be cleared of the stain of first knowing everything that would happen, then damning mankind for being there and doing the very things he knew they would do, then his character would be redeemed of its hideous aspect, now so much dreaded by the credulous. Hail, happy day, George, when you will settle this important question. If you had stuck to your original calling of teaching children facts, science, philosophy, and usefulness, you would hav been of value, but teaching dogmas, isms, and ologies is of no use here and less hereafter.

Let us hear from you soon. JOHN BUSHEL.

ROCHESTER, Dec. 17, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 for another year's subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Orthodoxy says that God has implanted a conscience in every person, telling him when he is doing right or wrong. Now, if that is so, how is it that we all do not hav the same kind? If a Roman Catholic was to waste any of his holy water, his conscience would condemn him; but a Protestant might upset a barrelful of his conscience and it would not trouble him. I take no stock in the conscience theory. I believe it is the result of education and training. I would like very much if Colonel Ingersoll could spare time and giv us through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER his views on the subject of conscience, as I do not know of any person that could handle that subject as well as he could. By doing so he would greatly oblige, G. F. THOMPSON.

ST. JOSEPH, MO., Dec. 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: "The world moves." I picked up a paper this morning containing, with other items, under the heading, "The Pope's Support Appreciated," the following sentence: "The bishops draw attention to the great importance of the University (the one now building at our capital), which they believe will act as a bulwark against the rise of Rationalism and Freethought in America." Just how it will act as a bulwark is a mystery I cannot solve. It will further serve to disgust all Freethinking, reasonable people to see another building erected, costing millions of dollars, in which will be stuck, maybe in an obscure corner, a chapel. This will free the whole gigantic mass of priestly imposition from paying any taxes. A few more millions of dollars appropriated by a lot of lecherous priests to perpetuate their horrid mummeries and anti-republican, anti-democratic notions brought from the dead past! Go ahead, though. Instead of such influences serving as a "bulwark against Freethought and Rationalism in America," i. e., against liberty and reason, it will strengthen the nineteenth-century lovers of liberty, who can behold in such wanton expenditure of money in the erection of useless universities only a grand scheme of robbery; an entering wedge in the very heart of our government to split it asunder; a great aristocratic temple erected to draw the wool over the eyes of the representativs of the people at Washington. How very appropriate that a second Vatican temple should be built at our American capital! Continue to usurp authority. Make yourselvs obnoxious by your opposition to our free schools (which we admit must be improved), and before you are aware of it, a mighty "ground swell" will arise all over the United States that will place a right estimate on the destructiv inroads of Catholicism against liberty and reason. Then no army large enough will be found to protect your priestly palaces. BREAD WINNER.

Dec. 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I admire THE TRUTH SEEKER for its Liberality in giving all sides a chance to be heard, but don't you think that as the organ of the Secular Union, you are yielding valuable space that might be used to further the interest of the Nine Demands, when you giv so much of it to the discussion of that sum of all superstition, Spiritualism? Why not let the believers in that humbug use the space of their own papers to discuss the merits of their own folly? For one, I decidedly object to the valuable columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER being filled with such trash that ought to be used in defending and propagating the Nine Demands. I know I shall be accused of ill-Liberalism for objecting to this, but I cannot see any good reason why the organ of the Liberal League should be prostituted in this way. If Spiritualists hav anything to say for or against any of the Nine Demands, giv them all the room they want, but to use our organ in debating a question that has not the least bearing on these Demands, seems to me to be a wrong that I must protest against. There are many things relating to this world that might reasonably be discussed in THE TRUTH SEEKER, such as the assaults of the Catholic church on our public schools, the selling out of the Knights of Labor by Powderly to the same church; also, as is the case in one of our schools here, giving the use of the school-house every Sunday to Presbyterians for a Sunday-school, and many other questions that show us the danger to our liberties from the encroachments of the churches. But to prostitute the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER by discussing table-tipping, etc., is too bad. You might as well fill your columns with astrology, witchcraft, or any other exploded demonology. You would serve the purpose of the Secular Union just as well.

In your words of caution to J. K. P. Baker you say, Spiritualism is a subject your readers seem to never tire of discussing. I believe you are mistaken in this. As long as you will giv them space I hav no doubt you will find cranks enough to occupy it, but if you could get a statement from the majority of your readers, you would find they are heartily tired of it; they merely grin and bear it for the sake of the good sense they find in the paper. With that exception it is not many that will take the trouble to complain, as they do not wish to be drawn into any controversy. They prefer to drop the paper when it gets to be more of a Spiritual organ than the organ of the Secular Union. And more, I believe the inconsistency of a paper like THE TRUTH SEEKER and members of the Secular Union countenancing such superstition causes many to shun the Secular Union itself.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., Dec. 24, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Being an old advocate of women's rights, I want to call you as witness to the refutation of certain masculin assertions afforded by the late election in Boston. The lord of creation saith, "The women would vote just the same as their husbands, and so the number of votes would be doubled, but the result not changed." You say, "The women decided the election." The lord saith, "The women are the special victims of priestcraft, and their votes will be against intellectual liberty." (Not very consistent with his former assertion, by the by, but who ever expects consistency from a lord of anything?) You say: "The motiv moving the women was the attempt of the Romanists to control the schools in the interest of the Catholic church. . . . 'Elect no more Roman Catholics to the school board' has been their cry." The lord saith, "Women don't want to vote, and, unless forced to, wouldn't vote if they could." You say, "More earnest workers than the women were never seen." The lord saith, "The scenes of a heated election are not fit for women to witness." You say, "Their presence at the polls was conduciv to good order, and at one place a row was stopped by the policeman exclaiming that there were ladies present and that talk of the kind being indulged in was out of place." The lord saith: "The ballot and the bullet go together. Women ought not, and, indeed, cannot, vote unless they are prepared to fight also." You say, "Only in one instance, quickly suppressed, did the roughs attempt to annoy them." In conclusion you say, very truly, that if the Protestants replace Catholic with Protestant dogmas the change is not of much account. I feel moved to add, neither is voting anyway. Absolute personal liberty is, in the noble language of our collegians, "the cheese" for women and men alike. But the election at Boston shows that women are benefited by every extension of freedom, however small, in the same way and to the same extent as men.

MAYO, MAINE, Dec. 3, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: G. H. Dawes, of Pittsville, Wis., gave us a lecture last Friday evening. His subject was, "Has Christianity Benefited Woman?" His lecture was systematically arranged. He spoke fluently, without hesitation, showing that he was master of his subject. Considering the small audience—not over twenty-five persons, though nearly one-half women—it was hard work for him to talk in a large hall to empty seats. Political and church interests combined held the people back from attending a free lecture. It would require the mental force of a second Ingersoll to bring out an audience to an Agnostic lecture here. We hav a strong Catholic society here, with which one of the old parties is in league; whilst the other party is in league with the Methodist and Congregational societies, hence the leading politicians gave us a cold shoulder. But in a financial respect we were more successful. Though I am the only Liberal here that could take an activ part in doing anything toward defraying the expenses of the lecture, for Mr. C. B. Haseltine, another member of THE TRUTH SEEKER family here, is rather too old and infirm to giv any assistance. Mr. Dawes came here without knowing that I could raise anything for him. But I succeeded in raising a subscription of $14. Twenty-two persons contributed. Amongst those that are considerably advanced toward full-fledged Liberalism—for I cannot consider any person a full-fledged Agnostic who can afford to hav an Agnostic publication but does not subscribe for one—are D. N. Smith, leading hardware merchant and tinsmith; Fred Johns, editor of our local newspaper; John Hodgson, retired farmer.

I must do considerable more missionary work before we will venture to hav another lecture here. I hav distributed the American Secular Union tracts which Mr. Dawes left me, and I am distributing copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER and Freethinkers' Magazine to the best advantage. Mr. Haseltine informed me that he was doing the same thing.

WILBER, NEB., Dec. 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The cartoon in the issue of December 6th is one of Heston's happiest hits. Truly, there is a world of error to remove. Free thought, free speech, free press will do it—in time. The controversies constantly kept up in your columns are educativ. Ill-nature should never mar such a symposium. Why should not these intellectual contests be always sweet-tempered? Let hard hits be given and taken good-humoredly. It is easily perceived by the impartial readers or hearers when an opponent is hard-pressed—when he or she loses temper, as is shown when the hard words which usually accompany soft arguments are fired off. Rancor, bitterness, offensiv personalities, bootblack epithets are not only signs of weakness, but do not clarify truth nor settle anything but the mental infirmity of the author of such trivialities. For more than a generation we hav been saying, to the Christian world especially, that we deal with systems, principles, and not with persons merely.

This appears to be a hard lesson, naturally enough, for Christians to learn; for their Jehovah, they believe, will roast a man for an honest difference of opinion. But it ought to be an easy lesson for all Freethinkers. Is it? For my part, I think if we study the matter carefully, we will find that every fundamental principle of Freethought will incline us to harbor no malice toward Christians, however badly they misbehave toward us. We cannot, in reason, expect them to see the elements of Universal Mental Liberty as clearly as we do who hav spent years in studying them.

Last night I attended a "literary" in the Olive Branch school-house, near my friend Jason Bloodgood's fine Nebraska farm three miles from Lowell. Such debating lyceums are splendid intellectual training schools, in which young and old learn to "think on their feet." The people are interested in hearing both sides, hence the building was crowded. The "study" last night was Miss Alcott. In time it will be Voltaire, Paine, Hume, Gibbon, Shelley, and the rest of those terrible fellows called iconoclasts, but really chain-breakers.

After a few year's silence on the rostrum I am at it again. I may be addressed, until further notice, at Wilber, Neb.

W. F. JAMIESON.

MT. UNION, O., Dec. 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I must tell you about the little affair we had this summer with a preacher, and one of the members of his church, a man that we were well acquainted with. One morning, as my husband was getting ready to go out to mow, in came two buggies, out jumped two men and hitched their horses, and by that time my husband had got around to where they were, and this man shook hands with him and then introduced him to the Rev. Mr. Zumpe, or Donkey, or some such name—the latter I think most appropriate. Well, they did not exactly come to see us, but they saw us all the same. My old mother was staying with us, and they said they came to hav a little talk with her. But the preacher did not get permitted to come in the house; my husband told him he might be a nice man, but as he was a stranger we did not know, as many of them were not to be trusted. He told him just to stay outside of the house and talk to him. He told him we did not take any stock in his kind of cloth; that preachers were a nuisance and that they went around imposing upon people. Then the reverend got a little wrathy and said he did not come here to be insulted. We told him there was his horse and buggy—he could just take it and go out where he came in. He thought he was a little god when he came, and owned this little earth, but he found out before he left that there was one little spot he did not own on that particular occasion. He wanted to know where we ever saw or heard of preachers imposing upon people, so I went and got him a paper we had got a day or two before. That told about a man at Youngstown, O.. His wife belonged to the Presbyterian church, and she took sick and the preacher and the members came every morning and sat and talked all day. He ordered them away, and they came the more. So he had to get the sheriff to serve warrants on them to keep off his premises. He read it, and asked if he could take the paper with him. We told him he could hav it. We told him we did not need any preacher to stand between us and God and tell us what to do, as he did not know any more about a God than we did. And we told him no intelligent man could preach from that Bible without doubting it. We said we would giv him $150 if he would read a chapter out of the Bible to his audience and let us select it, but he did not accept the offer. When they started to go away my husband told this man to go home and go to doctoring horses, as he was a veterinary surgeon, and get a potato patch for the preacher and let him go to raising potatoes, as that would be a much more respectable business than what they were at.

If preachers would get more of that kind of receptions they would not be a-poking their noses in where they hav no business. Bring on your preachers; we can giv them a send-off.

Well, I must say something about some good folks. There is Heston; I must thank him for getting up that hose company. May he liv to see the last spark put out, and then he need not be afraid of going to hell. And there is our good Editor; may he liv to wear out many new hats.

Yours truly, MRS. S. A. FITZPATRICK.

JASPER, TENN., Dec. 27, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find check for $5, for which send me "Why Did Not God Kill the Devil?" and other Freethought literature, selection left to yourself. I am running a newspaper in Jasper, and owing to the priest-ridden, fanatical sentiment of my patrons I dare not utter a sentiment tinctured with Infidelity lest I raise a howl of "Stop my paper!" You cannot imagin the situation of a fellow who is brimful of ambition, so smothered up with opposition that he is unable to get a long breath. I dare not advertise Freethought papers or pamphlets for fear of incurring censure and pecuniary loss. I hav a terrible reputation religiously, and according to orthodoxy am on the steep grade sliding into that country that has no icebergs. THE TRUTH SEEKER is the best paper on my exchange list, edited with the most brains and with the brainest corps of correspondents of any paper that reaches me. If I could get enough Liberal support to my paper from Liberals to keep the pot boiling I would copy largely from THE TRUTH SEEKER correspondents in its columns, and let home folks hav a treat they little dream of. As it is, I am confined to political issues, which are so mixed that the average reader is not competent to grapple with them.

The TRUTH SEEKER ALMANAC for 1889, and "Was Jesus Insane?" came to hand, and were read with deep interest. The ALMANAC is replete with historical events that ought to be in the hands of every seeker after truth and knowledge. The questions asked and answered by the different parties in the ALMANAC it would pay every thinking individual to study and ponder. They are of vital interest to our free institutions. The ignorance and superstition of the masses, through the medium of the churches, more especially the Roman Catholic church, is sapping the foundation of our republic. It is of the greatest importance that the people be educated out of the ruts of superstition of every grade. Fanatical Christians are moving everything within their power to get God in the Constitution, and the Sabbath established by law as a day of worship. The disorganized and scattered forces of Liberals are no match for the organized and concentrated efforts of the various denominations of Christians, who will leave no stone unturned to accomplish their ends. I hardly feel qualified to giv any other remedy for the existing danger to our freedom, except the one of education; and how to accomplish the education of the millions of illiterate children of the country is a problem that wiser heads than mine will hav to solve. If the Blair bill or some similar measure could be passed into a law it would greatly facilitate the education of our children in the common school branches, yet we would hav the ever-present religious fanatic at the head of our school boards, and as principal in the preceptor's chair. If Liberals were able, a great deal could be accomplished by sending out tracts and scattering them broadcast through the land the same as the church now does. One finds quotations from the Bible on car seats in railroad cars, posted up on the sides of the cars where all who can read cannot help but observe them, and they are carried by colporteurs and left in each family of the land both rich and poor. In this way the churches scatter their doctrins where they will do the most good. Liberals might profit by their example. I am a poor man, and in debt, paying interest of twelve per cent, because I am not able to release myself from the clutches of the usurer. Hav a large family of girls to feed and clothe and educate, or I would giv liberally to the cause of freedom and independence, for I feel the galling effects of the chains of fanaticism. If any who are able will send me the documents I will sow them broadcast where they will sprout up and grow into trees whose shades will tend to relieve the minds of our country from the heat of superstition. I will take the time to go to the houses of those who are not church-members, and to such members of churches as I think can be induced to read, and leave such tracts with them to be read at their leisure.

Wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER the widest circulation of any journal existing, I am, Respectfully, AMOS L. GRIFFITH, Editor and proprietor of Sequachee Herald, formerly Sequachee Sun.

COALING, ALA., Dec. 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 15th inst. Mr. Perry makes some statements in regard to spirit phenomena, as well as Mr. McArthur in previous numbers. Now, I wish to ask those gentlemen and others some favors and some questions. I hav a dead child. Will they tell me the name, age, and sex of it? Also will they send me a picture of it? I will pay handsomely for the picture, if it is like mine. That I am a skeptic is certain; but I am rational enough to know we believe as we can. Many things that I would like to believe I can't, and vice versa. As there is no one here that can giv any information concerning the questions, if they are answered correctly it might go far in convincing me. I buried my child without any parade of a clergyman, or, as is the custom in backwoods, of singing. Sincere grief or love seeks quiet and privacy. The singing over the dead is a sorry sight to me. The poet expressed my idea in that beautiful poem, "The Burial of Sir John Moore." Will Mr. Perry or McArthur say it is more difficult to write between slates than to hold the arms extended and pass a dollar from one to the other, or throw a quarter into the middle of a ball, or cut off the head of a chicken or man and put it back, or thrust a knife through the arms? Some see these things apparently done, and believe they are done. Please explain how some are honest in believing and others know it is not true.

Now, I had a friend that was many years my senior. In his young days he was an Infidel. He finally became a Spiritist. I said, "If I die first I will come to you, and if you die first come to me." He has been dead some time, but has not come. He liked me much. I wrote him a question in his lifetime that interested me much. Will any medium tell me what that question was? Will they tell me who was the person? I hav paper and pencils in my desk; why don't the spirits write on them if they require a screen and darkness? I hav gone to the grave of some of my dead time and again; nothing comes. There is a clock in my house that belonged to my brother in life. He gave it to mother. It has been broken for fifteen years—broken all to pieces, and has not run for that time. Yet all along it strikes one tick, and no more. The house is as steady as a brick wall. No amount of shaking will cause that phenomenon. Yet summer and winter for fifteen years it has performed that striking without winding. It was suggested that it might be spirit manifestations, so I put a card in it. But no writing. So you see I was willing to investigate and believe if I could. Why don't murdered people tell who murdered them and keep innocent people from being hanged for the murder? Why don't fathers and mothers speak to their erring children when they are pursuing the road to ruin? To my thinking, this spirit business is too thin. With all the vexations attending this life, it is the best I ever expect to see. It is a question to me whether or not every person does not hav the same amount of pleasure and trouble. One that has but little trouble has little pleasure. To illustrate: a person dying for water or bread would esteem the vilest water or bread a greater bounty than one who was not in want would the purest water or finest bread. So of all conditions. The sooner man learns that this life is all, the sooner he will be a better man; for the reason that if he thinks he will liv again and be better off in some other sphere he will try to rough it here and on the morrow better his condition, or at least trust to luck. I don't puzzle myself with how I came here. I know I am here, and will go away. That life feeds on life; as I knew nothing before I was capable of reasoning, so I shall know nothing after I am dead. The man that looks on his family and surroundings and thinks that when they are gone they are forever gone, will think more of them here. He will not thiuk to make up for his shortcoming here somewhere else. Now, I hav not written this to get up a correspondence, but for information. I will walk out of house and home, goods and chattels, just to hav my child back in this world.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Tongue.

"The boneless tongue, so small and weak,
Can crush and kill," declared the Greek.

"The tongue destroys a greater horde,"
The Turk asserts, "than does the sword."

The Persian proverb wisely saith,
"A lengthy tongue—an early death."

Or sometimes takes this form instead,
"Don't let your tongue out off your head."

"The tongue can speak a word whose speed,"
Say the Chinese, "outstrips the steed."

While Arab sages thus impart,
"The tongue's great storehouse is the heart."

From Hebrew wit the maxim sprung,
"Though feet should slip, ne'er let the tongue."

Good Resolutions.

If you're waking, call me early, call me early, mother dear,
For I've a heap to resolute upon this glad New Year;
There's lot's of things I'm going to say that I'm a-going to do,
And I kind of hope in a thousand things I'll manage to keep a few.

I'm going to do the very best that ever a fellow can,
And I will make no friendship with a very angry man;
I will not look upon the wine when it is glowing red,
So may my evening hat sit loose upon my morning head.

I will not loaf with sinners at the corner of the street;
Nor will I talk about myself to everyone I meet;
I'll be the good boy of the school, and study all the day,
Nor prod my seatmate with a pin, to see him laugh and play.

I will not lie about my age, my salary, or my weight;
To help indeed, the friend in need, I will not hesitate.
I will not scoff at feeble things, our navy and the poor;
And fractured toys and broken hearts I'll try to mend and cure;

I will not wear my dress-coat when the sun is in the sky;
I will not wear a collar more than seven inches high;
I will be so good and sensible that people in the street
Will lift their hats to me and say, "Ah, Gabriel," when we meet.

Good night, dear mother, sweet good night; nay, do not weep for me,
I am so good to-night, I fear the morn I ne'er may see,
But if I do liv through it, when to-morrow disappears—
You'll likely think your precious boy will liv a hundred years.

Mind Your Words.

Words hav great power. Thought unexpressed is a hidden force. A spoken thought becomes a thing of life. It is an arrow piercing the heart and felt for a lifetime, or it may be a gift that lasts forever, breathing sweetest incense, blessing the heart that has received it and bestowing constant and purest joy. "Silence is golden. Speech is silver." To know when and where to apply the gold of silence or to giv the silver of speech is one of the fine arts. A word once sent forth cannot be recalled. It is gone forever on its path of joy or sorrow. Many a person would giv worlds to recall one single thoughtlessly spoken word—a word that gave sorrow and pain and despair to some sensitiv heart. It is of no use. The word has gone forth. It comes no more back. All the honeyed phrases, all the sweet love-words in the language, cannot rub out that one word, that had its mission for grief or gladness. If for gladness, there is no wish to recall it, for it is that which giveth sorrow and pain that people desire to recall.

Then be careful of your words. Strive that they be always gentle, loving, and humane—that they may giv peace and hope instead of pain and woe.

Many a word at random spoken,
May heal or wound a heart that's broken.

A LITTLE daughter of a family on Alfred street was teasing her mother, who at last said hastily: "Do be patient, child, be patient." "I don't want to," retorted the little girl. "That's what they put in the ambulance."

Correspondence.

MONTE VISTA, COL., Dec. 29, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am a little girl eight years old. This is my first letter to the Children's Corner.

My papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I like it very much.

I go to school and study the fourth reader, grammar, arithmetic, and geography. I am taking music lessons, too.

Please find stamps, ten cents for the Casey dime fund and ten cents for the Hacker family. Yours truly, LAURA MANSON.

OAK MILLS, KAN., Dec. 25, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I hav nothing to do at present, I will occupy the time in writing to you. I go to school almost every day. Our teacher, Miss Schiffbauer, is a Freethinker, and was once a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav been reading some good poems lately; among them were Longfellow's "Evangeline," Bryant's "Thanatopsis," Whittier's "Snow Bound," Tennyson's "Enoch Arden," and Campbell's "Gertrude of Wyoming." I hav also been reading "Essays," by Ralph Waldo Emerson, and must say that they are perfect gems, produced by one of the world's greatest master minds. I am a great admirer of Emerson, and read his poems, essays, and other writings with deep interest. They should find a welcome place in every American home.

I read your article entitled, "Humanity Abroad," in the last TRUTH SEEKER, and it is very good, and instructiv.

To-day is Christmas, but it is dreary, as it has been raining all day. I gave my sister Lura a copy of Aunt Elmina's "Little Lessons" for a Christmas present, and she seems to be interested in it. Every child in America should hav your "Story Hour" and Aunt Elmina's "Little Lessons."

I just received a copy of the Open Court, published at Chicago, and am very much pleased with its form and contents.

Well, as I hav nothing more to write, I will close, ever remaining,

Your true friend, GEO. J. REMSBURG.

[We are always pleased to hear from George. He is one of our brave boys upon whom the world must depend in the days that are to come. The editor of the Corner feels proud and happy when she thinks of all her bright boys and girls who hav classed themselvs as true Liberals. By and by, their influence will be a great power in the land.—ED. C. C.]

The Center of the United States.

An army officer now in Chicago asked the other day: "Do you know where the exact geographical center of the United States is? Never thought anything about it, probably? Well, it's marked by a grave—that of Major Ogden, of the United States army, who died at Fort Riley, in Kansas, in 1855, during the cholera epidemic of that year. Major Ogden's remains were afterward removed to Fort Leavenworth and buried in the national cemetery there, but his monument still stands on a knoll a little to the northeast of the post—Fort Riley—and it lifts its head toward the clouds in the exact geographical center of the United States. This isn't a conceit; it's a fact, though probably of the hundreds of men now at the fort not one in a hundred ever stops to think about it. Fort Riley is a few miles east of Junction City, Kan., and is one of the most important cavalry posts in the country."

Babies of the Antipodes.

Thomas Stevens, one of the editors of Outing, thus describes, in Babyhood, a curious sight that he saw in China:

One day when traveling through China on my bicycle tour around the world, I came upon a very novel and interesting sight. It is the first thing of the kind I ever saw or heard about. My overland journey led me through many out-of-the-way districts where the people are primitiv and curious in many respects. In one of these obscure communities, in the foot-hills of the Mae-Ling mountains, I saw about twenty Chinese infants tethered to stakes on a patch of greensward, like so many goats or pet lambs. The length of each baby's tether was about ten feet, and the bamboo stakes were set far enough apart so that the babies would not get all tangled up. Each baby had a sort of girdle or Kammerbund around his waist, and the end of the tether-string was tied to the back of this. Some of the little celestials were crawling about on all-fours; others were taking their first lessons in the feat of standing upright by steadying themselvs against the stake they were tied to.

What queer little Chinese mortals they all looked, to be sure, picketed out on the grass-land like a lot of young calves whose mothers were away for the day! In this respect they did, indeed, resemble young calves; for I could see their mothers at work in a rice-field a few hundred yards away. All the babies seemed quite contented with their treatment. I stood looking at them for several minutes, from pure amusement at their unique position; but, although they regarded me with wide-eyed curiosity, I never heard a whimper from any of them. Nobody was paying the slightest attention to them, and from appearances I should conclude that they were most likely picketed out in this manner every fine day while their mothers worked in the neighboring fields. Very probably these Chinese babies soon come to regard their daily outing at the stake with the same degree of satisfaction that very Young America derives from his perambulator ride on sunny afternoons in the park.

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

When Chaplain McCabe was in Kansas last year, on a tour to raise $1,000,000 for missions, a little boy heard his appeal, and thinking of the large sum he had to raise, determined to help him. The first chance he had early in the week, he gathered a basketful of chestnuts, which he sold for five cents. He sent this to Mr. McCabe, with the note: "If you want any more, let me know."

Fond mother (showing off her son to the parson): "Would you believe it, sir? He can read fluently in any part of the Bible; repeat the whole of the catechism, and weed onions as well as his father." Hopeful son: "Yes, sir-ee; and yesterday I licked Ned Wilson, throwed the cat in the well, and stole old Brown's gimlet."

"And now, children," remarked the superintendent, "what happened to those people who reviled Noah and refused to heed his warning? Where did they find themselvs when the flood came?" "In de soup!" exclaimed a class of newsboys on the back seat with one voice.

Science Column.

Sumach.

Anna, dear little girl, has just brought a bunch of beautiful sumach fruit. "Tell me about it," she says in such a way, leaning upon my knees, that I cannot resist the appeal.

Anna tastes it, and says it has a lovely acid flavor, very agreeable. That is due to a quality of lime. The color is lovely, too—a rich, dark, crimson-like velvet. Boiling water poured upon this fruit makes a nice drink in sickness.

There are twelve varieties of sumach in this country. The sumach is not a tree, but a shrub from two to twelve feet high. When it grows to the hight of the last-named number, it may, however, be called a tree. It blooms in June, and its flowers are small and a pale green in color. They hav a spicy taste. Some kinds are poisonous, others not. The dwarf and stag's horn sumach are the most common in northern latitudes. The Indians are fond of smoking the leaves of the sumach, and they call it "killikinick." The berries are used for coloring purposes as well as for medicin. Tannin is found in this fruit of the sumach in large quantities.

One of the varieties of sumach is known as the poison ivy. Its fruit is white and brown, and is poisonous, as its name indicates. This is a running vine, and, although it has medicinal properties, it is exceedingly poisonous to some people. So, also, are the dogwood and a species of elder, whose flowers are very beautiful but dangerous to handle. In the West Indies there is a lovely kind of sumach bearing rich scarlet berries, but this is also poisonous. You hav sometimes seen the "smoke tree," so called. Nursery folks call it the purple-fringe tree. This is a kind of sumach, and resembles a tree enveloped in clouds.

The lacquer wood of Japan comes from a tree similar to the sumach, and is poisonous. The Chinese galls are the result of the deposit of eggs in the young shoots of a sumach shrub. The poison sumachs will poison some people who simply pass the shrubs without handling them at all. The poison is due to a chemical acid. The juice of the sumach makes an indelible stain. The sumach grows wild and is quite common. In autumn its foliage is the first to show the scarlet and golden tints of early frost.

S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—What is the flavor of sumach fruit? the color? Did you ever see any sumach? What is it used for sometimes? How many varieties of sumach in this country? Describe it. Which are the more common kinds? What do the Indians do with it? What name do they giv it? What is found in sumach? What is tannin? Tell what you know of poison ivy and dogwood. What of the smoke tree? What is lacquer? What are Chinese galls? Are some people more easy to be poisoned than others? What is the nature of sumach poison?

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this they will probably do so at once.

THOUGHTS ON SCIENCE, THEOLOGY, AND ETHICS.

By JOHN WILSON, M.A.

The object of the book, as expressed in the preface, is to giv a correct sketch of the main lines of modern thought in small compass, and in language simple enough to be easily understood. In other words, it is a condensation of more voluminous writers, and classification of their definitions of science, theology, and ethics, and a statement of what belongs to each. As a text-book to clear thinking and logical reasoning, and a guide in forming scientific conclusions, this book is invaluable. The Literary Guide ranks it as "one of the foremost works of the present century;" while the Freethinker, in "heartily recommending it" as "simple and lucid in style, correct in thought, and ample in information," declares that it "is just the thing to put in the hands of a plain man who desires the best ideas on evolution in relation to science and ethics in a moderate compass."

THE STRUGGLE

FOR

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

The Coming Fight.

M. M. Manoasarian Before the Ethical Society.

The inevitable revival of the old contest between Protestantism and Catholicism has taken place. The mode of warfare is modern, but the spirit is ancient. The lines that divide the two faiths are tightly drawn, and each is arrayed against the other.

We are far advanced in positiv science beyond the Middle Ages, but are we advanced in moral science? Are we less bigoted in our religious views than our forefathers, who instituted the Inquisition? Is the age of sectionalism over in America? Is fanaticism dead? Is the mind of our religious world relieved from bigotry? Hav we received the blessings and benediction which enlightened Christianity is supposed to bestow?

On the contrary, the opposit is the case. The two religions hav recommenced their quarrel, and our free public schools hav been converted into the battlefield for the contestants. How the slumbering fires of hatred hav been inflamed, and to what lengths each side goes in order to denounce the other!

The Protestants in this disgraceful quarrel hav not behaved any better than the Catholics, though they are the more numerous and powerful in this country. Protestants were expected to carry on their side of the controversy with the more dignity, but they hav thus far failed to do so.

There was a law in ancient Sparta that a successful general should not defeat his opponent too frequently, lest his enemy discovered the secret of his success. Catholics by their repeated persecution of Protestants hav taught the Protestants the art of persecution. In Boston, where the spirit of intellectual advancement is supposed to be greater than at any other part of the country, on the eve of the last election one of the great religious orators advised his hearers to learn what ticket the servants intended to vote, and if they did not vote the Protestant ticket to dismiss them. Was there ever bribery more flagrant?

Again, the Catholics hav not behaved any better toward Protestants. The cunning head of the church, ever sharp, shrewd, and skilful, opened a way to American institutions, and will, unless checked, infuse her spirit into them.

The present trouble arose in Boston over one of Swinton's historical text-books used in the public schools. A priest objected to a certain passage describing the abuses existing in the Middle Ages from the selling of indulgences—how the custom encouraged rather than checked crime. It referred entirely to a past age, but this priest declared that it was intended to apply to the present time.

Did not the Puritans, the upholders of free thought and speech in England, persecute whoever disagreed with their religious opinions in this country? Do their descendants object to the truth being told? It was a great mistake to remove Swinton's text-book. I insist upon unsectarianism in our public schools. Our children should learn the truth.

Do Catholics try to spare the feelings of Protestants? Guizot tells children that Martin Luther rebelled against the Roman church because he was mad at the pope's refusal to allow him to sell indulgences. In a book recently published, written by a professor of one of our Catholic colleges, it is stated that the only part the priests took in the massacre of St. Bartholomew was to save as many Protestants as they could, and that the pope's Te Deum, celebrated the day after the butchery, was in thanks for the escape of the royal family from murder!

The pope of Rome has denounced the freedom of the press and free speech as the freedom of perdition. The freedom of the press is an essentially American institution, and any condemnation of it may justly be called treason!

The Jesuit to-day has the same Jesuitical character now as when he was banished from Switzerland, Spain, and France, and who can say but that the safety of our country may necessitate his expulsion from America? In the religious world, Jesuitism is Anarchy.

Let us declare that the old man of the seven mountains interferes with American institutions only at his peril.

There is a terrible conflict ahead. The ambition of the Catholic church is to absorb everything there is of power.

It is said that the Greeks to-day carry a knife in their breasts with which they drill and train every day to be ready for the final conflict when they shall overthrow the Ottoman empire and regain their lost Constantinople.

It is so with the priests of the Catholic church. They are training for the time when the great conflict shall come and the Catholic church shall regain her lost glory and power on the earth. The Catholic priest loves our institutions ouly so far as they tend to serve his ends. Even now he is attempting to hav public money appropriated to his sectarian uses. The audacity of the proposition commands our admiration.

The Catholic church is even now about to establish in Washington a Catholic university. This means money and property, and property means power, and power means corruption.

But the spirit of the age will not tolerate the founding in this country of a religion that threatens to sap our government. Already the Catholic church in America is yielding to surrounding influences.

Merit in the end will decide the contest. The institution that is imbued with the spirit of the age will survive. Make our schools worthy of American institutions, educate broad and Liberal ideas, and we need not fear the Catholic power.

In every religion there is a heroic period. Both Catholics and Protestants hav had their heroic age. Their glory lies in the past, the future lies in Rationalism. There is no hope for the Catholic church in America. Can the Middle Ages with all their barbarity be revived? It is impossible for any systems of the night to prevail over the children of light.

Can Catholics be true American citizens? Yes, if Protestants can. If a Roman Catholic cannot be a true American citizen, neither can a Protestant.

We boast that in this country there is no state church, yet the sessions of the American Congress are opened with prayer by an orthodox clergyman, who is paid from the public treasury. Does this look as though we had no church of state? The Bible, old, and encrusted with dirt, may be found in every court-house in the land, and in many courts of justice the word of an honest Agnostic will not be taken in evidence against a Christian. Every year the president issues a Thanksgiving proclamation calling upon all the people of the land to giv thanks to God for their prosperity.

The Bible is the pocket-book—the pocket God, of Christendom.

Would I do away with all religion from the public schools? Which religion shall we take? If there is no religion without the Bible, and no morality without religion, which religion will you take? Whose religion makes morality? Hav there not been moral men in all religions, and without any religion?

There must be systematic moral education and no sectarian theology in our public schools. Moral education alone saves.

Obituary.

The Liberals of Lake Shore were called upon to mourn the loss of one of their number by death in the person of Mrs. Brash, the wife of Charles Brash, who died Dec. 12, E.M. 288. The Brash family hav been constant readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER for many years, and are among the most outspoken Freethinkers of this district. According to her desire, the funeral was conducted on purely Freethought principles. This being the first of the kind ever conducted upon this plan in this section of the country, it was a novelty to most of the saints, as quite a number were present.

By request of Mr. Brash I made a few appropriate remarks at the residence, and also at the grave. I also read a number of verses from Kingsley's poems, which our departed friend loved to read so much when living. She was a true Freethinker in every sense of the word; her desire was to do all the good she could for poor, suffering humanity. She was always on hand in sickness, and in her way tried to ameliorate the sufferings of humanity in general. In her death the Freethinkers of Lake Shore feel they hav lost a friend and sister. The Christians do not seem to understand the reason that, in the services, we omitted prayer. I told them that our sister did not believe in a god that required prayer. She did not believe she was born in sin. And although she was like all humanity—had her failings—she always said she was not afraid to meet either gods or angels in the hereafter. I closed the services at the grave with the following words: "Dear sister and friend, we hav now committed thee to the tomb. Rest in peace! and from thy unpolluted flesh let violets bloom. I will also rehearse the sublime words of the great Ingersoll, 'That in the night of death hope sees a star, and listening love can hear the rustle of a wing.' Whilst we liv we shall remember thee in love until we also shall follow thee to the great unknown. Until then, at least, we bid you an affectionate farewell."

Lake Shore, Utah. H. S. BROOKS.

Another Freethinker Gone.

DIED.—Near Sub Rosa, Ark., Sept. 7, 1888, Henderson Rice, in his seventieth year.

The deceased had been a clergyman for more than twenty years until some five or six years ago, when, laying aside traditional teachings and orthodox superstition, he became an outspoken Agnostic. Just before he died he requested his friends that the writer should make some remarks at his burial. Below is the address:

FRIENDS: It being the request of my departed brother that I should make some remarks at his grave, in discharging that painful duty we but return to nature what her laws hav given forth. For him life's fitful fever is over. The duties of earth he has nobly filled by generous deeds and free investigation. His religion was the religion of kindness and humanity. He was an independent thinker, and worked for truth, justice, and morality. He was not afraid to die, because he had lived right. He was not afraid of hell—that heathen myth—believing that in all the shining universe there was no room for such a black spot. Our departed brother was a Freethinker because he had burst the shackles of hidebound creeds and dared to think for himself.

His liberality, courage, calmness, and fortitude let us endeavor to emulate. Although our brother is now at rest, his words we still hear urging us on to deeds of right and usefulness.

To him death had no terror, but came as a soothing friend to release him from the toils and sufferings of humanity. In the sere and yellow leaf of his life he passed to "that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns."

Friends, death is that kind friend which takes us by the hand when we are sick and weary, and leads us to the cool and silent shade. In the repose of the tomb our friend has found that eternal rest which is the heritage of the weary. When his end drew near he said: "I die a Freethinker, and am not ashamed of it. No argument can change me; no prayers can make me more resigned to death. I hav lived long enough, and am ready and willing to go." These were his words. So to you, his bereaved friends, I can only say all is well. Our brother feared no angry or vindictiv being beyond the grave, for he believed in no superstition or eternal punishment. And now as the grave closes over his once loved form, may the earth lie lightly on him; may the flowers ever bloom over his grave, while evening zephyrs softly sigh as they herald the coming night. Peace and rest to his ashes, his memory we will always love and cherish. Farewell, a long farewell!

After his death the Christians circulated a report that he recanted—the biggest lie they ever told for Christ's sake.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

Gems of Thought.

THE virtue of a merchant should not be weighed on his own balance. The merits of a creed cannot be proved by its conformity to its own precepts. The standards we should apply are the laws of nature, the revelations of science, and the lessons of history. Such tests would teach us that the love of gloom is a mental disease; that, in a state of nature, every normal function is connected with a pleasurable sensation; that happiness, therefore, is the normal condition of every living creature; that to enjoy is to obey; and that he who deprives himself or his child of any innocent pleasure commits a crime against nature. They would teach us that physical vigor is a prime condition of moral health, and that he who neglects the health-laws of nature sins against his soul as well as against his body. They would teach us that light is the harbinger of happiness, that the sun of science has ripened more blessings in a single year than the moonshine of mysticism in eighteen centuries, that the suppression of free inquiry has never benefited any country, and that faith without reason is not a virtue, but a vice. They would teach us that the love of earth was the gospel of all progressiv nations, that the love of life lends wings to every valiant enterprise, that the love of joy is the parent of every healthy instinct, while the worship of sorrow has never produced anything but monsters and chimeras. They would teach us that pessimism is a blasphemy against the author of life, against the power whose all-sustaining hands furnish the weapons of its very assailants—an insane, impious, and suicidal rebellion against our All-mother Nature, a foe to happiness, and the antithesis of all true religion.—Prof. Felix L. Oswald in The Secret of the East.

BALAAM BLESSETH ISRAEL.

And Balaam lifted up his eyes, and he saw. Israel abiding in his tents according to their tribes; and the spirit of God came upon him. He couched, he lay down as a lion: who shall stir him up? Blessed is he that blesseth thee, and cursed is he that curseth thee.—Num. xxiv, 2, 9.

Odds and Ends.

WE notice that a waterspout burst in Kentucky the other day. A waterspout that would go into business in Kentucky might expect to burst, with no assets.

WINKS: "So you married a divorced woman whose husband is still living. Don't you hate him?" Jinks: "Well, I felt that way at first, but now I'm beginning to sort o' sympathize with him."

"MAMMA!" "Well, my dear?" "What awfully queer ways these Western folks do hav, don't they? I hav been reading an article in the Stock Breeders' Gazette that papa brought home, and it says that cows should hav their corn fed to them in the ear!"

ELDERLY spinster (to dry-goods clerk): "I'll look at some stockin's, mister." Clerk: "Stockings, mum? Yes, mum. Something for yourself?" Elderly spinster (scanning him over her spectacles): "Sartain, young man, d'ye think I'm buyin' stockin's for the neighborhood?"

"THE contribution-box will now be passed for the heathen fund," announced the minister. "'Let your light so shine,' etc." "Why, pa, you put a plugged half dollar on the plate," whispered Miss Bagley. "That's all right," replied the father. "You don't suppose a cannibal knows the difference between that and a good half, do you?"

LITTLE Willie (aged ten): "Mamma, what is an Elite Social Club?" Mamma: "It is a club composed of the choicest people—those who move in the best society." Willie: "Is that what Webster's Dictionary says?" Mamma: "It says that, or the same thing in other words. Why do you ask?" Willie: "I see an advertisment in the paper of the Elite Social Club's dance, and our colored hostler, who sleeps in the stable, and the black cook are the committee on invitation."

WALTER has been put in the corner for being naughty. Mother: "Unless little boys are very good and do what they are told, they will never go to heaven and hav beautiful little angel boys to play with." Walter (after long consideration): "Is heaven very, very bootful? and are there lots of little angel boys?" Mother: "Oh! yes, yes, very beautiful, and full of little angels." Walter: "Ma, suppose I am a very, very good boy, will they let a little devil play with me sometimes?"

"I WANT to be registered as a voter, please," said a tall, slender woman, wearing corkscrew curls and green spectacles, appearing at the office of registration in Boston. "Maria Antoinette Higgins, and I rejoice that I hav the moral courage to do my duty, and boldly, without any foolish, feminin weakness——" "How old are you?" "Sir!" "How old are you, please?" "You don't mean to tell me that I hav to swear how old I am before I can vote?" "Certainly, madam." "Why, I—I—it's a shame! A downright insult, sir! It's a—a—you can just scratch my name off the book, sir, and the country can go to grass for all I care; that's what it can!"

A LITTLE boy of three was playing with his grandmother's work-basket when his mother entered the room and said: "Charles, don't you know that your grandmother has forbid your meddling with her basket?" "Yes," said Charley, "but grandmother is not here." "No, but God is." The child was in deep thought for a few minutes, and, looking up to his mother, said: "I'll take my chances with God saying anything as long as grandmother is not here."

"I OBSERVE," remarked a prospectiv investor in New Jersey real estate, "that your town has no sidewalks, no paved roads, no gas, no water, no police force, no fire department, and no system of drainage." "No," replied the real estate agent, enthusiastically; "we ain't got no time nor no money for them things. This here town is on a boom. It's the future metropolis of the state, and we're jest building houses for all we're worth. Sidewalks! Why, when we've got those houses built up there in the woods on the top of the hill, it'll be time to talk about sidewalks. You don't seem to know what a boom is."

A CLERICAL-LOOKING gentleman, in the hope of obtaining a contribution, entered the office of a newspaper, and finding the editor at his desk, said: "I am soliciting aid for a high-toned gentleman of refinement and intelligence, who is in need of a little ready money, but is too proud to make known his sufferings." "Why," exclaimed the editor, "I'm the only man in town who answers to that description. What's the gentleman's name?" "I'm not at liberty to disclose his name." "It must be me, parson. Heaven bless you and prosper you in your good work," said the editor, wiping away a tear. The editor says that the look the parson gave him as he went out will haunt him in his grave.

WHEN life has been duly rationalized by science, it will be seen that, among a man's duties, care of the body is imperativ, not only out of regard for personal welfare, but also out of regard for descendants. His constitution will be considered as an entailed estate, which ought to pass on uninjured, if not improved, to those who follow; and it will be held that millions bequeathed by him will not compensate for feeble health and decreased ability to enjoy life.—Herbert Spencer.

WHENEVER a country becomes prosperous—and this has been pointed out many times—when a wave of wealth runs over the land, behind you will see all the sons and daughters of genius. The stage is born, and we like it because we love life; and he who likes the stage has a double life. One great thing the stage does is to cultivate the imagination, and the imagination constitutes the great difference between human beings and animals. The imagination is the mother of pity—the mother of every possible virtue.—Ingersoll.

To the principle of government of the universe by law, Latin Christianity, in its papal form, is in absolute contradiction. The history of this branch of the Christian church is almost a diary of miracles and supernatural interventions.—Draper.

ALL religious superstition has had for its basis a belief in at least two beings, one good and the other bad, both of whom could arbitrarily change the order of the universe. The history of religion is simply the story of man's efforts in all ages to avoid one of these powers, and to pacify the other. The first thing that tended to disabuse man's mind was the discovery of order, of regularity, of periodicity, in the universe.—Ingersoll.

CONCEDING to Jesus all the praise that may be due him for many of his utterances, candor and truth compel the averment that his best sayings were not original with him, and if they were not absolutely borrowed they were certainly used by others long before him.—D. M. Bennett.

AND yet we do not provide for the greatest good of life. We take care of our health; we lay up money; we make our roof tight, and our clothing sufficient; but who provides wisely that he shall not be wanting in the best property of all—friends?—Emerson.

IN looking at our age I am struck, immediately, with one commanding characteristic, and that is the tendency in all its movements to expansion, to diffusion, to universality. Human action is now freer, more unconfined. All goods, advantages, helps are more open to all.—Channing.

HE who would do some one great thing in this short life must apply himself to the work with such a concentration of his forces as, to idle spectators who liv only to amuse themselvs, looks like insanity.—John Foster.

THE POLITICAL CALIBAN AND THE RELIGIOUS ROGUES.

American Politician, as Caliban: "How does thy honor? Let me lick thy shoe?"—The Tempest, Act iii, Scene 2.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Methodist bishop Merrill says that if General Harrison attends the inaugural ball, "as he may from a sense of duty, it will be no doubt with a protest, for he is an earnest Christian." The Waterbury American remarks: "This is a curious view of Christian ethics, doing a supposedly wrong thing from a sense of duty."

THE grand jury of Warren county, at Belvidere, N. J., last week found an indictment against Mnason Hontsmann, of Newark, on a charge of blasphemy. The prisoner, on being arraigned, pleaded not guilty, and said the Lord would become his bondsman, and that God almighty would defend him from his enemies. The court assigned him counsel, and his trial was set down for January 15th. This Mnason is the revivalist crank who has made so much trouble for the Christian Jerseymen, whom he has denounced as the incarnation of wickedness, and rebuked for not following Christ and living up to scripture. It appears that the godly New Jerseyite cannot stand too much Bible and religion any better than too little. A blasphemy law that works both ways is a mighty handy statute.

IN a letter from Standing Rock Agency, Dak., published in the Southern Workman, Hampton, Va., Gen. S. C. Armstrong says of the Indian schools: "Government seems ready to provide fine and complete boarding-school buildings for Roman Catholics, but I know of no such provisions anywhere for Protestant church work. Much is no doubt due to the energy of the Roman Catholic Indian Bureau at Washington, under Father Stephan, who appears to hav peculiar advantages. Protestants would be wise if they combined to push their legitimate work." What business has the government to build schools for either sect? Are the officers of the interior department bribed with cash, or does their party get returns in votes? The government should kick all sects off the Indian reservations, and care for the Indians itself.

SAM JONES told his audience the other night: "When you get up from a progressiv eucher table, whether you win or lose, you are as much of a blackleg gambler in the sight of God as any faro or poker player in Chicago." "This," says the Chicago Times, "is on a level with the doctrin of the drys, that the man who drinks a glass of hard cider is as wicked as the one who goes to bed drunk every night. The doctrin of degrees in crime is unknown to all of them. The lovers of progressiv eucher need not tremble, however. It is not likely that on the last day they will find the Rev. Sam Jones occupying the judgment seat and consigning people to hell or heaven after his peculiar notions. It is even possible he may be among the goats."

THE Sun says that there are again discouraging reports from Camden about the health of Walt Whitman, the poet. His paralysis has assumed features which take away the hopes of his recovery that hav occasionally been indulged in during past years. His mind, however, is not paralyzed, nor is he given up to dejection. He ruminates on many things during his long confinement to his room, and there are gleams of his old-time humor now and then when he meets a friend. Fortunately for the aged poet, he has had warm and generous friends through all the years of his illness at Camden, and he is full of the assurance that their friendship will last until he rests beneath the "Leaves of Grass" about which he sang forty years ago.

A REMARKABLE compliment was paid to Col. Robert G. Ingersoll the other day by Manager Abbey, reports the Sun. The colonel had been dining at Mrs. Abbey's on Forty-second street the night before, and, as is his custom, he had run off on the subject of Shakspere and its newest exponent, Julia Marlowe. The colonel recited poem after poem, and gave numerous illustrations of his theories of when and where Shakspere had written his plays. After dinner he declaimed some more. "It was the most excellent treatment of Shakspere," said Manager Abbey, "that I hav ever heard. Given in the form of a lecture, it would attract the attention of the entire world. I believe that there is not a man alive to-day, not even excepting the great political lights of England, who can compare for a moment as a lecturer with Colonel Ingersoll. I bar nobody. After he had gone I remarked casually that I would be willing to engage the colonel on a basis of $50,000 a year, but when I had thought the thing over more carefully and figured a bit with a pencil, I came to the conclusion that I would be willing to double the offer. In other words, I would giv him $100,000 a year and make a contract for a number of years, with a single stipulation that he would devote his entire time to his lectures. A hundred thousand dollars a year is a big income, but there would be a fortune in handling Colonel Ingersoll even on that basis."

IT has been suggested, in view of the recen sound words uttered by great theologian concerning the attacks on the church by what was thought to be a positiv indifference to doctrinal points arising from wide-spread skepticism, that the great men in the church should turn their attention to astronomy. It was stated the other day that the study o astronomy should be made one of the chief text-books in the divinity student's curriculum. All this was brought about, it was said, by the increased number of amateur and semi-professional astronomical societies springing up all over the country, and the statement that these societies were fertil gardens of skepticism. It was also said that the reading of astronomical books is becoming very much more general in the home circle, and the deductions from them concerning material, space, attraction, and other philosophic matters had disturbed many minds naturally prone to accept the Christian religion. It was urged that a sound study of the philosophy of astronomy would be beneficial in combating these deductions. So far the Sun. But how will a better knowledge of astronomy lead the mind back to a belief in Joshua and his solar exploit? The second astronomer who discovered that the biblical accounts of celestial phenomena were all wrong was made to recant and put in a dungeon, and from Galileo to Proctor the best astronomers hav been heretics. The more a person knows of astronomy the surer he is that the Bible is wrong. Would an exhaustiv study of mathematics ever convince a man that two and two are five?

A FRIENDLY CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN W. E. GLADSTONE AND SAMUEL LAING.

This correspondence originated from an article of mine * on the controversy between Mr. Gladstone and Colonel Ingersoll in the North American Review. Mr. Gladstone, having seen a proof of this article, wrote me a kind and courteous letter, saying that he had read it with interest, and that it suggested to him to ask me if I could furnish him with a short summary of the negativ creed, or "body of negativ propositions, which had been so far adopted on the negativ side as to be what the Apostles' and other accepted creeds are on the positiv." He said that "the negativ propositions seemed to him to lack definitness, and to be nowhere collected as a whole, so that we cannot tell what is the body of reasonable belief which we are challenged to adopt in lieu of the body of reasonable belief which we now hold." Hence the positiv writer is liable to be told that he is beating the air, and, "after he has done his best to deliver his blow, he is cutting through a ghost, and not a real antagonist." In short, he wished to see the alleged contradictions between science and orthodoxy fairly set out in series, "so that, like counts of an indictment, the whole case may be heard and a verdict had." And he was good enough to add that, having read my works on these subjects with interest, he knew no one who, if so disposed, would be better able than myself to comply with his request.

To this I replied in the following letter:

HOMBURG, Aug. 20, 1888.

DEAR MR. GLADSTONE: Your letter reached me here. I had no idea that the publisher had sent you a proof of my article, and was alike surprised and gratified to find that you had read enough of my writings on these subjects to make you think that I might be able to meet your wish for a more distinct and complete statement of the negativ creed.

My chief difficulty is that our creed is, to a great extent, having no creed. We think that many of the things which are defined in the positiv creeds are either beyond human knowledge, or contrary to the facts of science, or held on insufficient evidence. But we are not an aggressiv or proselytizing race, and hav no very definit scheme of dogmas which we wish to impose on the world in substitution for the old ones.

In fact, we prefer to wait and trust to the force of truth to make these dogmas transform themselvs or gradually die out, rather than destroy them at a blow, even if it were possible for us to do so. However, I hav tried to comply with your request by drawing up a concise statement of what I believe are the principal articles of our creed, such as it is, with the reasons on which they are founded.

You will doubtless disagree with many of these; but I think they will raise a sufficient number of clear and intelligible pleas to enable you to join issue, come to close quarters, and demolish them if you can. Of course, the limits of a correspondence do not admit of anything more than the most concise summary of these issues, and when I return home I will send you copies of my two books, "Modern Science and Modern Thought," and "A Modern Zoroastrian," in which the facts and arguments for my side of the question are more fully developed.

You say you wish this correspondence to hav some practical issue. If by this you mean in the way of publication, I shall be most happy to allow my part of the correspondence to be published, with any refutation of my conclusions, long or short, which you may see fit to write. Or, if you prefer it, I would publish it myself, with your refutation as the last word, under some such title as "A Friendly Discussion with Mr. Gladstone as to Creeds." But, of course, if you do not mean "publication" by "practical end," I shall treat everything as private and confidential.

I was very glad to find that the labors and responsibilities of political life left you free to giv so much time and attention to a totally different class of subjects.

I heartily wish you may hav health and strength to liv to crown the edifice by creating a real union of good will between England and Ireland.

Yours very truly, S. LAING.

ARTICLES OF THE NEGATIV CREED, AND REASONS FOR THEM.

Article I: That the subjects which positiv creeds profess to define are, for the most part, unknowable—i.e., beyond the scope of human reason or conception.

REASONS: For the philosophical proof of this see Herbert Spencer passim; also Huxley on Hume, Kant, Spinoza, etc.

We cannot conceive the first cause which lies behind the phenomena of the universe, which are all linked together by known or knowable secondary causes (i.e., by laws or invariable successions), either as being finite or infinit, conditioned or unconditioned, created or self-existent. In other words, we cannot conceive it at all, and therefore cannot either affirm or deny any proposition respecting it.

Article II: That Darwinism, or in other words, evolution by known or knowable natural laws, affords the true explanation of all that (apart from revelation) we do or can know respecting this inscrutable first cause, its attributes and relations to man, and such mysteries as birth, life, and immortality.

REASONS: See the works of Darwin, Lyell, Herbert Spencer, Huxley, and Haeckel. And, above all, note the fact that nearly the whole scientific opinion of the civilized world has come round, in little more than twenty-five years, to this view as completely as it did from the Ptolemaic to the Copernican astronomy. Every day adds fresh discoveries of missing links, and fresh evidence confirming this theory.

See, for instance, Huxley's pedigree of the horse, and Professor Cope's discoveries of ancestral forms of almost all the mammalia in the Eocene, Miocene, and Pliocene strata of North America. Also the similar discoveries by Falconer and Gaudry on the Sewalik hills, and at Pikermi; and the clearly traced development of birds from reptils, as shown by the archæopteryx in the British Museum.

The only remaining controversy in the scientific world is not as to the reality of evolution, but as to the precise laws and methods of the variations which hav led to it. All agree on the fact of evolution, and all attribute a principal cause of it to Darwin's laws of the struggle for life and the survival of the fittest by natural selection and heredity. But some think these laws sufficient, while others, admitting them to be a true and principal cause, think them insufficient without the aid of other causes, such as use and disuse, which are not yet fully understood. But there is no difference of opinion, as far as I am aware, among competent judges, as to evolution being the true law of the universe.

Nor is this confined to men of science; it has become the general mold of modern thought. Bishop Temple, and other eminent divines, practically adopt it, and when they talk of "original impress," they discard secondary supernatural interference, by what I hav ventured to call elsewhere a "grandmotherly God," as completely as Darwin or Spencer. When Tennyson, the great poet of modern thought, says,

Behold I know not anything,

And in solemn words,

Behind the veil, behind the veil, the words come home to us, with almost a thrill of awe, as the condensed essence of the true truth.

Article III: I hav said "apart from revelation," for a revelation, attested by prophecies and miracles, is a conceivable proposition, and might teach us things which, without it, we could never know. But it is a question of evidence, and whereas every fair-minded man must admit that it ought to be extremely strong and almost irresistible, we find it to be extremely weak and wholly insufficient.

REASONS: As regards the first part of this proposition, I think you would agree with me and Huxley. I never could indorse Hume's theory that miracles were impossible; but, looking at the thousands, or rather millions, of cases in which events, formerly accepted as miraculous, hav turned out to be either mistaken explanations of natural events, as confounding sickness with spiritual possession; or subjectiv converted into objectiv impressions, as in dreams, visions, and hallucinations; or else the product of superstitious fancies and excited imaginations in uncritical ages; I hav always felt that the evidence for anything really miraculous ought to be of the most cogent and convincing character.

Here, then, we join issue on a definit fact—whether the evidence for such a miraculous revelation is or is not conclusiv.

Article IV: It is insufficient, because it rests solely on the assumed inspiration of the Bible—a theory which breaks down when tested by the ordinary rules of criticism and examined impartially by the light of modern knowledge, unbiased by any violent prepossession in its favor from tradition and authority.

REASONS: Both Old and New Testaments are, to a great extent, collections of writings of unknown dates and authorship, compiled no one knows exactly how or when, but certainly long after the events they describe, and containing many passages which are mutually contradictory.

For the best summary of this branch of biblical criticism, see Strauss, Kuenen, and Renan.

Article V: The theory of revelation breaks down, because an inspired revelation cannot contain falsehoods, and many of the statements in the Bible are demonstrably untrue, generally as regards the facts of the universe, and specially as regards the origin of man.

REASONS: The account of creation in Genesis is obviously inconsistent with the real facts, both as regards the relations of the earth to the sun, moon, and stars; the crystal vault separating the waters; the manner and order of succession of vegetable and animal life, and numerous other points. It can be defended only on the plea that the inspired revelation was not intended to teach ordinary facts, such as those of astronomy and geology, but only the religious facts of the existence of God and of man's relations to him. Taken in this sense, we may consider it as a poetical and sublime version of the older Chaldean cosmogony, which it closely resembles, revised in a Monotheistic sense, and writing "God" for "gods," and as an interesting record of the ideas floating in the East at an early period.

In this sense it has a great value, and scientific men like the American you refer to (who, I think, is not Dana) may say that it is not inconsistent with modern science. But, if taken as anything approaching to an inspired narrativ, and using words in their natural sense, the account utterly breaks down, as Huxley has conclusivly shown. But, as a chain can not be stronger than its weakest links, I prefer to take as the test of inspiration, instead of the vague and poetical and therefore contestable narrativ of Gen. i, those of the Noachian deluge and the tower of Babel, which are precise and definit statements, forming a part of the biblical account of creation as much as the proem of Gen. i.

The account of a universal deluge and the destruction of all life, except that of a few pairs of animals preserved and living together for a year in an ark of limited dimensions, from which the earth was repeopled, involves not only physical impossibilities, but is directly opposed to the most certain conclusions of geological and zoological science. The existence of separate zoological provinces, like those of Australia, South America, and others, is absolutely inconsistent with the theory that all animal life has radiated from a single center, like Ararat, within a recent period.

Shem, Ham, and Japhet may represent progenitors of the human races known to the ancient world of Chaldea and Syria; but how of the other races—the yellow Mongolians, the red Americans, the black Negroes, the pigmy Negritos, the oliv-colored Malays, and other races, who could by no possibility hav been descended from these patriarchs?

Again, can anyone read Max Müller's works on the origin of language and believe that all the hundreds of different human languages originated from the confusion of tongues and dispersion of tribes, inflicted as a punishment for attempting to reach heaven by building a tall tower in Mesopotamia?

The origin of man is, however, the point upon which the radical opposition of the orthodox and scientific creeds comes out most sharply. It cannot be true both that man has fallen and that he has risen; that he was miraculously created, quite recently in the world's history, in God's own image, and in a state of high moral perfection, from which he fell by an act of disobedience, introducing sin and death into the world; and, on the other hand, that he has been evolved, during an immense period of time, from semi-animal paleolithic ancestors, ruder than the rudest savages. The evidence of perhaps one million of human implements, found in strata of great geological antiquity in all quarters of the globe, proves to demonstration that man's course has been upward, and not downward, and that the true history of the human race has been the direct contrary of that given by the Bible.

Whether man, like other mammals, was evolved through millions of years from primitiv forms may be as yet uncertain, though every fresh discovery points that way. But this much is absolutely certain: that he existed on earth at the least fifty thousand, and more probably two hundred or three hundred thousand, years ago, in a state lower than that of the lowest savages, but already spread over the four continents, and therefore far from his first origin; ignorant of all arts except fire and the rude chipping of stones; and that, as ages rolled on, his progress may be traced, step by step, from rude to finer chipping; to the hafted celt, the arrow, and javelin; the barbed harpoon, the eyed needle, the art of drawing, and finally to polished stone, pottery, bronze, iron, and the other arts of civilization as we find them in full force at the dawn of history of six thousand years ago in Egypt and Chaldea.

Read Lyell's "Antiquity of Man," Geikie's "Prehistoric Europe," or almost any recent work on the subject, and then go to the British Museum and look at the collection of stone and other human implements, and you will see the answer to the question which perplexes you, why modern science and evolution should be considered as hostil to Genesis and orthodox theology. How can these facts be reconciled with the biblical theory of Adam's creation and fall, with its logical consequence of the atonement and redemption?

As regards the New Testament, it may be true that, when Strauss and other critics attempt to show a mythical origin for everything in the gospels, they go too far and may be refuted. But their negativ and destructiv criticism has never been answered.

It remains true that the prophecy of the end of the world in the lifetime of the existing generation, distinct and precise as it is, was not fulfilled; that no one has been able to show who were the authors of the gospels as we now receive them, how much was original from eye-witnesses, how much compiled from tradition and older manuscripts, and when and by whom.

Evidently most of the miracles are explicable by natural causes, related in the language of the day; and by far the most important miracles of all, those of the resurrection and ascension, are related with a hopeless contradiction of place and circumstance. According to one, they took place in Galilee; according to another, at Jerusalem; while, according to St. Mark (who, if we are to believe tradition and Papias, comes nearest to the fountain-head through St. Peter), if we omit the verses at the end which are not found in the oldest manuscripts and are plainly added, there is positivly no mention of any miracle at all. We are merely told that the women went to the tomb, found it empty, and saw a young man in white clothing, who gave them a message, which they never delivered, being afraid. Would this evidence prove the signature of a will, much less a miracle?

I do not, however, myself attach so much weight to this element of biblical criticism, which can always be disputed about, as I do to what seems to me the crushing and conclusiv refutation of the whole theory of the creeds and orthodoxy by the incontrovertible facts which hav been exhumed from the high-level gravels of the Somme and the Thames, the caves of Devonshire and Belgium, and the rock-shelters of the Vezere.

Article VI: Thus far the articles of the negativ creed hav been purely negativ, and I believe that all who are called Agnostics would agree with them. There are, however, certain positiv articles which are generally, though perhaps not universally, held. For instance, the denial of Atheism, and of a purely mechanical Materialism.

REASONS: If we cannot prove an affirmativ respecting these mysteries of a first cause and a personal God, assuredly we cannot prove a negativ. There may be anything in the unknowable, "behind the veil," for aught we know to the contrary. All we know is that, in our present existence and with our present faculties, we do not know it, and that, as all truth is one, any guess at it, which is inconsistent with what we really do know, stands, ipso facto, condemned. Thus, if anyone tells me in general terms that there is a heaven or hell behind the veil, I reply, "It may be so; I do not know." But, if he attempts to define them, and tells me that by going vertically upward I shall meet the one, and by going vertically downward the other, I reply, "This is merely an erroneous guess; it is simply impossible."

Article VII: Morals and religions are products of evolution.

REASONS: Morals can be clearly traced to the "survival of the fittest," of the ideas and rules of conduct which hav proved themselvs the best both for individuals, families, and societies in the "struggle for life," and hav become more and more fixed by heredity and environment, until, in modern civilized nations, they hav become almost instinctiv. This is clearly proved by a reference to history, and by the existing state of morals among races in different stages of civilization and with different environments. Thus, murder is honorable among Dyaks and red Indians, but is execrable in England. Polyandry, legitimate in old India (see the Ramayana), and to this day among certain rude Indian tribes, is repugnant in modern Europe. Polygamy, not inconsistent with divine favor in the days of David, and now thought to be right by all Mohammedan races, is considered as criminal in Christian countries.

This shows that morals are not the result of any implanted instinct or divine revelation, but rest on a surer basis—that of heredity and environment, making it certain that, with or without creeds and dogmatical religions, the laws of conscience and morality will go on widening, strengthening, and becoming more and more instinctiv with each generation of civilized nations.

As to religions, it is even more evident that they are products of evolution. They are all, in effect, "working hypotheses," by which different generations of men, in different ages and countries, seek to represent their hopes and fears, their rude or refined ideas of science and morality, their aspirations after a future life, and even their fancies and poetical feelings. They all hav, or hav had, some good in them suited to their environment, and all that hav survived hav changed with the changes of that environment, brought about by evolution.

Christianity is, on the whole, the best of these religions, as being that of the most civilized and advanced nations; but it has undergone great modifications, and must undergo more if it is to remain a tolerable "working hypothesis" under the altered conditions of modern science and of modern societies. Imprison it in hard-and-fast dogmatic creeds, and it must wither and perish.

Article VIII: Polarity is the great underlying law of all knowable phenomena, whether of the inorganic or organic universe, or of the spiritual world of conscience, morals, free will, and determinism.

REASONS: This article is, perhaps, rather one personal to myself than generally accepted, though partial statements of it may be found in the works of Herbert Spencer, Emerson, and other writers. For a detailed argument in support of it see my "Modern Zoroastrian." The following is a brief summary of it. The material universe is built up out of atoms and energies by a first cause, or, as Bishop Temple calls it, an "original impress." How? By a polarity which makes them combine and pass from the simple and homogeneous into the complex and heterogeneous, in a course of constant change and evolution. This polarity is a part of the "original impress," and, like space and time, is what, in Kantian language, we should term an "imperativ category" of human thought and conception. How or why, we know not, any more than we know what lies behind the original atoms and energies. But there it is, and it extends to all the higher questions of morals and philosophy. Every proposition has two sides. Right becomes wrong and wisdom folly, if pushed to the "falsehood of extremes." Determinism, or mechanical Materialism, may seem to be a necessary consequence of Darwinian evolution; but it is only one pole of the truth. There is another pole, which givs us a conviction of the reality of free will. The reconcilement lies beyond our reach, in the law of polarity, which, in its ultimate essence and origin, is part of the great unknown.

So, again, the Christian virtues of meekness, self-sacrifice, and love, are good; but so also are the sterner virtues of self-reliance, courage, and providence; and it would not work in practice to take "no thought for the morrow," and, "if smitten on one cheek, to turn the other." Wise economy and wise liberality are both good; but the one easily degenerates into parsimony, and the other into extravagance. Patriotism, pushed to excess, becomes Jingoism; philanthropy, carried beyond the mark, lapses into weak sentimentality; and so of all things.

This creed is the only one consistent with facts. It makes us tolerant and comprehensiv, and teaches us to find Sermons in stones and good in everything.

It has approved itself to me as a good "working hypothesis" to go through life with, and taught me to try to stand firm in the middle, not letting myself be absorbed by the exclusiv attraction of either pole, striving to appropriate all that is true and good, whether it be in the discoveries of science, the beauties of art and nature, the calm and serene philosophy of Epicurus and Confucius, the magnanimous stoicism of Marcus Aurelius, or the pure morality and gentle virtues of Jesus. I feel sure that you will applaud the effort, though we may differ as to the best mode of realizing it.

To this Mr. Gladstone replied in a letter which I should hav been glad to publish, as it illustrates both the candor and courtesy of his nature, the depth and sincerity of his convictions, and the range and acuteness of his intellect. But I am precluded from doing so, as Mr. Gladstone, having no time at his disposal for an exhaustiv reply to my propositions, naturally does not wish the hasty and discursiv remarks which are alone possible in such a correspondence to go forth to the world as containing all that he has to say on the side of orthodoxy. I hav only to add, therefore, my concluding letter, in reply to which he gave me full permission to make what use I pleased of my part of the correspondence.

HALL GROVE, BAGSHOT, Sept. 13, 1888.

DEAR MR. GLADSTONE: I received your letter on my return from Homburg yesterday, and can only thank you for the kindness and courtesy of its expressions. You are most welcome to keep, and make any use you please of my part of the correspondence, and I am only too glad to think that I may hav assisted you in forming a more definit idea of the precise points at issue between the positiv and negativ creeds.

I never expected that you would write an exhaustiv reply to the very wide and varied propositions in my attempt to summarize the negativ creed; nor can I pretend to hav sufficient authority to speak for others who hold, more or less, the same views; and especially for the far greater men than myself, such as Huxley and Herbert Spencer, whose works must be studied to apprehend rightly their respectiv points of view and arguments.

Still, I think that my summary conveys clearly enough what is generally accepted by what I may call the scientific thought of the present day; and your letters, though of course not exhaustiv, indicate with equal clearness the leading lines of thought in which you and other enlightened believers in the old orthodox creeds would seek to uphold them.

If I suggested publication, it was only because your first letter stated your wish that the correspondence should lead to some "practical end." There is no doubt that, if it were published as it stands, either as an article in a review or a pamphlet, it would, like your article on Colonel Ingersoll, excite great interest, and be very extensivly read and commented upon, and thus forward the cause of truth by making many minds think, and, as you say, fixing the points at issue more definitly, and in a candid rather than a controversial spirit.

But this rests entirely with yourself, as I can understand that there may be many reasons why you would not wish to present your views to the public in the necessarily brief, incomplete, and familiar form of a couple of letters. The question of publication is, therefore, altogether in your hands. I shall be glad myself to giv publicity to what I am sure would be extremely interesting to many thinking minds; but, if you see the slightest objection to it, the whole correspondence shall remain strictly "private and confidential;" and I shall be only too happy if I can think that I hav contributed in any way toward giving more precision and definitness to your own individual mind on some of the important questions which occupy so much of your attention, and on which, at some future day and with more leisure, you may wish to giv the public a more full and elaborate exposition of your views. Yours very truly, S. LAING.

The Devil's Complaint.

The interview, of which the following is a faithful report, occurred about the time Santaclaus paid his annual visits to our young folks on last Christmas eve. Wearied with the day's toil—for mental is as hard as physical labor—I was sitting in my library reflecting on my past and present, and speculating on my future career, until I fell into a pleasant doze from which I did not awaken until near midnight. The library table before me was covered with sketches and manuscripts, one of which I selected and was making some slight corrections in, when the clock struck twelve. This effectually roused me, and glancing across the table I perceived a gentleman sitting opposit to me. He had a sardonic smile, dark, piercing eyes, a Napoleonic mustache, and a peaked beard about four inches long. He was dressed in a black overcoat with a fur collar and cuffs, and his beaver hat was on the table before him.

I confess I was quite startled at the sight of him, and said, hesitatingly: "Excuse me, sir, I did not see you come in at the door?" To which he calmly replied: "I did not come in at the door."

This was a poser, and I rapped out: "How the devil did you get in, then?"

"How I got in," replied my visitor with a grin, "is my business; but you are correct in appealing to me for information on that subject, for I am 'the devil.'"

This abrupt statement astounded me; and to hide my confusion I went to the stove which stood behind me with intent to replenish it, but my visitor interposed, saying: "Not for me, not for me, neighbor. I'm quite comfortable." To this I answered: "I thought as you were accustomed to a warm climate you would——"

"No, no, I assure you, you are quite mistaken; since the Revised Version was published it has become quite cold down below; so cold that it is absolutely a pleasure to us to see the sparks of fire on the ends of our cigars when we are smoking."

Here was another wrinkle, but I turned the conversation, inquiring of him the intent of his visit, to which I received the following reply: "My intent, young man, is to find out how things are going on in this city. I sent one of my aids for that purpose, but was not satisfied with his report. True, he made a general statement that my affairs here were prospering as well as I could desire, but when I asked him to particularize, he said that to relate a tithe of the deviltries he had seen here in full blast would take him to the far end of eternity. 'Confound you,' replied I, 'if you can't tell me what the folks there are doing, tell me what they are not doing.' 'That is easily done,' he answered; and drawing out of his pocket the Revised Version he read the Sermon on the Mount, and, after he had so done, he added: 'There, that's what they are not doing!'"

"I think, sir, your aid was mistaken, and if you will take the trouble to visit the churches in this city, I hav little doubt but that you will indorse my opinion."

"I fear not," said my visitor. "I know what they are; your temples are nothing but coffins for dead faiths; three hundred years ago people believed in what my priests told them; three hundred years ago hell was hot; now it's getting to be so cold down there that I don't know but that I shall hav to send to Scranton for coals; three hundred years ago men threw themselvs by hundreds under the car of Juggernaut, and Hindoo widows sacrificed themselvs on their husbands' funeral pyres. It's all up with those games now. Three hundred years ago the Japanese Buddhists drove the Christians out of their country, but when the late William H. Seward visited them, they offered to sell him their largest idol, the 'Diabutz,' for the market value of the old copper contained in it."

"What you say is all very well, but faith in Asia has little to do with faith here," I replied.

"You are mistaken," said my infernal visitor; "there seems to me to be a collapse of religious faiths throughout the globe. Where will you find a man now willing to die for his religion? Compare the deeds of the Christians of the past with those of the present age. Three hundred years ago, when the Anglican church tried to coax the Scotch Covenanters into their fold with the unsparing use of the maiden, the rack, the thumbkins, the steel boot, and other tortures, one of their preachers, to whom the latter was about to be applied to force a confession, was asked which leg he would hav operated on. He replied, pointing upward: 'It is for him, take the boot;' and held out his right leg. If you read the twaddle in the book called 'Robert Elsmere,' you will see how far short of this is the faith of the present age, which could not part a Calvinistic wife from her husband. Three hundred years ago the Spanish Inquisition was founded, the members of which, being sturdy believers, caused in the century following eighty-five thousand human beings to be burnt in Spain. Those were rightly termed Autos-dâ-fé, or acts of faith. How different is it now! I solemnly assert I do not believe that there is sufficient real faith in the world now to roast a tomcat."

"If that's the case," I rejoined, "you'll not lack for plenty of company down below."

"There you are wrong again," said my visitor. "I like people to be decently honest in religious matters. I don't care a rap whether they believe in Jupiter, Jahveh, or Mumbo Jumbo so long as they are consistent. I love to see them throng their temples to worship their various gods as they did in old times, but it makes me sick to see them congregate in their churches, as they do now, for the purpose of humbugging their respectiv deities."

"What do you mean by 'humbugging deities?'"

"Why, trying to bamboozle them that you respect their orders, when you do no such thing. I plead with you for a decent regard for the commands of your gods. You cannot insult Jahveh without insulting me, for we are in partnership, only I hav the best of the contract. Anyway, your folks had better mend your manners or we shall both be shipped off your planet together."

Having said this, he rose, and after buttoning his overcoat, and telling me he couldn't stand the cold here, for he had enough of that now where he came from, he vanished. H.

President Westbrook on Girard College Affairs.

TO THE DIRECTORS AND MEMBERS OF THE AMERICAN SECULAR UNION: At the last annual congress of your association a resolution was adopted, asking me to furnish "a brief report on the status of affairs as to Girard College, and to suggest, if possible, a practical method that might be made use of to reform the abuse of Christian domination and to restore this institution to conformity with the expressed purposes and wishes of the founder, Stephen Girard."

I hav delayed my answer to this call in order to thoroughly investigate certain preliminary questions regarding the proper remedy and course of procedure in bringing the case before the civil courts. After much hard work, with occasional consultations with eminent lawyers in Philadelphia, I hav fully settled these questions in my own mind.

It would be manifestly unwise to giv aid and comfort to our opponents, and embarrassment to ourselvs, by a full disclosure of our case until we are ready to file our papers and actually open the judicial contest. The case could not fail to become a most "notable" one, involving several important questions which hav never been clearly settled by the courts.

My conclusions may be summarized as follows:

1. There is without doubt a good cause of legal action against the trustees of Girard College for the violation of the express conditions of the will of the founder. The proper policy is not to attempt to set aside the will, but to enforce a strict conformity to its provisions.

2. Although this subject is primarily a local one, it is a matter of public interest throughout our entire country as involving questions bearing upon similar trusts already created, and that may hereafter be established. Philadelphians should undoubtedly and must necessarily take the lead in this contest, but there are many reasons why they should ask and receive the countenance and financial aid of all friends of right and justice throughout the entire land. The interest manifested by the American Secular Union is worthy of all commendation, and the offers of pecuniary aid from several of its members and friends are highly appreciated.

3. The success of a law suit is always contingent. Rufus Choate once said: "Divine prescience itself could not possibly foretell the possible finding of a petit jury." The same is true of judges. We may fail in the first court. We hav more hope in the supreme court of Pennsylvania, and still more in the Supreme Court of the United States. I believe that we should succeed in one of the higher courts. It is worth the effort, and great good could not fail to come out of the full exposure of sectarian fraud and bigotry.

I am happy to say that public opinion is growing rapidly in Philadelphia, and all over this country, against the palpable perversion of Girard's will, and the courts are bound to feel this influence. The Dartmouth College decision could not possibly find favor in our supreme court to-day, and Judge Storey, if on the bench now, would be ashamed to make the concessions he made in the Girard will case forty years ago, on questions not really before the court. While the courts of Massachusetts are wrangling over the Andover Theological trust, it is high time than the courts of Pennsylvania were waked up on the Girard College perversion.

4. I hav by no means abandoned my purpose to hav the trustees of Girard College arraigned at the bar of justice, unless they speedily change their policy in the matter of moral instruction of the orphan students, but the preparation of the case is not the work of a day. It may take several months to settle numerous principles of law and practice. No money is needed at the present time beyond what I am willing to pay out of my own pocket. When it is needed I will not hesitate to ask for it, with the assurance that it will be forthcoming. I find Liberals of all classes interested in this matter, as well as many persons professing to call themselvs Christians, not excepting the Jews and Freemasons, of which latter fraternity Girard was a prominent member and a generous benefactor. It would be bad policy to "rush" this case. It will "keep," and our views are growing in public favor every day.

5. There are other matters that are larger and more urgent than the Girard will case, and to these I recommend the American Secular Union to devote its attention for the present. I specially note the joint resolution now pending before the Senate of the United States, introduced by Senator Blair of New Hampshire. It has just enough of sugar-coat to make it go down palatably. Girard College has only about thirteen hundred pupils, while there are, or ought to be, more than thirteen million pupils in the public schools of the United States. The sectarian fight between Romanists and Protestants over "religion" in our public schools will hav to be settled by Secularists and on the Secular principle.

The people of this country, if properly warned, will never establish a religious sect—Christianity—under the thin disguise of not doing it. But "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," so let the American Secular Union labor diligently to increase the number of its local auxiliaries, and, for the present, giv its best energies to the Nine Demands, and in every consistent way encourage our Liberal papers and lecturers. Ultimate success is certain, for "ever the truth comes uppermost and ever is justice done."

Finally, allow me to make a practical suggestion. Progressiv Liberals are called iconoclasts, "destructiv critics," tearing down without an effort to build up. There is too much in this charge. If we object to the present system of moral instruction in Girard College and in our public schools, we are bound to show a "more excellent way." What we want is a carefully prepared scheme or manual for general use in schools, showing how the "purest principles of morality" can be taught, utterly ignoring theological dogma. Why should not the American Secular Union offer a prize for the best treatis or manual on this subject? I would divide it thus: say $500 for the best, $300 for the second best, and $200 for the third best, the awards to be made by a carefully selected committee. Such a work is greatly needed, and the copyright would soon pay all the expenses of premium and publication. I hav a plan thoroughly matured in my own mind, but can only giv this hint here. This letter is already too long, and for further information as to my views, I must refer inquirers to my book, "Girard's Will and Girard College Theology." Respectfully,

Your obedient servant, R. B. WESTBROOK.

To Enjoin the Cook County Commissioners.

Notwithstanding that most unequivocal decision of the supreme court, it is evident that its enforcement will hav to be fought step by step, for reasons outlined in former letters. Last Tuesday the city comptroler referred to the county board a bill from St. Mary's Training School for $2,313, and the county board not only referred the bill to the finance committee for payment, but instructed the county attorney to draw up a new contract. Having over a month ago engaged one of the brightest Liberal lawyers to prepare for the case, you can imagin my surprise and chagrin when, instead of finding everything ready, he notified me that he had political aspirations and Catholic clients, and would rather contribute toward some other lawyer taking the case.

Finally Judge Francis C. Russell was found, who never brought in the question of expediency, but promptly started out in the blinding blizzard, prompt action being necessary to get all the points and law in the case. The case will be brought into court Friday or Saturday, and there will be quite an excitement, no doubt. The ground is going to be most thoroughly covered, and we hope this injunction will be perpetual. Still the work goes on.

OUR INJUNCTION ON THE COOK COUNTY BOARD.

In the Circuit Court of Cook County. In Chancery.

To the Honorable the Judges of said County sitting in Chancery:

The complainants, Edward A. Stevens and John M. Stiles, bringing this bill of complaint on their own behalf and on behalf of all such aggrieved citizens and taxpayers of the county of Cook, in the state of Illinois, as are inclined to promote the objects of this bill of complaint, and shall hereafter duly cause themselvs to be made parties complainant in this suit, and shall duly contribute to the expenses of maintaining the same, do set out as follows, to wit:

1. The complainants, before proceeding to allege in detail the facts which constitute their grievance, desire to state in a summary way that they complain against the board of commissioners of Cook county, in the state of Illinois, the individual members thereof, the St. Mary's Training School (a corporation created and existing under and by virtue of the law of the state of Illinois), its officers and governing board, and George R. Davis, county treasurer of said county of Cook; that they are about to allow and cause to be paid, out of the public funds in the custody of said county treasurer, to St. Mary's Training School a very large sum of money, to wit: the sum of $2,313, and that they propose and intend at each period of three months hereafter to repeat a like payment, contrary to the form and effect of section 3 of article viii of the constitution of the state of Illinois, said St. Mary's Training School being an institution controled by the Roman Catholic church, and organized and maintained mainly for the religious purposes of said church. And the complainants pray the court to refer to said constitutional provision, also to an act of the general assembly of the state of Illinois entitled, An Act to Provide for and Aid Training Schools for Boys, approved June 18, 1883, in force July 1, 1883, the same being printed with the official publication of the Illinois Laws of 1883 at page 168, and also an act amendatory of the act just mentioned, in force July 1, 1885, and printed with the official publication of the Illinois Laws of 1885 at page —, both of said acts being printed with the ordinary and recent publications of the Laws of the State of Illinois, as parts of chapter 123, Revised Statutes of Illinois, 1874.

2. The complainants, taxpayers, and citizens allege and show that not long after the going into force of said act of 1883 a number of gentlemen belonging to a certain church known throughout the world for centuries as the Roman Catholic church, did organize under the legislativ act first mentioned, and pursuant to its provisions, and did become thereby a body corporate under the laws of the state of Illinois, subject to the provisions of all the valid parts of said act, the same being the aforenamed St. Mary's Training School.

And complainants further allege and show that the said St. Mary's Training School was instituted and always maintained, and is now maintained, and while it exists is to be and will be maintained, as a Roman Catholic church instrumentality. That one of the main purposes inducing the incorporation of said St. Mary's Training School, and governing its whole conduct, is its fitness for effectually meeting the religious objects of said Roman Catholic church.

That said Roman Catholic church deems itself specially and exclusivly commissioned to teach religious truths, and to administer the offices of religion. That said Roman Catholic church has an elaborate scheme of religious doctrins and religious offices which it insists upon as of an importance paramount to all else, and whose acceptance and observance said Roman Catholic churcn, its priests of all orders, and its earnest adherents, with universal accord, strive zealously to promote. That in this effort, purpose, and design, said Roman Catholic church, its priests and earnest adherents, are combated by divers other religious sects, societies, and individuals, who respectivly adhere to beliefs, doctrins, and religious offices, all more or less diverse from those of said Roman Catholic church, and from each other, or who altogether repudiate and contemn the beliefs, doctrins, and offices of the said Roman Catholic church in common with all the rest. That to prevail in due time over its said opponents and contemners, and to substitute its own doctrins, disciplin, and offices as much as possible in place of those diverse from them, the said Roman Catholic church, by its organized priesthood constituting its government, has definitly resolved upon a certain policy of effort to be consistently championed by its entire following, and in fact regarded by that following with substantially one accord as obligatory upon them, which policy is to attend specially to the young to withdraw them as much as possible from the environment that would without special effort naturally encompass them, and to surround them with influences controled as much as possible by the Roman Catholic church. That this said policy is the chief inspiration of the incorporation and maintenance of the St. Mary's Training School; that said school is intended to be, and in point of fact is, governed and controled in accordance with said policy by priests and laymen devoted to said Roman Catholic church, zealous to promote its designs and policy, and obeying its expressed or tacit wishes without dissent.

That the intended and effectual consequence of sending a minor child to said St. Mary's Training School is to put him in training to become a Roman Catholic churchman, unless he is already, since, in which case, he is put in training to be confirmed as such. In all cases the leading purpose and intent to be effected by said St. Mary's Training School is to make or keep the inmates of the same devoted members of the said Roman Catholic church, and without effected intent and purpose said St. Mary's Training School would be abandoned by its promoters.

CHRIST THE NOTORIOUS JEW SABBATH-BREAKER.

Taking note of the news which THE TRUTH SEEKER furnished, that Rev. Wilbur E. Crafts had resigned his New York pastorate to assume the secretaryship of the American Sabbath Union and enter the field to organize the churches in the interest of the Blair Sabbath law, I put on my most sanctified smile, entered the Young Men's Christian Association, and meekly inquired when Brother Crafts would besiege the modern Gomorrah, as it were, and where I could procure the petitions. To both my interrogatories negativ answers were returned. So I concluded that my vis-a-vis was a first-class candidate for a know-nothing-at-all party, and as I walked out of the sacred portals of Farwell Hall, I ruminated profoundly as to whether Wilbur E. Crafts was not also afflicted in the same way, for all I knew about the alleged Christ in reference to the Jewish Sabbath was that he fractured the commandment in reference to keeping the Sabbath holy in a most unmitigated manner. Yet Rev. Wilbur E. Crafts is to organize the churches for the compulsory enforcement of a Christian Sabbath law.

Well, really, what next?

Wilbur is surely crafty enough to remember the rebuke Christ is said to hav made to the Pharisees of his time when he plucked the few ears of corn.

We would also gently remind our brother secretary that the "divine" Sabbath-breaker whom he assumes to be the founder of his system of religion said: "I will ask you one thing? Is it lawful on the Sabbath day to do good or to do evil? To save life or to destroy it?" And the Blairs and Crafts and Shepherds of that day were filled with madness, and communed with one another as to what they might do with Jesus. That was the polite language of Judea for "putting a head on him," a matter which they merely deferred to a more convenient season.

For fear of wearying Wilbur E., let us refer him once more to John ix: "And it was the Sabbath day when Jesus made the clay and opened his eyes, and they said he was not of God because he keepeth not the Sabbath day."

To be consistent, the Christians ought to organize as "Sabbath-smashers"—but if they attempted consistency, to be sure, there would be no Christianity.

Then to take the Mosaic view of the matter, "Abide ye every man in his place. Let no man go out of his place on the seventh day"—as that would hav a most depressing effect on church attendance it had better not be brought forth from obscurity.

Yet we are assured that Sunday observance must be enforced because he—the Lord—rested on the seventh day and hallowed it.

That's all right. We hav no objections, if he and his people will only "giv us a rest."

When we think how his omnipotence made and fashioned this universe in a week, where the evening and the morning measured the day as at present, we must conclude that it must hav made him very weary of his world-making toil, if it can be supposed that omnipotence could get fagged out. Well, it makes me tired to think of it.

Without consulting Jesus or securing any authority, the early Christians changed the Sabbath from that of Saturn to the equally pagan day of the sun—a day devoted by the ancients to fire-worship. And right here an idea strikes me. (Something quite unusual, of course.) Is that the reason why even the Christians are willing to make it so exceedingly hot for those who do not keep the Sabbath in the regulation way? That idea might be elaborated at great length by the Sabbath Unicnites.

But some one suggests that the present day was selected because it is the day of the resurrection; that Sunday was to be observed as a day of holiness because of Jesus's resurrection. If we critically examin the assorted stories of the resurrection, we shall be more impressed with the childish credulity which can for a moment accept them, written as they were when men were unfamiliar with the rules of evidence and saturated with the grossest superstition.

Then, if there is no historical basis for the Sabbath observance, is there any reason from the utilitarian or Rationalistic standpoint—is there a trace of necessity for Sabbath observance? None that we can discover. To nature all days are alike. Natural law is the same on Sunday as on Monday, and while days of rest are desirable in this age when our physical and intellectual faculties are exercised more than ever before, a Lord's day should be treated as a superstition of the past, and instead of its extension and more rigid enforcement should be unconditionally abolished. None must be the Lord's day, but all shall be man's day. As Americans let us "keep the church and the state forever separate." When the ministerial meddlers step outside their untaxed pulpits to thrust upon us the sifted sediments of ancient dogmatism and stupidity, they had better beware. They should understand that the genius of the age simply permits them to exist. That the enlightened public sentiment no longer approves of the encouragement they receive at the hands of the state by immunity from taxation. Through this they hav grown rich at the public expense, and now, becoming arrogant, seek not only the abridgment of our liberties, but the destruction of our magnificent system of secular education.

They declare that the non-observance of the Christian Sabbath is sinful, but if asked what is sin would refer us to Lawyer Moses's revised statutes.

Brother Crafts is traveling after the manner of the crab, for his Sabbath law would, if possible, revive the Christian idea by which, according to Buckle, it was a sin for a Protestant to travel in a Catholic country or admit a Catholic to an inn. It was also a sin for a Scotch town to hold market on Saturday or Monday, because both days were so near Sunday. It was a sin to go from one town to another on Sunday, however pressing the business. It was a sin to water your garden, shave your beard, or visit a friend. Such things are not to be tolerated in a Christian land as this will be if the Sabbath Union has its way. It was also a sin to go to sleep, ride a horse, walk in fields, meadows, or streets, or sit at your own door, and to take a swim was particularly sinful. It was even sinful to save a vessel in distress or succor the sufferers. To help a heretic with food or shelter because he was needy was outrageous, as there was no need for him to liv—indeed, it was a sin for the Christian to do anything except to try and save his own miserable and worthless soul. This is only a seventeenth-century picture. Then the churches reveled in power. Now they must plead and petition. Because the scepter of their power has departed from them their real sentiments are concealed, but enough is seen to assure us that the Sabbath Unionists are enemies of our country and the human race. Their system has always enslaved the mind, impaired moral perceptions, and destroyed happiness.

The time was when the violation of the rule to "keep holy the Sabbath day" was considered a crime of deeper dye than murder, and the Sabbath Union desires to interpret the "holy" to mean going to church and supporting its revenue, because, according to the old maxim of the church, "If you reason you are lost."

To properly enforce the Blair bill it would be necessary to open every letter, so that our modern Index Expurgatorius, with Crafts and Gibbons at the head of the Congregation, may decide whether it shall or shall not be forwarded. There is a serious omission in Senator Blair's bill, that has not a list of books which are considered heretical and pernicious, and if the Lord's day is to be enforced as a holy day, why, how can such books be read without violating it? This defect will doubtless be supplied later on if they succeed. They hav indicated their disposition to be in harmony with the Middle Ages by their vicious and bungling attacks on the Sunday newspaper. The Sabbath Union's avowed purpose is to enslave the human mind, to suppress liberty of speech and freedom of the press.

The coming conflict—yes, the present conflict—is between clerical authority and civil liberty—between republican or democratic progress and Middle Ages despotism. On the one hand are the combined, consolidated forces, Catholic and Protestant; on the other the unorganized, scattered, but valiant Liberals of the American Secular Union. For every Liberal not engaged in this work is a hindrance rather than a help. Come to the call of the muster roll. Enter the army of freedom, and under our banner—Universal Mental Liberty—we are bound to win a glorious victory. Attention! Answer to the roll call! Shoulder arms! Forward, march!

W. S. Bell in Missouri.

On December 16th I stepped off the train at Liberal, Mo. I had no previous engagement to lecture there, nor even so much as a "come and see us." As I had, however, a little time to spare, I concluded to spend it there. This was my second advent to this badly and sadly misnamed place.

Before I went to Liberal the first time, which was some six or seven years ago, I was sorely puzzled over the fact that I had hardly ever read of any of our Freethought lecturers going there to giv scientific and Liberal lectures. I called the attention of a leading mind in the progressiv ranks of the town to the question, why it was. He smilingly answered: "Why, we depend wholly on home talent." Then, after a moment or two, he added: "Well, no, Brother Bell, it is not on account of our high estimation of home talent so much as it is because of our poverty. We are not able to employ any of the traveling lecturers. We are too poor." This was the naked truth. And I find the people as poor to-day as they were six years ago. If there is any appearance of improvement in the town, it consists in two stone buildings put up by outsiders, parties not interested in our cause at all. Aside from these two buildings, there is no change. There squats the dingy little town in the mud almost the same as she did six years ago. But this is not all. The town is not only non-progressiv and poor, but it is not a Liberal community. It is true there are a great many Liberal people in the place, but they do not manage the affairs of the town. Its ruler, from a moral and intellectual point of view, is a Lilliputian czar, and he holds his minions well under control. It is astonishing to hear the people tell of those who once lived here but hav been driven away through the petty tyranny of this man Walser. I do not think it would be overstating the facts to say that more people hav been compelled to leave here through the tyranny of this one man than the number now living here. Most of those who still remain dare not protest against his misrule, as they hav before their eyes his ways that are dark and tricks that are mean for making it red-hot for his enemies, and all are enemies who do not obey his commands. I want only a provocation to publish in the Liberal papers of the country the names of the good people who hav gone to Liberal to spend their days in peace and comfort who hav been compelled to leave on account of the displeasure of the ruler.

Let Mr. Walser dare to call in question the statements I hav made, and I shall furnish the facts. But I shall not reply to anonymous writers. I only seek a fair chance to show up the rottenness of this little Denmark. It is a shame and a disgrace to the Liberals of this country to hav this fraud wearing the livery of their fair and honest name.

Let no good Liberal people contemplate moving to Liberal; they had better move anywhere else than go there. Many who are there now would be glad to get away if they could. Property doesn't sell. If it did they could sell out and go. The people are getting poorer all the time. Many a man has pulled up from his home and brought his little all to Liberal, hoping, as he was led to hope, that he and his children could find employment. But there is nothing going on there to employ all those who would be only too glad to work.

Mr. Walser rules the town, and rules it wretchedly. The man who objects to his way of ruling soon finds himself in uncomfortable conditions. Walser holds mortgages on the lands, houses, besides notes, etc., hence his power. But few there dare openly oppose his despotism.

I gave one lecture before a very large audience, Mr. G. W. Baldwin, banker, presiding.

From the il-Liberal town of Liberal I went to Humboldt, Kan., to lecture. While there I enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Holtscheider, and they hav a splendid way of making a friend feel at home with them. W. S. Bell.

Chicago, Jan. 1, 1889.

Sound as a Silver Dollar.

The Truth Seeker in its last issue cautioned one of its correspondents "against the too free use of epithets." "Gentle sarcasm and good-natured raillery may be admissible, but personal denunciation is out of place among friends." "We must, however, draw the line at harsh personalities."

Is there a reader that would refuse to "second the motion?" Every Freethinker and every Christian ought to study Hedges's "Rules of Logic" and Mill "On Liberty."

After reading The Truth Seeker's just remarks, and supposing they were in line exactly with my own principle and practice for a quarter of a century, I turned to the "Letters from Friends," when lo! it is announced that I was a party to a "disgraceful controversy!" that I carried on a "war of vile words and opprobrious epithets;" "insulting the common sense and sentiment of Liberalism," etc.

To all these charges I plead "not guilty." These are just the things which I do not believe in. I go further than some Freethinkers and refuse utterly to employ such weapons against Christians. I hav no right to use "vile words and opprobrious epithets" against any human being. Will W. W. Bishop, Rockford, W. Va., be kind enough to prove that I ever did? I am not responsible for an opponent's words, his manner, nor his matter.

Am I to understand, from what Mr. Bishop says, that there should be no controversy between Liberals? The "common enemy are pressing us on all sides," he remarks, and he concludes the "combatants" ought to "hoist the white flag" or go to a monastery. He chooses to consider discussions among Liberals quarreling!

I hav over and over condemned quarreling, but upheld debating. They are not the same. Unhappily, the church has made its members believe they are identical. So, everywhere among the churches the right of one man to speak and the duty of all hearers to be silent is the rule to-day. Consequently, such a thing as mental liberty in the church is unknown. I hope suppression of debate in Liberalism, and among Liberals who see error in each other, will never prevail. Peace on such terms is a mockery. I would rather be pelted with epithets as long as life lasts than lend my voice, vote, or pen to the denial of free discussion to any. As Charles Bradlaugh well says, the abuse of free speech "dies in a day, the denial slays its thousands."

Says our new bishop: "Did the Andover controversy add strength to the missionary cause?"

No, sir, but it added mightily to the truth.

"Did the quarrel of Martin Luther and the pope strengthen the Catholic church?"

No, sir, but it helped liberty of thought.

Says Brother Bishop: "Let the house come to order and brotherly love occupy the chair."

And this is what he says in the very article in which he complains of the habit some hav of "calling each other names." Speaking of Rev. Mr. Weiss, he said: "Every other remark made by this gospel sharp was as false."

W. W. Bishop, occupying the chair of "brotherly love," said: "The clergy don't know, or else they lie."

I like debate, but courtesy as well, and am of the opinion that true dignity, polite demeanor, and uncompromising warfare upon error—no matter by whom believed, Liberal, Christian, or heathen—are not incompatible with each other.

Oaths and Affirmations.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In The Truth Seeker of December 29th, A. Rolle, in reply to a statement of yours, expresses the belief that witnesses in the courts of Pennsylvania can choose whether they will swear or affirm; but he was much mistaken if he applies this rule to all the courts in that state, for in some courts none are allowed to affirm unless they are Quakers, and in one court at least no one is allowed either to swear or affirm unless his or her religious opinion agrees with that of a bigoted judge. Here is proof of what I say.

Some years ago, a man drove in from the railroad to our cottage on business. When he drove out the whistle of a passing train frightened his horse, and the man came near being killed on the spot—was so injured that he walked several years half bent to the ground, and finally died of the injury; but before he died he sued the railroad company for damages in Judge Biddle's court in Philadelphia. My wife and I were summoned as witnesses.

When my wife was called to the witness-stand, the clerk offered her a dirty, old book to kiss and swear by. She declined the oath and told him she would prefer to affirm under the pains and penalties of perjury, which gave a crafty lawyer a chance to question her on her religious belief. After he had asked her a few questions, the judge called her nearer to his bench and questioned her. He asked her if she believed in a supreme being. She told him she believed in principles of honesty, justice, truthfulness, etc., that should guide us, but had never had satisfactory evidence of the existence of a supreme intelligent being.

After questioning her thus, he decided that her testimony could not be received. After she had retired from the holy place, a middle-aged lawyer came and shook hands with her and said, "I hav seen the sublimest sight here to-day that I ever saw in a court-house—a pale, feeble woman with a calm, earnest eye!"

But the jury were not so bigoted as the judge, for I understand they gave the injured man a verdict of $8,000 damage. In less than twenty-four hours after the judge decided that she could not testify, we were told by several persons that all the Christians in Berlin were rejoicing at my wife's great disgrace in having her testimony rejected in court. Poor, ignorant, thoughtless dupes of priestcraft! The judge could not hav conferred on her a higher honor than he did by rejecting her testimony, for it was not done on account of any blemish in character, but simply on account of her religious belief or unbelief, and every answer to the judge proved her honesty and truthfulness. She could not honestly swear by a supreme being, because she had had no more proof of his existence than the judge or anyone else has. She could not honestly swear by a book that tells her to "swear not at all;" she had too much regard for health to kiss a dirty old book that had been pressed to the syphilitic lips of scores or hundreds of drunkards, libertins, and harlots, all of whom may testify by kissing that old man-made book.

Since that decision of the judge only two of all the church people who lived here then hav ever made us a neighborly call; but having mistaken honor for disgrace, they seem to regard us as things accursed of God and man. Thus you see that the influence of a bigoted judge, after depriving men of honest, truthful testimony in court, can go forth like the same blasting influence from the pulpits, to destroy friendship and create enmity or enstrangement among neighbors.

Several months ago I wrote a letter to Judge Biddle, which was published in the Boston Investigator, asking him for proof of the existence of a supreme being, and hav since written two others to him in the same paper, and though I sent him marked copies of the paper, I hav, as yet, received no word of proof, and will, here and now, call on the eighty thousand priests of the different sects in this nation to come to his relief and giv me proof of the existence of the supreme being that they preach so much about.

Our fathers gave us a secular government that had nothing to do with religion, except in pretending to protect all in their beliefs; but the crafty priests of all sects hav worked their creeds into our laws so much that nearly all courts are in the hands of the church.

Think of a witness in court being denied the right to testify about what she has seen, heard, or knows, just because she has not been nobody knows where, nor seen a being seated on a great white throne, who is, at the same time, everywhere present, sees every sparrow that falls, numbers all the hairs of our heads, watches over us every moment, does more for us than we can do for ourselvs without our knowing it, and at the same time kills thousands of us every day by whirlwinds, cyclones, tempests, shipwrecks, earthquakes, and pestilences.

Desultory Thoughts.

Life, we've been long together,
Through pleasant and through cloudy weather;
'Tis hard to part when friends are dear—
Perhaps 'twill cost a sigh, a tear.
Then steal away; giv little warning,
Choose thine own time.
Say not good night, but in some brighter clime
Bid me good morning.
—Letitia A. Barbauld (1743–1825).

Careful observers cannot fail to notice the strong tendency of the church and secular society toward the philosophy of Spiritualism. It is permeating the strongholds of Christianity and Materialism, illuminating those dismal and hideous doctrins with brilliant and ennobling truths as never before, notwithstanding it has just had another "deathblow" by the "toe-joint" theory. Creeds are being closely inspected. False assumptions and erroneous teachings are frequently discovered wrapped snugly up in religious blankets and relegated to the rubbish closet. The atonement, everlasting punishment, no probation after death, etc., are meeting with a genuin Waterloo in many places, and are ignored and nearly annihilated by the intelligent onslaughts of the best minds in pulpit and college. I know we hav enough yet left of these nauseous ecclesiastical syrups to disgrace even a less pretending nation than ours, but old forms of theology and religious sanctification are doomed.

The rights and necessities of individuals, regardless of "thus saith the Lord," are being recognized even by church people. The devil is dead; hell is nearly extinguished, except in places where ignorance prevails and pork and tobacco are the chief articles of diet, and God must go along with the other evils that hav so long afflicted a patient and long-suffering race. Grease and grace always go together. I mean the grace of religious sanctity. My intercourse with all classes of the community convinces me that there is a more general interest in the facts of Spiritualism and cognate subjects, a higher and grander appreciation of their usefulness in this life, as well as the other that we are fast approaching, than was ever before experienced. Its remarkable Liberalizing influence upon the churches and their iron-bound creeds; the doing away with an endless hell and an angry God; its undeniable proofs of immortality; the getting rid of the fear of so-called death; the multitudinous cases of magnetic and spiritual healing, where the old systems of medicin hav entirely failed, and the vast amount of superstition removed about Gods, devils, hobgoblins, myths, etc., all prove this.

Emerson said in his address to the students in Divinity College, at Cambridge, Mass., three or four years before A. J. Davis commenced "Nature's Divine Revelations," in 1845:

> It is my duty to say to you that the need was never greater of a new revelation than now. From the views I hav already expressed you will infer the sad conviction which I share, I believe with numbers, of the universal decay, and now almost death, of faith in society. The soul is not preached. The church seems to totter to its fall—almost all life is extinct.

This great man who has made Concord historic no less than its cannon shot that was heard around the world April 19, 1775, had caught, mostly through deep research and thought, similar sentiments that soon after came so strangely through the lips of uneducated Davis, the poor shoemaker's son, then only nineteen years old, who was controled by advanced minds in spirit-life. Davis said:

> The few who hav dared to express themselvs freely hav done it at the immediate risk of their physical destruction. Truths that are eternal hav been conceived of, yet smothered by the hand of a dominant and tyrannical ignorance. This ignorance still exists; this bigotry and superstition still exist, and where is the responsibility for the cause of their existence? Sectarian usurpation must bear the charge. It has in its long career prohibited and crushed the free exercise of moral and intellectual attainment. . . . It has obscured the main features and manifestations of truth, and thrown a mantle of ignorance and fanaticism over the world. . . . It has sapped the foundations of human happiness. It has produced a schism in the race, and a wasting prostitution of human powers yet uncorrected and uncontroled. The true interests of mankind hav thus been perverted to those of vice and misery.

What an arraignment against the rich and powerful churches by an unlettered youth! Yet it was so impregnable that the clergy and press dare not attempt to answer it only with lies, abuse, and slander. Such a charge was a much more serious matter forty years ago than at the present time when so many polished radical axes are cutting away the roots of "ignorance and fanaticism" that support the Christian churches of all lands.

Emerson saw the need, like a real prophet as he was, of a "new revelation," but when it came dealing heavier and more effectual blows against "sectarian usurpation" that had "perverted the true interests of mankind to those of vice and misery" than he had done, he was not brave enough to accept it from this unheard-of youth, who was ignorant of philosophy, history, and science.

Some good and well-meaning church people cry out and say, Spiritualism destroys all our cherished idols and grinds to powder all the old ideas that hav been handed down to us by our ancestors and nourished by our most tender sympathies. Yes, I admit all that. I want to destroy all creeds, idols, fetiches, priestcraft; and more than all the slavery of women that Christianity has so long upheld. Spiritualism leads off in all our grand reforms, and in its zeal for human advancement, may sometimes pull up some golden grain in its struggle to free the earth of vast fields of weeds sown and nurtured by ecclesiasticism.

The grain so destroyed is hardly missed, and only a mere ripple is made on the great sea of truth. If it tears down the old, it builds up the new with more beautiful and useful structures. It destroys nothing worth saving.

Tear down the old,
Build up the new,
The mass shall rule,
And not the few.

Phenix-like from the bloody ashes of the Past, when every priest's prayer meant the torture of some noble man or woman, shall arise the New, as Whittier has so truthfully expressed it:

The Waster seemed the Builder too;
Up springing from the ruined Old
I saw the New.
'Twas but the ruin of the bad—
The wasting of the wrong and ill;
Whate'er of good the old time had
Was living still.

Coleta, Ill., Jan. 1, 1889. Jay Chaapel.

God Discovered by an Atheist.

It has at last been revealed to me what and who is God. They say that man by searching cannot find out God. That's a lie. They say that the finite cannot comprehend the infinit. That's another. They say that God is incomprehensible, inconceivable, and past finding out. That's a great mistake. I hav found him. I now clearly understand him perfectly. It's just as plain as can be. God: Why, God always existed, and created all things out of nothing. Before the beginning of creation he was in utter darkness, for he made light to start with. He was in a perfect vacuum, with nothing to stand, lie, or sit on, nothing to feel, hear, taste, smell, see, or think of, for nothing had ever existed, and he filled all space. What, space! Yes, space. Then, if he filled space, and there was nothing in space but nothing, he must hav been that identical supreme nothing. Verily he was all and in all—equal to nothing. He was possessed of all the wisdom, knowledge, power, and muchness in the universe, which all amounted to simply zero. He is described in the creed as "without body, parts, or passions," I believe. And to put that into plain words it must mean, without substance, form, or force. Well, that describes nothing exactly. God is the original and only perfect vacuum. He is the sublime and unapproachable nothing. Behold a solution of the holy trinity; three in one, and one in three. Three ciphers equal nothing. Three nothings are no worse than one. Infinit nothing! Blessed nothing! Mankind hav bowed before thee for thousands of years! Verily the clergy hav been telling us the very truth. That we should love nothing as God. When they want to be like their creator they sing, "O to be nothing, nothing!" And some of them come near having their prayerful song answered.

God is infinit, so is space; God is everywhere, so is space, though it is generally occupied by something. God does all that is done. Well, so in reality do vacuums cause all the motion in the universe. The one universal primal principle of the universe seems to be equilibrium. Light shines toward where there is no light or less light. Heat radiates toward a place of less heat, or, in other words, a more or less perfect vacuum as regards heat, called cold. Electricity travels from an accumulation to a place of scarcity called negativ, and the greater the accumulation in one, and the more absolute the absence of electricity in the other two bodies, the greater the intensity of attraction. "Nature hates a vacuum," is not so far wrong after all. If a balloon shell could be made to withstand the atmospheric pressure, of the same weight and size, it would lift several times as much filled with nothing as though it was filled with gas. Because nothing is lighter than gas, and thus could be made to lift something. The heat in one locality rarefies the atmosphere, causing a partial or relativ vacuum, which causes a current of air from the surrounding country which we call a wind. Thus God, or nothing, is the cause of all winds. Nothing can move in any given direction till there is less pressure on that side of it than on any other. All motion is in the line of the least resistance, i.e., the line of the most perfect vacuum of that kind of force. When the interior of the earth contains a greater pressure of gas than there is on the outside its crust, the relativ vacuum outside tends toward allowing a fracture of the crust that the gas may escape and thus the pressure be equalized. Thus a vacuum, partial, of course, causes the earthquake. Whether the pressure is inside or out, there must be an absence of pressure in some direction to cause motion. Nothing, that is, God, is the cause of all life, motion, pleasure, pain, and even religion. Six hundred thousand lives hav been sacrificed for nothing, God. A Holy Ghost in scientific language, made plain, is simply, nothing full of holes, or wholly nothing, or complete vacuum. There isn't a Ghost of a chance to make anything of it, he or she. I am not positiv what the sex of nothing is. I hope it has sex, but this convinces me that I really do not know so much about God as I thought I did. Why, come to think of it, I never saw any nothing, never heard of anybody who had, and, by the way, I begin to doubt whether there ever was really any such thing as absolute nothing. Let's see. A space utterly devoid of light, heat, magnetism, electricity, no center of gravity running through it, no air, gas, ether, odor, sound, or substance in it. Can't go it. Then my newly discovered God must be only a partial God —partially nothing, approximately a vacuum. But a partial God is a finite God, and that will not do. Well, no use to feel bad if my newly discovered God is vanishing away. I've lost nothing, and ought to be thankful that I am still without God and with lots of hope in humanity.

Gods, Christs, and Bibles all are gone,
That once I fixed my hopes upon;
Their narrow track I'll not pursue,
A fairer way I hav in view.

PROF. C. L. HASKELL.

A Great Theological Chasm.

Edward Everett Hale, Reviewing Robert Elsmere, in the North American Review.

The hundreds of thousands of people who read "Robert Elsmere" in England and America, approach the book from two wholly different points of view.

By far the larger set of them has been taught from the pulpit, and has believed, that some particular church, Presbyterian, Episcopal, Baptist, or Catholic, has distinct title-deeds running back to the moment when Jesus Christ parted from his apostles.

The other set has known that there are no such title-deeds for any of the great ecclesiastical organizations. The Roman Catholic church, which Bunsen called "the First of Schismatics," has none. The Episcopal church has none. The Presbyterian church has none. Cardinal Newman put the truth forcibly, but not too forcibly, when he said of the Catholic doctrin of trinity: "The creeds of that early day make no mention in their letter of the Catholic doctrin at all. They make mention, indeed, of a three. But that there is any mystery in the doctrin—that the three are one; that they are co-equal, co-eternal, all increate, all omnipotent, all incomprehensible, is not stated, and never could be gathered from them. Of course, we believe that they imply it, or rather intend it; God forbid we should do otherwise. But nothing in the mere letter of those documents leads to that belief. To giv a deeper meaning to their letter we must interpret them by the times which come after;" that is, by the fourth and later centuries.

He goes on to say the same of the one great Christian council of the third century, of the six great bishops and saints of the first three centuries, of the three great doctrinal writers; and he quotes Bull, an English bishop, as saying that nearly all the Catholic authors who preceded Arius "hav the appearance of being ignorant of the invisible and incomprehensible nature of the Son."

In the same way, he says of the doctrin of original sin, "There are two doctrins which are generally associated with the name of a Father of the fourth and fifth centuries, and which can allege little definit testimony in their behalf before his time, purgatory and original sin."

All well-read clergymen, interested in history, hav always known that these statements of Cardinal Newman are true, that is, that there is a historical gap between modern scientific theology and the New Testament. Since the publication, a few years ago, of an English translation of all the Ante-Nicene fathers, all intelligent English students of history, whether clergymen or Greek scholars or not, hav had a chance to see this with their own eyes.

To all these people, therefore, the feeling about "Robert Elsmere" has been that which it is said the reader of a great publishing house had, when he determined that that house should not reprint it for circulation in America: "It is straw which has been thrashed over for fifteen years," he said. It had been thrashed over for him and people like him. But the great run of Christian people had been permitted or led to believe, in what I think an uncandid way,* each that his own church was sustained in its organization and its dogma by the consent and custom of the earliest centuries of Christianity. People always alluded fondly to the "early Christians," and everyone liked to think that the "early Christians" and he were exactly in accord.

Now "Robert Elsmere" steps in. With artistic skill, Mrs. Ward refuses to tell one word of what he read in these mysterious "studies" which were so fatal to his peace and to Katharine's. All the reader knows is that he came out from his reading sure that there was no apostolic succession; sure, as Cardinal Newman says, in the passage I hav cited, that there was no scientific doctrin of the trinity; sure that there was no doctrin of the vicarious atonement in these early books, and shocked to find, for instance, that an author like Clement, a friend of Paul, speaks of the resurrection of the Phenix once in five hundred years, apparently in the same confidence with which he speaks of the resurrection of Jesus Christ.

Also, Robert Elsmere was one of these people who really believe that a man has a right be a minister only because he has been ordained by a bishop, who has been ordained by another, who is the last in a long series which began with St. Peter. When he came to read the history of the first three centuries, he found that there was no such succession. He found that those whom modern language chooses to call "bishops" were the business officers of the little Christian communities, who did the work intrusted to them as well as they could, and were quite indifferent about the manner of their appointment. This for a single instance. He found, also, that in the very queer and fragmentary scraps of Christian literature which testify to the existence of the church between the time of St. Paul and the time of Constantine, there is not the least uniformity of doctrin. There is not slightest critical habit of investigation. There is often preposterous wildness of fancy, amounting to tedious rigmarole. There are confident assertions of many things much harder to believe than the miracles recorded in the gospels. And no pretense is made anywhere to critical investigation of authority or authenticity.

If the plan of the North American Review permitted, the whole of this number could be filled with very entertaining extracts from these books of two centuries and a half, which Robert Elsmere read. Most of them are not very long books. It is fair, perhaps, to say that none of them were written by men of genius; almost all of them were written by very ignorant men, and some by very foolish men, so that this word "rigmarole" applies very fairly to much more than half of their contents. For all this, they are vastly entertaining, sometimes amusing, though often ridiculous. Almost the whole of these collections is contained in a series known as the "Ante Nicene Fathers," which has been published, quite conveniently, within the last twenty years. The fact that these things exist in English now, while formerly they were buried in Greek and Latin, is one of the reasons why the young theologians of the "established" church now read them a great deal more easily than they did. Indeed, if anybody asks why the revulsion of feeling which now shows itself in the English Church Congress never showed itself fifty years ago, it is probable that a good working answer would be found in the fact that Englishmen now read the literature of the first three centuries a great deal more easily than they could read it before. Frankly, let it be said, the average clergyman in a country cure in England did not read Greek at sight very easily, and would rather read the Guardian in English than such a book as Tatian's "Orator," or "The Constitutions of the Apostles." in rather crabbed Greek. Now he has the whole thing at hand, as any of our readers hav, who choose to send to the next good public library to ask for any of this literature, so lately forbidden.*

It also ought to be said, however, that the grand church writers of every school, excepting the liberal schools, hav turned up their noses at the literature before the time of Constantine. As Dr. Newman says, theology was not at all "developed" at that time, and it is only a "developed theology" that the church at large has cared to present to Christians at large, whether of the Protestant or of the Roman schisms. Original Christianity, simple Christianity, is quite a different affair from the "developed" or manufactured article. And the reading of these fathers before Constantine was by no means encouraging for neophytes, or for anybody else who undertook it, unless he came to it, as Cardinal Newman came to it, with a determination in advance to believe the religion of the Middle Ages, and to make the religion of the first, second, and third centuries match that, by reading between the lines. It has been the fashion, therefore, in most theological schools, in most books of criticism, and, one might say fairly enough, in most well-bred theological circles, to set out of sight the "ignorant and unlearned men," who are, as it happens, the only persons through whom we know what Christianity was or was doing in the first three hundred years of its existence. I do not myself remember any such curious instance of the suppression by indirection of a sort of literature which came inconveniently in the way of a regnant school. But, if one may be pardoned an allusion to the customs of our own time, it was a little as a modern Democratic president of the United States, holding and using the enormous centralized power of the federal administration, always speaks very respectfully of Thomas Jefferson, but still takes very good care that none of his earlier maxims, about the danger of a central government, shall ever be alluded to. Cardinal Newman would say that this was a perfectly fair illustration. He would say that the United States has found out that it cannot get along without a very strong central government, that the doctrin of a central government has been "developed" in the last hundred years; and he would say that, in exactly the same way, the church has found out that it cannot get along without an infallible chief, and without a great many other things which cannot be found in the letter of the early records. But, just as a strong central government has been "developed" in the United States, he would say that these convenient enlargements hav been "developed" in the history of the church.

So much for the reason why Robert Elsmere and all other intelligent people who care to preserve a historical foundation for Christianity, find that the study of the first three centuries makes Christianity to be a very different thing from what it is called in the creeds of the Dark Ages.

It is interesting to see that Mr. Gladstone, in his review of the book, virtually repeats Cardinal Newman's statement. Thus he says that the baptismal formula "was speedily developed into the substance of the Apostles' Creed." None the less does he claim that that creed must be received, if we are to hav a good working religion. And he seems to rely for the authority of the organized Christianity of to-day on "the concord of Christians, ever since the adjudication of the fifth century." And he says that "an established church, priesthood or ministry, sacraments, and the whole established machinery which trains the Christian, are the wings of the soul."

Still, he knows that many people do not find this machinery to fly very well, and that for many people it does not help them to fly. Many people believe that a church can exist without so much machinery, and that if the savior of men had thought the machinery absolutely necessary, he would not hav left it to the chances of development.

EDWARD EVERETT HALE.

The Power of the Churches.

Trinity church is one of the richest corporations in the United States. All of its wealth has come from the labor and toil of the poor. An Elmira paper lately asked why people did not go to church. A flood of answers came, from Maine to California, showing the dissatisfaction with the churches. One of the preachers, finding the complaints were universal against church corporations as mere social gatherings for stuck-ups, the expense whereof was chiefly borne by working people, preached against letting in further light, whereupon the paper discovered it was a subject of no public importance, although it has not hit on a subject that brought so many answers.

Political organs are of course afraid of the shadow of every corporation. The defeat of Warner Miller, the church candidate for governor of New York, shows that the church has not as much political power as the saloons. There are less than twelve million church-members, and less than one million liquor dealers, in the United States. These thirteen millions cannot very well expect to boycott the balance of the nation.

Should the National Reform and Evangelical Alliance succeed in passing the bill now before the United States Senate stopping the mails on Sunday, and all Sunday papers, it is doubtful if the twelve million church devotees could force the other fifty millions to go into the church shearings on Sundays. The Spiritualists, humanitarians, and Freethinkers are superior in intellect and love of liberty. It is more than probable that they would not be driven into the churches. To a well-fed minister with an annual income of $100,000, like Dr. John Hall, churches are not a failure. But to the humane, and the sorrowing, starving, dying poor, the thing looks different.

I saw a woman beg in the street
On Christmas day for bread to eat;
The city's chimes were ringing then
Peace on earth, good will to men.

I saw a churchman, sleek, well fed,
Pass by the woman, and he turned his head;
The crumbs that fell from his table that day
Would hav feasted the beggar he turned away.

Following the churchman came
A woman whose brow was stamped with shame;
From out her purse a coin she cast
And the beggar blessed her as she passed.

To the church the sleek man went his way;
The woman of shame would hav blushed to pray;
Yet which of the two the more blessed will be,
Magdalen, scorned, or the proud Pharisee?

Verily I say unto you, the harlots shall enter into the kingdom of heaven before you.

*I said so in the North American Review some years ago. The Review and I were much abused in consequence. The "religious" press answered, almost unanimously, "If Mr. Hale is uncandid, let him reform, but do not let him attack others." But the secular press, with nearly equal unanimity, said that Mr. Hale had touched a sore point.

Two Thoughts on the Truth Seeker Annual for 1889.

From Secular Thought.

The TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1889 has reached us. It is in every sense of the word an excellent publication, and should be read by every Freethinker and Secularist on this continent. It has a carefully prepared calendar, full of valuable information, and an extensiv account of "Freethought in the United States for 1888." The comparison of "Colonel Ingersoll and Shakspere" is unique; some of the most poetic selections from the colonel's writings are given with quotations from Shakspere. A very interesting and useful feature in the ANNUAL is the opinions of twenty-four well-known Freethinkers of the States and Canada upon fourteen of the most important questions affecting the Secular movement. What those subjects are will be seen from our answers, which we reprint in another column from the ANNUAL. Next week we shall giv our readers the views of Colonel Ingersoll and afterward of Captain Adams upon these questions. The ANNUAL has 124 pages and some fine illustrations. Its price is twenty-five cents, and it can be had from the TRUTH SEEKER office, 28 Lafayette place, New York.

From New Thought.

Every Liberal in the United States should take the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. He who takes it and reads it year after year will get a better idea of Liberalism and its progress than can be obtained by any other means. The writers for this number are Col. R. G. Ingersoll, James Parton, Helen H. Gardener, S. P. Putnam, Charles Watts, E. A. Stevens, Parker Pillsbury, Robert C. Adams, J. D. Shaw, F. M. Holland, E. B. Foote, Jr., M.D., Lucy N. Colman, J. H. Burnham, L. K. Washburn, Ella Gibson, Susan H. Wixon, John Peck, W. S. Bell, E. C. Walker, Mrs. M. A. Freeman, Dr. Juliet H. Severance, Mrs. E. D. Slenker, Col. J. R. Kelso, and G. H. Dawes.

Among the contents may be found a calendar for 1889, "Freethought in the United States," "Liberalism, a Symposium," "The Nine Demands of Liberalism," and "Ingersoll and Shakspere."

The twenty-five cents asked for this pamphlet cannot be better invested than in its purchase. Send to the Truth Seeker Company for it, or we will, if you prefer, order it for you.

Mental and Economic Liberty.

In a recent number of the Alarm appears a two-column communication from Mrs. Lizzie S. Holmes in which she accuses the Liberals of threshing old straw, and finds fault because they will not giv up Liberalism and devote their time and talents to economic reforms. Her point of attack is the Chicago Secular Union, of which she says: "The Secular Union in Chicago flourishes intellectually and financially. Among its members are numbered many brilliant minds, and right gallant are the onslaughts against the tottering walls of orthodoxy. The words 'free speech,' 'free thought,' 'free press,' ring out from their platform weekly, with magnificent eloquence. They are becoming almost popular, and their demand for free speech is not so necessary to themselvs as once it was. This may be why, though they still roll out the words with grandeur, they are not so urgent in the practice of them. Little patience is shown toward any industrial reformer who believes in a radical change of systems and institutions, and a self-confessed Anarchist would not be given the floor."

Most of this, we presume, is true. But why shall the Union be blamed? The Union is not a Socialist body; it is not an Anarchist body. It is composed of Liberals, men and women who hav outgrown theological creeds, and who are now trying to lead others out of the miasmatic woods. They do not deny the right of the Socialists or the Anarchists to teach their doctrins in any hall for which they pay or in any paper whose editor desires their articles. But the Liberals hav a purpose as well as the economists who egotistically think that their reform is all in all. To that purpose they are devoted. They do not deny or belittle the importance of labor reform; indeed, in other places, many of them are ardent labor reformers. But they say that the Secular Union has its objects, and that in the meetings of the Union is the place to emphasize them to the exclusion of other purposes, however meritorious in themselvs they may be. Concentration is necessary; without it, nothing can be accomplished. One rifle bullet, weighing but an ounce, gets there much more effectivly than a pound of shot scattered all over.

But Mrs. Holmes answers herself completely in another paragraph. She says: "Universal mental liberty must precede universal economic liberty." This is true. No reform of civilization is possible among church slaves. They must break away from theology before they can advance. The church is a holdback. The church has its ideas of life fossilized, and heresy must precede their replacement by other ideas. All great reforms which hav led to a better civilization hav grown from theological heresy. Whether a so-called reform is good or bad, the church opposes it on principle. She does not want to be disturbed; God has told her all about everything, she has settled political as well as religious systems, and the disturber of what is is a heretic. Before a Christian can become a reformer he must leave the church.

Now, unless universal mental liberty is an accomplished fact—unless all men are free to think and express their thoughts—unless they can work for reform within the church—unless they are, in short, as free to labor for their conception of right as they are to toil for Jesus, without ostracism, excommunication, or prosecution—then according to Mrs. Holmes's own statement the work of Liberalism is of paramount importance to that of the social reformer. We hav heard the same cry before. The labor reformers of this city hav told us time and again that we were "charging on ghosts in broad sunlight;" that there was infinitly more need of "freeing men's bodies," as they term it, than of freeing their minds; and that, even to make Freethinkers, we must first liberate the people industrially. We like to hav a man say that to us, for we hav a question or two for his special benefit. Admitting for the moment that his particular reform is a beneficent one, the inquiry naturally follows, Are those who hold with you Infidels or Christians? The invariable reply will be, Infidels. And he will usually add, in a contemptuous tone, as if pitying the mental condition of one who would ask the question, We outgrew Christianity long ago. Well and good; but, take your own case, were you an Infidel or an economic reformer first? And the answer always obtained is, an Infidel.

It is a fact that the leaders of all the economic reforms of the age are Freethinkers, or hold religious views at variance with the churches. Dr. McGlynn even, while asserting his religious feeling, has been excommunicated. A conservativ reform like the single-tax doctrin is reprobated by orthodoxy. To preach it, Pentecost had to leave his church. Right or wrong, good or bad, social reform is heresy, and a man cannot embrace it without becoming a heretic.

So we see that from the standpoint of Mrs. Holmes herself, the Chicago Union is doing work of primary and fundamental importance, and is pursuing the right road. From the conservativ standpoint, the Union (and we use the Chicago Union as a type) is all right, too. If Mrs. Holmes's economic reform is wrong, then the Union is not leading men astray. It is simply freeing minds and educating people to that point where they can look over the ground and decide their own course. Within the church they are bound. Without, they are their own masters, and to berate them because they do not choose to follow social will-o'-the-wisps, or even substantial reforms, is to endeavor to coerce them as do the churches. A man has just as good a right to think wrong as he has to think right, but it is no denial of another's right to refuse to be guided by him, or to oppose him, or to decline to talk with him at all.

Let the Chicago Union, and all other Secular Unions, stick to their work. Liberalism is civilization, and if, when the world is civilized, it finds that the economic principles of Mrs. Holmes and her friends are the proper thing to adopt, it will no doubt adopt them. But if by any possibility she should be wrong—and all must admit that it is possible—then the Liberals will hav no pangs of conscience because they hav propagated falsehood. The Secular Unions cannot be wrong, for their demands are based on absolute justice between man and man.

Religion and Speculation.

Some time ago a company was formed in this city to refine sugar by means of electricity. The originator of the secret pretended to put raw sugar into a hopper of his machine and hav it come out of a spout purer and cleaner than any sugar now manufactured. The whole scheme was a swindle, but its fraudulent character was not discovered till some million dollars' worth of stock had been sold, principally in England.

It now turns out that the Christadelphians are not only the swindlers but the swindled, with an incidental Methodist who was the right bower of the principal swindler, and also an exhorter on Sundays in the city hall park. The secretary and treasurer of the company came to this country from Birmingham, which is the head center of the Christadelphians. The peculiar tenets of this sect are a rejection of the trinity, a belief in God, acceptance of Jesus as coequal with God, but a separate person, and the idea that the Holy Ghost is an influence. They hold that all men are not immortal, but that at death the wicked are annihilated, while the righteous, through faith in Christ, are endowed with immortality. They employ no ministers, priest, or clergyman, holding that all believers are equal. Robert Roberts, the recognized head of the sect, publishes a monthly periodical called the Christadelphian, a magazine of about sixty broad pages, which is filled with religious discussions and news from the various ecclesias. This magazine is looked upon as the official organ of the sect. The secretary of the swindling sugar concern, named Robertson, was a Christadelphian in Birmingham, and an intimate friend and companion of Roberts, the editor of the Christadelphian. Robertson brought his Christadelphian faith with him to this country, where he also found it established, though the membership was small and mainly composed of people of limited means. A promising ecclesia existed in Jersey City, and feeble ones in New York and Brooklyn. Robertson came among these struggling disciples of the new faith as an apostle from the fountain-head, and was received as such. Then he began to work off his sugar stock on the brethren, helped along by Editor Roberts, who printed such editorial mixtures of piety and greed as this:

"It is not unlawful to combine with the world in efforts to obtain or produce the means of convenient life, whether in the shape of articles of use and comfort, or the money representing those articles, but it is unlawful to combine with the world in the purposes for which the world employs those articles when produced or obtained.

"When a godly man owns shop property and lets it to ungodly tenants, there is a combination of which he gets the benefit, but it is not an unlawful combination, though the tenants may get the money to pay the rent by robbing their customers. The robbing is not in the contract. . . . So a man in a situation under a company, managing a business for them at a salary, and perhaps receiving, in addition to his salary, a commission on the business transacted for the year, is morally a constituent of the company. His salary and his commission are his 'share.'

"These remarks are suggested by the objections raised in some quarters against the participation by some brethren in the Electric Sugar Company. The objection, where it is a sincere one, is based upon misconception. The Electric Sugar Company is not a 'bubble' company; it is not a speculation in the sense of being a chance affair. It is a solid, honest, legitimate, trading enterprise, which has taken some skill to develop, and in which a brother may take more than usual liberty because of the guarantees that exist that all things connected with it will be done according to honor and godliness. Lies hav been told about it, and these receiving credence where the truth of the matter was not known, hav created a prejudice. The prejudice is without rational foundation.

"A statement of the most elementary principles of the case is all that is necessary to demonstrate its legitimacy. It is lawful to refine sugar by a new method if you can obtain command of it. It is lawful to make as large a profit by the operation of the new method as the price of sugar may allow. It is lawful to raise money to develop the process by offering others a participation in the benefit at any price it may seem to them to be worth. It is lawful to hold a share under a contract which limits your responsibility to your own share and its financial object. You exchange values by providing a stipulated convenience now for a definit measure of the results afterward. Your liberty is merely a question of confidence in the facts."

The brethren in England were fiercely eager to obtain shares in the company, and stock sold as high as £80 or £100 a share. To-day, after the thing is exposed, and it is shown that the only refining the machine could do was to crush sugar already refined into smaller particles, made peculiarly white by a chemical preparation, the Christadelphian speculators are paying $5 for the stock, and looking for a miracle to make it valuable. Their faith in their religious leaders is touching indeed, but under the circumstances somewhat misplaced.

A few years ago some editors of a Methodist organ were taken in on the ground floor of a bogus mining company, and in return for the favor used their influence to boom the stock. The mine did not pan out, the papers exposed the officers, and the connection of the pious boomers with the swindle was established. There was much squirming and denial in the office of the organ, but the fact came out that religious confidence had been abused for the profit of those high up in Methodist councils. The experience of the Christadelphians is that of their American Methodist brethren over again. Both swindles form instructiv lessons for the faithful, and though expensiv the pious who hav been bit will hav the satisfaction of knowing that they will remember them, and that the scripture is fulfilled which says that thorns and snares shall be in the way of the froward. If the Christadelphians were not so determined to remain unworldly they might hav had the knowledge which would hav kept them out of this speculation.

Christianity and Morality.

Christians say that their religion promotes morality. Freethinkers know that it is more subversiv of morality than any other institution. There are two ways of showing this to the Christian. One way is through observed facts; the other is through theory.

As to the first way, the facts. At what times in the history of the Caucasian race did the highest morality prevail? At the time of the pagan civilizations before Christianity arose, and at present as it declines. When did the lowest morality prevail? During the medieval centuries when Christianity was most strongly believed. Which nations are now the most moral? Those in which Christianity is least believed. Which the least moral? Those in which it is the most believed. Which of the nationalities in this country are the least moral? Those by which it is most believed.

Having seen by the testimony of facts that Christianity promotes immorality, we may apply to theory, to general reasonings, and consider how it does, why it does. It does so in two ways, directly and indirectly.

One direct way is through the examples of egotistic and bloodthirsty scoundrels presented in the Old Testament as men after God's own heart.

Another direct way is by the substitution of a false criterion of standing in respectable society. For the criterion of morality Christianity substitutes that of church membership and orthodoxy of belief.

Another direct way is by quieting the troubled conscience that might hav led to reform, by absolution from supernatural tribunals, at the easy price of belief. When a Freethinker has done a wrong thing, he knows that there is no way of wiping out the score. He has done it, and it cannot be undone. The injury has embittered some being, and that being will injure some other, and that one some other. An endless chain of cause and effect, of wrong and suffering, has been started. It has been started, and it must go on and add to the great sum of misery in the world—must put pains in the hearts of good men and loving women, and cannot be stopped. And there is not another world in which all this shall be made right. He can never hold quite the same opinion of himself as before—can never be quite as happy. This tends to reform. But what devil could invent a more ingenious device for producing criminals than that of the church by which there is provided for the very first risings of the conscience in such a case the assuagement of a turning to God and a welcome reception and pardon in the breast of that great being who is indeed the author and source of all right and justice and love, and beside whom the creatures injured are insignificant worms unworthy of regard?

But the indirect way in which Christianity promotes immorality is most potent of all. Morality, like every human good, depends upon knowledge. What does not depend upon knowledge? Knowledge is the fruitful and inexhaustible mother of all good. And knowledge has been crushed, even every avenue of research or method of thinking that could lead to it has been systematically blocked and forbidden, by Christianity since its first appearance on the earth. Morality depends upon conditions of every kind—physical, economical, political, social. Wendell Phillips said that crimes were in exact proportion to the rise and fall in the price of bread. When in France prior to the Revolution the nobles and clergy exacted seven-eighths of the toiler's whole products and made it nearly impossible for him to support life, morality declined, desperate peasants assembled in whole armies of vagrants and brigands and lived in the forests in open outlawry, faith between man and man dwindled, and human society began to sink and disappear in savagery. People who can obtain prosperity and satisfaction of their desires by moderate and equitably requited exertions do not become criminals. It is those embittered by disappointments or want, or injustice seen around them, who become so. There are a thousand conditions under a concurrence of which alone can morality and consequently happiness be produced. Social science is just beginning to realize this and in its infancy to grope feebly about for them. This science, this knowledge, Christianity has made it her special object to obstruct, trample, extirpate for fifteen hundred years.

Music for Liberals.

At last the Liberals of the country are furnished with a book of songs, hymns, and music which any musician can use. Heretofore such attempts hav been somewhat futil for the reason that music did not accompany the words of the songs, and those who essayed to sing them must choose their own tunes, or rely upon memory or some other work for the fitting notes. The Cosmian Hymn Book, compiled by L. K. Washburn, remedies this defect. The book is not, of course, the final work of the kind, but it is an ambitious and exceedingly excellent beginning. It will meet the crying public want for which it has been prepared, and the beauty and good taste of the selections will preserve it a place on the music tables of Liberals when other works shall be issued as the demand increases.

Mr. Washburn states in his preface that care has been exercised to hav the book of the highest moral sentiment, united with the choicest music. Of the music we cannot pretend to judge; but the sentiment of the songs is surely moral, educativ, inspiring. The book is not at all sectarian, it is not even religious, except as truth and beauty and melody are religious. If the word God is in the book anywhere it escaped our somewhat careful reading of the hymns. The Cosmian contains two hundred and fifty-eight hymns and songs, and all but a dozen or two, which are sung to familiar tunes with which all are acquainted, hav the music with them. Hymns of Nature form the first section of the book, with twenty-five songs; Hymns of Humanity, the second section, with thirty-eight distinctiv pieces; Hymns of Freedom, the third, with seventeen patriotic airs. Miscellaneous songs with music reach from the eightieth hymn to the Doxologies, the first of which is the one hundred and eighty-seventh and the last the hundred and ninety-first. Liberal Hymns occupy seven pages, and Children's Hymns about forty pages. Hymns for funerals appropriately close the collection, which is thoroughly indexed by subjects and tunes.

A great many of the hymns and songs are taken from the Spiritual Harp, Mrs. Burnz's Liberal Hymn Book; others are used by permission of the writers; selections are made from the best music of all countries, and a large number are original both in words and music. Jennie B. Brown's name appears frequently as a contributor, as do Susan H. Wixon's, Mary Baird Finch's, Mrs. Burnz's, and others. Caleb S. Weeks figures as an adapter, and some of Whittier's and Longfellow's choicest songs hav had music fitted to their rhythmic preachment. The old tunes are given reasonable words, and the new words inspiring music. It is, in short, a hymn book for Freethought, a rescuing of one of civilization's aids from superstition's grasp. It was Luther who is said to hav said that there was no good reason why the devil should hav all the good tunes, and straightway his church borrowed the music of the reveler to entice people into the fold. A German drinking song furnished the church with one of its noblest airs—"Old Hundred"—and the devil was defrauded right and left to build up godliness, in which the priests found much profit. Since then superstition has monopolized two-thirds of the music of the world, and the most cheering and civilizing harmonies hav been wrapped around cannibalistic and brimstone teachings. There is better reason for rescuing them from the senseless twaddle of theology than from the roystering devotees of Bacchus. Music can be made to help Liberalism, by adding attractions to our meetings, and in the home it is most useful to aid in teaching children, whose tenacious memories oftentimes cling closer to the words and meanings of the hymns they sing than to the instructions of the parents. If the youngsters sing at all, and most of them do, it is of the greatest importance that they hav sensible words as well as good tunes. The Cosmian Hymn Book supplies both.

Mr. Washburn merits much praise for the good judgment displayed in the selections for the book, and he should be encouraged by a large demand for the hymnal. The price is $1.50.

Editorial Notes.

THE effort in Minneapolis to form an evangelical alliance to fight the Roman Catholic church failed through disagreement of the orthodox churches. Each sect prefers to go its own way and grab for itself, even though Rome should ultimately get everything. The press of the city seems to fear the Roman church, too, and the chances are good that the pope's Germans, Swedes, and Norwegians will run the state of Minnesota for some time yet.

MAYOR GRANT, of this city, starts in well, though his church cares little what the people do on Sunday after attending mass and contributing their cash to the priest. In his first message to the board of aldermen he says: "The parks of the city hav been established for the use and enjoyment of the whole people. Everything that they contain should therefore be freely accessible to the citizens. The closing of the Museums of Art and Natural History on Sundays is a practical exclusion of the industrial masses from all opportunity to visit them. I hope that some means will soon be devised by which these museums will be made accessible to the public on Sundays."

THE secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association of Newburgh, N. Y., is a real good believer. When the North American Review containing the controversy between Colonel Ingersoll and Cardinal Manning reached him he promptly tore out Colonel Ingersoll's articles, and placed those in which the churchman's articles were printed on file for preservation. A member of the society, noticing his zeal, remarked to him that a religion which could not stand up before an argument was scarcely worth lugging around the country, and the secretary ordered the heretic out of the building, sent him his membership fee by mail, requested the return of his ticket, and told him that if he ever came inside the building again he should be arrested. In this kind way the secretary doubtless hopes to win souls to Christ.

IN sending out its New Year's regards—which THE TRUTH SEEKER is happy to receive and more than willing to return—San Francisco Freethought converts the benediction of the heavenly host into this: "Peace on earth to men of good will." From a human point of view this paraphrase is an improvement. Men of bad will—mean fellows, the liars, the pharisees, the bigots, the defamers, the hypocrits, those trying to injure their brethren—don't deserve much peace, and, if we ever prayed, we should pray that they didn't get any. We congratulate our witty brother upon his amendment of inspiration. California, by the way, is coming along to the front in Liberalism. In San Francisco this month, and in Oakland across the bay, meetings are being held every Sunday, and the outcome of the 'Frisco gathering will be the formation of a state organization. Over five hundred Californians hav signed a call for that purpose, and on Sunday, the 27th, the largest auxiliary of the American Secular Union in the country will hold its first meeting. The object is to "help secure throughout the country practical compliance with the Demands of Liberalism." California is generous, and having forced its own churches to pay taxes proposes to aid its sister states. This activity, we imagin, is due to Freethought, which shares the prosperity it has helped create, and comes out enlarged to sixteen pages, printed very neatly, and edited with ability, discrimination, poetic fervor, and humor. George Macdonald is the presiding office genius, and since making bone of his bone and flesh of his flesh one of the late Theron Leland's fairest daughters, he scintillates with added brightness. Mr. Putnam bubbles all over with poesy, but has a hard, logical side nevertheless, as the ministers he has met on his ten months' lecturing tour, in which he reached as far as New York, can testify. Their paper is a credit to themselvs and the cause, and they deserve all the good fortune that has befallen them since the big-hearted California Liberals took them into the family.

Letters from Friends.

ST. CHARLES, MINN., Dec. 12, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: As regards the hen problem in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 1st, I will say, if a hen and a half lays one and a half eggs in one day and a half, will it or will it not make forty-two eggs for six hens in seven days? If not, I giv it up. Yours truly, WM. THOMAS.

ALMA, ILL., Dec. 19, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Answer to the Tribune puzzle. If a hen and a half lay an egg and a half in a day and a half, a hen and a half will lay one egg a day, which is seven eggs in seven days, and six hens will lay four times as many, which is twenty-eight. AARON SHREFFLER.

BELLOWS FALLS, VT., Dec. 17, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 15th 1 see three answers to the hen-and-egg problem. All I think wrong. I would say to the "Constant Reader" in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 1st that if a hen and a half lay one egg and a half in a day and a half, then one hen would lay one egg in three half days, or two eggs in three days; then six hens would lay in seven days six x seven = forty-two eggs; and two-thirds of forty-two twenty-eight; therefore the six hens would lay in seven days twenty-eight eggs. N. MONROE.

CAÑON CITY, COL., Dec. 23, 288.

MR. EDITOR: The egg problem does not seem to be settled to the satisfaction of the truth seekers. It is certainly important that it be decided before setting time comes again. Had each one given his or her solution the readers would be better able to judge of their correctness. Analysis: Since a hen and a half lays an egg and a half in a day and a half, and since one hen will do two-thirds the work of a hen and a half, one hen will lay one egg in a day and a half, and two-thirds as much in one day as in a day and a half, or two-thirds of one egg in one day. Then again, if one hen lay two-thirds of an egg in a day, six hens will lay four eggs in a day, and in seven days seven times four, or twenty-eight eggs.

If, as our friend Miss Gibson says, the hen were to lay one egg a day, she would lay the egg and a half alone in a day and a half. The Tribune's mathematician must hav been out. "Constant Reader" is evidently correct.

ORELLA LOCKE.

RED BANK, N. J., Dec. 27, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am obliged to my friends for trying to help me out of my egg puzzle difficulty; but I am about as well off now as I was before they tried. I think Friend S. F. Hazeltine is right; and I should thank him if he would explain how he arrives at his conclusion—27.9996 eggs.

The majority of the answers first given to the puzzle in the Tribune were twenty-eight and forty-two, and the paper says that these are incorrect. Both the answers fourteen and forty-two, however, are easily seen to be incorrect; but the answer twenty-eight seems correct. If a hen and a half lay an egg and a half in a day and a half, four times that number of hens, or six hens, will lay four times that number of eggs in a day and a half, or six eggs in the same time, a day and a half; and if six hens lay six eggs in a day and a half, six hens will lay in seven days, or four and two-thirds times a day and a half, twenty-eight eggs. The same result will be arrived at by working the example by compound proportion.

Now, although I think the answer 27.9996 is the correct one, I cannot see the fallacy in the answer twenty-eight; therefore I appeal again to my brother truth seekers for aid. Who will aid me in extricating myself from this difficulty?

Fraternally, CONSTANT READER.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Jan. 10, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I am going into the egg business right away. C. L. James says that "one hen lays one egg a day." Then by his "familiar rule," one twenty-fourth of a hen will lay one twenty-fourth of an egg in one twenty-fourth of a day, or an hour. As each twenty-fourth of the hen will lay one twenty-fourth of an egg in an hour, the whole twenty-four twenty-fourths of a hen, or the whole hen, will lay twenty-four twenty-fourths of an egg, or a whole egg, in an hour. The next hour another egg will be laid, and so on, making twenty-four eggs in a day from the whole hen. As soon as I can get from Wisconsin a good stock of hens familiar with this rule, laying twenty-four eggs apiece in a day, I shall make my everlasting fortune.

But I hope these hens will not form any trusts or combinations; for, starting as before with "one hen lays one egg a day," if it takes 365 hens a year to lay 365 eggs, I am afraid it would not pay for their feed. HENRY M. PARKHURST.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Jan. 3, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I am a reader of your valuable paper. My son, just seventeen, is a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is well perused in my family, consisting of husband, children, an aged father, and myself. How well Mr. Heston caricatures the passages of that great equivocating book! Some of my friends think I am a terrible woman and mother to allow it in the house. Indeed, some of them hav ceased to call, and are friends no more, because of my terrible belief, as they call it. But I shall continue on, and hope they may finally become clear-sighted and see the incredibility of that fabled book. Last Sunday I attended the Criterion to hear Mr. Pentecost's address. He handled his subject well, showing his great thought on the subject, as he always does on all topics. I consider him a second Ingersoll. They are both great and good men, who hav done and are doing great work in freeing mankind from the terrible bondage of Christian tyranny. As I left the place I overheard two gentlemen discussing the speaker. One said he cannot come up to Talmage. I could not refrain from saying, Giv us more Pentecosts and fewer Talmages. As I had not heard the great divine in several years, I concluded to go and hear him in the evening. Of course the Temple is grand and spacious, and wealth flowed in until it was full, but there lacked the true and just man, for man's earthly welfare while we exist on this beautiful earth. It was all for God and our future happiness in the sweet by and by. He also said an abbreviated life was to be much desired, and longevity was only desired by Agnostics. They were extra careful on stormy days to go protected, so that their days might be lengthened. Judging by his looks, he is good to himself, and no doubt does not forget his umbrella and galoshes when he ventures out in the storm. No doubt he wishes to be a Methuselah as much as anyone.

Please send me the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC FOR 1889. Hoping the year 1889 will bring you many subscribers, MRS. M. L. POLLARD.

MOAB, UTAH, Dec. 13, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Being a reader and an admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER, for its grand and brave sentiments, its ceaseless warfare against dogmas and error, and also for the volumes in its illustrations, and being so greatly impressed with the one in the issue of December 8th, "When Reason Rules," I thought I would suggest the idea of having it chromoed. I would venture to say that three-fourths of your subscribers would be only too glad to procure not merely one but many others, and I for one will take one dozen to start with. I see no reason why that would not be one of the best means of putting those grand thoughts before the public mind. Hoping you will giv the matter a careful consideration, I remain, Respectfully yours, O. H. MASON.

SAMOTH, ILL., Jan. 1, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: With my best wishes for you and our cause, I hav the honor to send you herein the necessary amount for my renewal as subscriber to "my Bible," THE TRUTH SEEKER, also for a new one, and for one copy of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL.

I hav had the pleasure of one year's advantages of the lights and truths of your paper, but it has cost me the loss of my position as notary public. As soon as this priest-ridden community found out that your paper was taken and circulated by me—Down with the French Infidel! In fact, how could I make a good Christian take an oath in which he—the Christian—did not believe himself? Well, they can refuse me their custom, but they cannot stop my TRUTH SEEKER.

We hav but one true Liberal, but a good one is he—A. B. Agnew, M.D. We hav many insignificant Christians who are unbelievers in their faith but too cowardly to say so.

Samoth is built up with about twenty dwellings; we hav one "pen" called sometimes church, school-house, political den, fair for Christ-agents, and, in fact, it is used for any purpose except for a Joss-house. These twenty families are divided in equal numbers into Methodists, Presbyterians, Baptists, Christians, and two Infidels.

Notwithstanding the opposition I hav to meet, I will try to circulate enough of our Freethought papers, etc., to obtain some more subscribers for your valuable paper.

Fraternally yours, D. L. D'ELYSÉE.

LINES AND RHYMES EULOGISTIC FOR THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The grand TRUTH SEEKER livs to battle for the right.
Important messages it givs, well shown in black and white.
Ten thousand homes it doth make glad in freedom's work and way;
No honest reader is made sad in what it hath to say.
Against priestcraft, that ancient thief, yet humbug of our time,
It strikes hard blows of unbelief, nor is it any crime.
Liv and let liv, frank and fair, it givs each man his chance
To speak his mind as free as air, as time and sense advance.
Old-fogyism it discards, and superstitious lore,
Of wild fanatics still at large, in churches by the score.
THE TRUTH SEEKER is now indeed a light to all mankind;
It fills a want that millions need, they nowhere else can find.
Long may it liv to speak the truth, as it is wont to do;
Enlight'ning aged men and youth in science grand and true.
Let Comstocks rage and gnash their teeth—lie, decoy, and boast;
Their work is like the barren heath on rocky, sandy coast.
They may succeed by crafty lies to block the golden wheels
Of progress, yet'll do no more than hold it by the heels
But for a day or two, and then the ponderous truthful car
Will crush all silly Comstock men, who seek the truth to mar.
Alas for them! the time is near when they will hav to "git;"
No more against good men appear from out their slimy pit.
THE TRUTH SEEKER will wind them up with all their wicked plans;
They're worthless as a yelping pup, or rattling of tin pans.
Long may the dear TRUTH SEEKER liv to bless mankind full well,
And lessons grand of truth to giv! In all good deeds excel!

CLEVELAND, O., Dec. 31, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: At the meeting of our society yesterday in Memorial Hall, the speaker for the afternoon was Mr. G. F. Moore, a member of the Union. His style is somewhat out of the usual order of speakers, but attractivly so, and he held the close attention of the audience to the end. He made a number of points which are new to me at least. His subject was, "Why I am an Infidel," and the following is a synopsis of the lecture: "No better reason can be given for being an Infidel than George Eliot's, 'That one so believing cares for this world and its affairs so much that he lets the other world take care of itself.' One reason why I am an Infidel is that the church has opposed all legislation for good until it saw that opposition would make it unpopular. The Christian church reminds me of the clown in the circus. Some athlete performs some act which calls for applause, then the clown steps forward and imitates it, and kissing his hand to the audience awaits the acknowledgment of the lookers-on, which rightfully is not his. And so the church, after any great reform, steps in and claims all the credit. Christianity claims to hav abolished slavery. My first recollection of that is that my parents were turned out of the Methodist church at Painesville, O., for being Abolitionists. They tell about the sublime and heroic death of Jesus. It seems to me anything but sublime. He died in a more cowardly manner than the thief by his side, and if he were God I do not see how his death called for any more courage on his part than the snapping of my finger on mine. His expression at the ninth hour, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' expresses more cowardice than courage, and shows that he feared death. There hav been many deaths, and among Freethinkers, more noble than that of Jesus. We do not know but he could control pain, and that he really suffered nothing. Christians are too willing to quote what they consider the bad words of Infidels, while they never cite their good deeds. On the other hand, they quote the good sayings of Christians, but keep silent about their bad deeds."

F. S. MERRILL, Secretary.

MONTPELIER, IND., Dec. 11, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to say a few words in behalf of Father Hacker—though he is able to fight his own battle. Mr. Gunther expresses himself that J. Hacker is full of things not worth knowing; and J. H. Wood treats the ideas of Mr. Hacker more severely than justly, denying his position and saying "it is not land robbery, but taxation." If by tax he means sums assessed by government, he is badly mistaken. Poverty is not taxes, but money or property.

I feel like giving some of my experience, which is similar to that of many others. I chose farming for my business, and wished to till my own soil; bought a farm, for which I paid part in 1863. It was wet and badly out of repair. Fences were to be made, clearing, ditching, building to be done, orchard to plant, and interest to pay. The interest must be paid if the family went without clothes; crops might fail, sickness come, or diseases destroy animals, but the interest never failed to become due. In the mean time the greenback was partly retired, silver was demonetized, the Resumption act was passed; bankruptcy followed, as my readers well recollect. I hav thus far come through the war paying interest at a rate seldom less than ten per cent per annum, but the slain or bankrupts are lying all around me, and I hav neighbors that must fall under the weight of usurious interest. The system pursued by the cunning, plundering class, aided by venal officers, could not well be more surely calculated to make millionaires and paupers than the American finance of the last twenty-five years. The wealthy gobble all labor makes. The farmers build the cities, railroads, develop the mines, and produce all. And the laborers are paupers just as soon as they stop work. The farmer gets sick, his work stops, expenses increase, money must be borrowed, interest must be paid, the farm is under mortgage, and soon the money-loaner forecloses the mortgage and takes the farm at perhaps less than half its cash value, and rubs his hands and calls it a lucky turn in business. Father Hacker knows all this, and that probably not less than half the farms in the United States are to-day under mortgage. I honor Jeremiah Hacker for helping to start rolling a very little ball that is now getting large, and will soon be large enough to bury beyond resurrection these money lords, railroad magnates, and land robbers—not the men, but their nefarious business.

WILLIAM ALLEN.

LEHIGH, IA., Jan. 2, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 29th, Richard Conway wants to know what action was taken by the Knights of Labor in A. C. Everett's trouble with that "noble order." Then comes the letter of Mr. Everett himself in answer. I hav read Mr. Everett's letter very carefully, and I believe that he is telling nothing but the truth. I was a member of the Knights of Labor for nearly eight years, so I am pretty well posted as to their methods and workings. At the time of the trouble I was recording secretary of Local Assembly 1,613, Knights of Labor, and as the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER wanted some one to find out the facts in his—Everett's—case, I wrote to the secretary of the Wabash assembly in regard to the matter. Inclosed you will find his answer:

WABASH, IND., June 20, 1886.

WM. PARRISH, Dear Sir and Brother: In regard to Mr. Everett, he is a natural crank and an avowed Infidel. At the time we organized our assembly, Everett came in as a charter member.

At the first meeting we held some one laid a large Bible on the center-table. Everett got up and said "he would hav that book out of the hall; that it was a book he hated, and if it wasn't taken out he would leave and never come in again as long as that book was on the table."

By a unanimous vote of the assembly it was decided to hav the Bible in the center. That made Everett mad.

He was publishing an Infidel paper at the time, and he wrote up three of our officers in his foul and slanderous language, and published things he was bound by his obligation to keep secret. There were charges preferred for that reason, and he was expelled by the court. We never boycotted his paper. He never had any patronage. He has been driven out of every town he has ever been in. He curses God and all who love him.

Question 1. Everett damned the Bible and God in the assembly room, and printed a slanderous article in his paper which caused us a great deal of trouble.

2. There were charges preferred by the officers who were abused.
3. He asked for a withdrawal card, but there being charges against him it was not granted.
4. His dues were paid until Nov. 1, 1885.
5. There was no boycott placed on his paper.
6. The judge of court said "he was notified, but did not appear."
7. I hav no reason to think he never received a copy of the charges.

I am sure that Mr. Everett had no injustice done him. He is not a fit man to be a Knight.

I received a letter from T. V. Powderly concerning this matter, and showed it to Everett. He published that in the article previously mentioned.

Should Mr. Everett fight aggregated capital in place of God he could accomplish a great deal more.

Hoping I hav given information wanted, I remain,

Fraternally yours, L. W. Bowers, R. S.
L. A. 4,204.

Some may ask why I kept silent so long. Well, I will tell you. I knew that we had quite a number of more influential and more capable Infidel members in the order than I. So I waited. Oh, thinks I, there's Mrs. Severance, a delegate to the general assembly. Surely she will look this matter up. You would think her heart would break because those Anarchists were hanged. But no one did anything but you. You hav told what the outcome would be from time to time as you thought occasion required. Now, Mr. Editor, I would like to whisper a word in Brother Everett's ear. I want to tell him that I am in about the same "fix" that he is in—that some Knights would like to kill me. That I hav been assaulted twice, knocked down, and nearly killed by kind brothers because I told the truth. But I did not go after any will-o'-the-wisp executiv board. Not much. I know how it is myself, because I was at one time judge, and charges being brought against a party, the person bringing the charges said: "Be Jasus, this man must be expelled." But he was not, though. But that assembly was too hot for me afterward.

Now, Mr. Everett, quit your booing. Let every tub stand on its own bottom. The Knights of Labor has the rope around its neck, and if you and others will leave it alone it will hang itself. Instead of fooling away your time fighting them, spend it fighting for yourself. Wm. Parrish.

Cleveland, O., Dec. 17, 1888.

Mr. Editor: At our meeting yesterday the members of the Secular Union, and others who were so fortunate as to be present, had the pleasure of listening to the editor of Secular Thought, Mr. Chas. Watts, that indefatigable worker and inspiring speaker of the Secular cause. His energetic and enthusiastic spirit seemed to diffuse itself through the audience, and one listener near me remarked, "I begin to feel ashamed of myself for not doing more for the Secular cause," at the same time handing me a $10 gold-piece. I hav heard Mr. Watts twice before, but it seems to me that in this lecture, "Religion and Science: Their Relation to Civilization," he even outdid himself. I hav never listened to a lecture that contained more telling points against the Christian mythology and its errors. They were irrefutable. A pair of parsons sat in the back part of the audience, and it was expected that they would challenge some of the statements of the speaker, but they must hav felt their inability to cope with such a power, for they never murmured, and sat as meek as a weeping willow. The following is a brief synopsis of this excellent lecture:

I hold that religion has played no important part in the march of civilization, and has no necessary connection therewith. In the past, when religion ruled and controled everything and all, civilization was naught—progress stood fettered and still. In those countries where skepticism is most prevalent the wave of civilization has swept the highest, while those which bow to creed and dogma and are obedient to religious thought lag in the rear. In the long and dreary road from barbarism to civilization there hav been obstacles. The distorted ideas and nightmares of theology hav been one, and one of the greatest. A dominant and powerful and rich church has been another. Kingcraft and priestcraft hav ever had a tendency toward barbarism. A concentration of wealth has been yet another impediment. I believe there is enough for all. This cannot be accomplished by force, but by reason, argument, and love. Among other obstacles there hav been intellectual laziness, and an other-worldism which pays too much regard to the future and not enough to the present. Certainly, if you devote a considerable portion of your time to preparation for another world, you must giv so much less to this. The greatest aid we can giv to civilization is to remove these obstacles, which religion has not done, but has even added to them. A great many of the modern theologians are trying to convince you that religion and science are in accord. It is not so. Science has had no fiercer enemies in all the past than those who were pillars of the church and promoters of religion. When science was a babe they tried to strangle it; when a youth they tried to stifle and banish it; but now it has become a man in spite of them, and threatens the very existence of religion. Religion has its origin in ignorance, or, to put it more mildly, lack of knowledge, and in fear. Religion is founded on emotion; science on reason and the experience of the past and present. Religionists believe it to be true because they feel that it is true, which is not a reliable guide, which has been the case with the belief of the worshiper of every idol, with the devotee of every religion. The Christian would hardly allow that this proves the truth of such a belief. Religion is emotional and depends on external things, while science requires demonstration, and depends on the internal; that there is no end to progress, and there is that within man which ever urges him forward and onward. It has a necessary relation to civilization, while religion has not. Science is of the mind; religion of the heart. The former never sneers at skepticism. It is the intellectual nobody who does that.

I will refer to the five historical plagues. What did religion do then? Nothing, absolutely nothing. What has it or its followers ever done for civilization? Absolutely nothing. I think all Christians will admit that sanitary knowledge is not due to religion. Now take the great plague of London. For months death and devastation went on, and in the long, still hours of the night the only cry that was heard was, "Bring out your dead." Religion was at its hight; prayers could not stop the destruction. Science stepped in and removed the cause, which stopped the effect; and so it has ever been—religion doing nothing, science everything. Because religion is one of the things found with civilization is no sign that it created civilization. In this era when civilization has reached the greatest hight ever known, all round is found the Salvation Army, yet I do not think anyone could be found, outside of an asylum for the insane, who would claim that the Salvation Army is the cause of this intellectual grandeur. People would not listen to the sermons that were preached fifty years ago. The men and women of to-day want to learn how to liv, not how to die. Religion is a negativ force, and has little practical effect. Modern civilization has killed the devil and shut up hell, and thus done so much to civilize religion. Religion is not a practical force in every-day life. The rough element ignores it, so it does nothing for them. The intelligent classes do their own thinking instead of hiring some one to do it for them and then finding fault with the result. Society in general go to church for Mrs. Grundy's sake, but do not regulate their lives by its precepts. Enthusiasm has been the cause of the great reforms and movements, not religion, and when it has run counter to religion, religion has found it impossible to check it. Wars are opposed to the teachings of the meek and lowly Jesus, yet they go on; and in the Christian countries you see the engins of destruction manned by those whose purpose it is to kill their co-religionists. Christianity makes the Bible a master. A book to be useful must be one's servant. Two-thirds of the race hav never heard of the Bible. Of the third that has, one-third of that third do not believe it, another third is doubtful, the remaining third indorse it but do not liv up to it. Now, where is your Bible? There are two books in the Bible. If the second was necessary the first was imperfect, and therefore not inspired. Here are two passages which are contradictory. The first book says, "An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth." The second says, if we are struck on one cheek to turn the other for the same polite treatment. Both cannot be true, therefore both cannot be inspired. The Bible by alleged inspiration has held the world in awe and made its believers slaves; been a weight hung to the neck of knowledge, and a fetter to the feet of civilization. I understand there is to be a debate after this lecture. I am through. "Now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation." Come on.

No one responded to the invitation to defend the shattered dogmas. Mr. Lees made a few comments on certain parts of the lecture relativ to a belief in a future life being detrimental to civilization. Mr. Watts returned that a belief in that was not necessarily an obstacle, but that the theological phase upheld by Christianity and taught by the Bible was.

F. S. M.

Brooklyn, N. Y., Dec. 22, 1888.

Mr. Editor: It may be considered a little too subsequent to reply to the communication of my fellow-Brooklynite, J. A. Tuttle, whose letter appeared in your issue of October 13th, but I hav the same excuse for not replying sooner that the newly converted "tough" had for his belated assault upon the Jew, whom he accused of having crucified the former's savior, and who, upon being reminded by the judge before whom he appeared to answer for the assault that the crucifixion took place eighteen hundred years ago, replied, "Well, I only heard of it last night." So I hav just finished the perusal of Mr. Tuttle's epistle to the free traders, and reply as soon as possible thereafter. It may be considered that the topic smacks of ancient history, because the election is over, but inasmuch as any future contest between the two great parties must necessarily be fought out on the same lines as the last one, the topic would seem to be one which should be ventilated to the greatest possible extent, in order that those misguided voters, who at the last election threw their ballots directly in the opposit direction from the one in which their true interest lies, may be educated up to the point of wisdom, which shall prevent them from thinking that their prosperity can by any possible chance be enhanced by a system of taxation which robs the many for the benefit of the few. I am too modest to make any such demand on your space as a thorough analysis of all the points touched upon in Mr. Tuttle's letter would require, and shall therefore only notice the most saliently idiotic of the gentleman's alleged arguments. To begin: Does Mr. Tuttle fancy that he has answered the arguments of free traders when he mentions the interesting fact that he knew a man who was an adept in factory work, who was unable in 1848-60 to find satisfactory wages and employment? Has there ever been a time under any fiscal system when this same fact might not hav been true?

He mentions that his remembrance is that $150,000,000 were needed to pay the interest on the foreign capital which was needed during that free trade epoch to furnish the prosperity attributed to the operation of a low tariff. Does the gentleman suppose that the country pays less than that sum now in interest to foreign capitalists to produce the prosperity which protection receives the credit of bringing about? If so, he is in error, for a large proportion of the exports which go from this country to foreign lands—and which render it possible for us to maintain the favorable balance of trade, which pleases so hugely those who believe that a country should receive less than it givs in order to get rich—a large proportion, I say, of the exports from this country go in payment of interest, or ground rent, or to repay the advance of foreign capitalists. What has the sending of a German or of an Englishman over here to mismanage the Erie railroad got to do with the right or wrong of protection? If the German or the Englishman had not gone yachting or fishing, but had administered the affairs of the Erie railroad in an effectiv and efficient way, would free trade therefore hav been proved to be right? It would seem as if that must be the necessary conclusion, since the fact of their mismanagement was considered as proving that protection is right.

The gentleman says that "the tariff of 1861 enabled our manufacturing and railroad companies to extricate themselvs from the difficulties into which free trade had lured or forced them," because "it gave full and remunerativ employment to existing factories and railroads, and created an additional demand for factories and rail facilities, without the aid of foreign capitalists." How does Mr. Tuttle know from whence the capital came that built the factories he speaks of? But let that pass. The tariff of 1861 added largely to the cost of those commodities upon which it was levied, and we are therefore surprised that enhanced cost should increase demand. It does not usually do any such thing as that. Dry goods men and storekeepers generally do not raise their prices when they want to increase the demand for their goods. Imagin for a moment the effect of an advertisment stating that Brown, Jones & Tuttle, the popular dry goods house, will place upon their bargain counters goods of a certain sort at an advance of twenty-five per cent over ordinary prices. How the people would rush to their store to obtain, if not the goods, at least a glance at the lunatics who wrote the advertisment!

But Mr. Tuttle would no doubt claim that this prosperity was caused by the manufacture of things in this country which had formerly been imported, in which case it is only necessary to point to the fact that the reduction in importation, which is made by the tariff, would be met by a corresponding reduction in the exportation of the things that formerly went out to pay for that importation, which is now stopped. Imports are paid for with exports, and any falling off in the amount of the former will be counterbalanced by a corresponding decrease in the latter. Mr. Tuttle may (and probably does) not know this fact, but it is true all the same. That the tariff of 1861 "enabled our government to sustain the burden of the war which ensued" does not prove that some other system of taxation would not hav been preferable to a tariff, any more than the fact that robbery keeps the robbers in luxury would prove the beneficence of theft.

The gentleman says that the country was more prosperous at the close than at the beginning of the war. Very well; the war resulted in killing something like two millions of men, directly and indirectly, and in dissipating, in various ways, some $5,000,000,000. Truly, if protection could cause a people which had been subjected to such gigantic drafts upon its material wealth to be more prosperous after than before the drain, it is a thing that should receive the reverence and veneration of even the free traders. But there is a little, but very important, hiatus in the proof which protectionists offer as establishing the fact that protection did anything but hamper the people in the time of their extremity. For what is protection? It is merely the imposition of a tax on imports, which makes them cost the consumer more, in order to benefit the home producer of the competing commodities, by enabling him to get greater prices, in consequence of the fact that the prices of the goods which compete with his are enhanced by the tax, and which raised prices those who use those goods are finally forced to pay. Now, how can prosperity be increased by increasing the cost of living? How can opulence result to a people as the effect of paying more for what they buy, to the manufacturers, thus increasing the maker's profit, when every dollar that he gets above the price that would rule without restriction is at their direct cost and expense? Suppose that consumers should save the amount by free trade that they now waste by protection, is it not evident that the country would be at least as rich as now, inasmuch as the money would all be in the country then as now, and as according to protection logic it does not matter whose pocket the amount happens to be in, it may as well be held by those to whom it legally belongs?

Really I hav been carried beyond the limit I had set myself, but these protectionists do need such a lot of instruction and correction, that the length of this communication seems in a measure excusable. I shall notice but one other point, however.

The gentleman shows his complete ignorance of the state of affairs in England at the time of the advent of free trade, when he says that "England was protectionist until she had built up her manufacturing industries to such an extent that her agricultural resources would no longer support them." The opponents of free trade in breadstuffs were exactly those who raised breadstuffs—that is to say, the farmers and landlords who were enabled by the corn laws to get an enhanced price for what they raised by reason of the increased price of imports of grain. Again, manufacturing industries were not prosperous, as how could they be when the cost of living was doubled by the tax on necessaries? It was the general depression of business and the consequently resulting state of starvation which gave Richard Cobden and John Bright their immense audiences and which made the change in the fiscal system which they advocated possible of accomplishment. All England was starving in 1846.

The gentleman says that "war and commerce are the same in principle and effect." War is a conflict. Commerce is a bargain. In war only one party can gain. In commerce both parties must find profit or commerce would cease. It is only in the distempered brain of a protectionist that any similarity can be supposed to exist between grim-visaged war and peaceful commerce, for the first is never anything but destructiv, and the last is never anything else but productiv.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Heart and Mind.

When love and kindness all adorn
The festiv board of joy,
And every smile anew is born
A sadness to destroy,
The heart will know no more distress,
And agony and gloom
Will fade away in tenderness,
To wakeless death and doom.

When deed and action form a part
Of every book and creed,
When swift shall come from every heart
A balm for every need,
Then mind expands to nobler truths,
By rich affection led;
The vilest thought it takes and soothes,
And makes it good instead.

The laurels won on earth entwine
Life's duty to the right;
While evil justice doth consign
To dark abodes of night.
The spirit in sweet communion dwells
Throughout eternal space;
The goodness of mankind impels
Justice to all the race.

Richland, Dak. LOUIS N. CRILL, JR.

The Aged.

Childhood is beautiful with its bright and eager hopes, its fond, trustful pursuit of happiness. Every motion of its activ limbs is grace and beauty. Childhood is the rosy flush of the morning of life. Middle age, too, in royal stateliness, with aims fixed and permanent, strong and athletic, counts and calls for admiration and homage. There is still another period in human life that challenges our love and veneration. It is when man, rounding the time when health and strength is at its highest, has entered the decline of his days. It is the greatest and grandest, and should be the best, of all times in life. The western windows are flooded with purple and golden light, and warm with rosy sunset hues. This light and warmth sheds a halo over the pilgrim coming toward the western hills.

The aged are the true millionaires, holding the wealth of experience, the wisdom gathered throughout all the days of a lifetime. The eyes may dim, but they see clearer and steadier than ever before. The dimples may hav changed to wrinkles, but they hav become the mirror reflecting the truth or falsity of passing events. The tones of the aged may be feeble, but no one can instruct so wisely or so well. More can be learned from their lips than from any other source.

Nothing is more cruel than to neglect or hurt the feelings of those who are passing close to the land of shadows. Speak kindly, pleasantly to all such, who, having borne the heat and burden of the day, deserve the best the world can giv. Let no hasty word, no covert sneer, no slight, bring a tear to the eyes that hav already shed their share of tears.

Be gentle with the aged, patient to listen to all they hav to say, earnest to catch and treasure all their words of advice. Bring them into the younger life around them and make them partakers of every joy and pleasure possible. Let them never feel that they are slighted or overlooked in any way, but seek their opinion, and trust them with responsibilities. Do not make them feel that they hav outgrown their usefulness, or are troublesome, or in anybody's way.

The aged are the possible angels of earth. We should so regard them, and ever treat them with the love, honor, and respect we would like bestowed upon us when we stand where they do. S. H. W.

Correspondence.

GOLDTHWAITE, TEX., Jan. 1, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I see other children are writing for the Corner, I thought I would write a few lines. I was twelve years old last May. I go to school every day. My papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. I enjoy reading the Children's Corner very much. If you think this will do, I would like to see it in print. Your little Freethinker friend,

IDA MCPHERSON.

AXTELL, KAN., Dec. 30, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write to the Children's Corner. We had chicken for dinner and cake for supper on Christmas day. I got ten cents' worth of writing paper and ten cents' worth of envelopes for Christmas. I like to go to school. I learn fast. We hav a good teacher; her name is May Brauner. I study reading, spelling, arithmetic, and geography. The school-house was painted this year. It was also fixed up inside. Father bought "The Story Hour" and Buffon's "Natural History" for us children. I like to read the Children's Corner, and to look at the pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I will close, for this time.

JUDGE MERRITT MINER.

GRANTFORK, ILL., Jan. 4, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my second letter, which I would like to see in print. We had a jolly time during the Christmas week. I wish some of the girls would correspond with me. I would answer right away. I am corresponding with a girl in Ontario, and it is so nice to know how everything looks far away. I am twelve years old, and next birthday I will be sixteen. Many people wonder how it is; and, no doubt, you will, so I will explain. My birthday was on February 29th, which occurs every four years, or every leap year. Of course I am every year older, which is March 1st. But every leap year comes my birthday. Now, if anyone can't understand this, I would like for them to write; and, otherwise, I would like to hav them correspond with me. My papa wants me to learn to write, and write letters, too; so he said I should correspond with some girls who like to get nice letters. I must close, with best wishes to you and all children. Your loving friend, EMMA KRAFT.

P.S.—Girls, don't forget to write..

GRANTFORK, ILL., Jan. 4, 1889.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: As this is my first letter, I would very much like to see it in print. I am going to school and study seven studies. I am eleven years old. I study spelling, history, arithmetic, reading, language, geography, and writing. I would like to correspond with somebody that is about as old as I am.

Mr. Dawes stayed with us three weeks. He lectured three times in Pocahontas, three times in Alhambra, and once in Highland. He had a debate with a preacher, and Mr. Dawes did the preacher up in a fine shape. As I hav written all I intended to write I will close my letter. Don't forget to write to me, boys. Your Liberal friend,

JOHN KRAFT.

P. S.—I nearly forgot to tell you that the last time Mr. G. H. Dawes spoke at Pocahontas some good orthodox Christian threw a stone through the window at Mr. Dawes. But it seems that God was with Mr. Dawes, for the stone did not hit him. J. K.

RICHLAND, DAK., Jan. 5, 1889.

MISS WIXON: I desire to add my mite of appreciation and praise for the able and valiant service you are executing in behalf of the younger generation.

The noble seeds of thought planted in the sterling soil of youthful vigor will eventually bud and bloom into a grander and higher manhood and womanhood. Once show to a child's mind the cruelties and deceit of orthodoxy, and you hav for evermore put over its peaceful couch a barrier through which the diseased skeleton of religious bigotry cannot enter. It is pleasing to note that the Children's Corner also teaches us to throw in superstition's grave the malice, brutality, and ignorance of the present as well as the past.

I inclose the following lines for the Children's Corner, if they hav the necessary merit required.

Wishing you years of health and prosperity to carry on the good work for the redemption of the race, I remain, Yours in the onward course, LOUIS N. CRILL, JR.

[We thank our correspondent for his kind appreciation of our work in the Corner, and trust we may always merit the good will of all our friends and readers.—ED. C. C.]

A Hundred Years to Come.

THE POEM WHICH MILLIONS HAV READ WITHOUT KNOWING THE AUTHOR'S NAME.

Who wrote the verses, "A Hundred Years to Come?" They are old and familiar. They hav gone the rounds of the papers of America uncredited to anyone. They are included in the Bryant collection, and there given as anonymous. Very recently they appeared in a St. John letter written to the country papers, evidently by one who knew the name of the author, but still leaving that name undisclosed.

Hiram Ladd Spencer was the writer of the letter, and when questioned by Progress he stated that he was the author of the verses. They were written by him when he was a boy at school, at Brandon, Vt., and were sent without his knowledge to the Voice of Freedom, published in that town. From that obscure country paper, with a circulation of five hundred copies, they hav spread over the universe. Every once in a while they take a fresh start and go the rounds again. Here they are:

Where, where will be the birds that sing,
A hundred years to come?
The flowers that now in beauty spring,
A hundred years to come?
The rosy cheek,
The lofty brow,
The heart that beats
So quickly now?
Where, where will be our hopes and fears,
Joy's pleasant smiles and sorrow's tears,
A hundred years to come?

Who'll press for gold this crowded street,
A hundred years to come?
Who'll tread yon aisle with willing feet,
A hundred years to come?
Pale trembling age
And fiery youth,
And childhood with
Its brow of truth;
The rich, the poor, on land and sea—
Where will the mighty millions be,
A hundred years to come?

We all within our graves will sleep,
A hundred years to come;
No living soul for us will weep,
A hundred years to come;
And others then
Our lands will till,
And other men
Our homes will fill,
And other birds will sing as gay,
And bright the sun shine as to-day,
A hundred years to come.

A Monkey's Temperance Lesson.

In my youth, says a writer in an exchange, I had a friend who had a monkey. We always took him out on our chestnut parties. He shook all our chestnuts for us. One day my friend stopped at a tavern and gave Jack about half a glass of whisky. Jack took the glass and drank its contents, the effects of which soon set him skipping, hopping, and dancing. Jack was drunk. We agreed to come to the tavern next day and see if Jack would drink again.

I called in the morning at my friend's house, but instead of being, as usual, on his box, Jack was not to be seen. We looked inside, and there he was crouched up in a heap. "Come," said his master. Jack came out on three legs, applying his fore-paw to his head. Jack had the headache. He was sick and couldn't go. So we put it off three days. We then met again at the tavern and provided a glass for Jack. But where was he? Skulking behind chairs. "Come here, Jack," said his master, holding the glass out to him.

Jack retreated, and as the door opened he slipped out and in a moment was on the top of the house. His master called him down. Jack refused to obey. My friend got a whip and shook it at him. The monkey continued on the ridgepole. His master got a gun and pointed it at him. Jack slipped over to the back of the building. He then got two guns and had one pointed on each side of the house, when the monkey jumped upon the chimney and got down in one of the flues and held on by his fore-paws. My friend kept that monkey twelve years afterward, but never asked him again to take whisky.

Prince Harry's Thread and Needle.

Many customs handed down from olden times are still observed at the ancient seats of learning in England, Oxford, and Cambridge.

At Queen's College, Oxford, a boar's head is served up on Christmas day, as was done three hundred years ago; and on New Year's day every guest at the dinner-table in college hall is presented with a needle and the thread, the latter being in three colors—red, black, and blue—emblems of medicin, divinity, and law.

Clever men hav long puzzled themselvs to find out the origin of this very ancient custom. One solution given is that the name of the founder of Queen's College was supposed to be taken from two French words which mean "needle" and "thread;" but another historian tells how King Henry V., when he was prince of Wales, presented himself before his father in a blue satin coat, which was full of eyelet-holes, and in every eyelet the needle and silk used to work it was left hanging. And it is supposed that Prince Henry was a student of Queen's, whence arose this curious observance every New Year's day. King Henry IV., his father, was very much afraid his son would take the crown from him, and therefore was glad to see him habited as a scholar.

Old English Spelling.

Epitaphs in the churchyard of the cathedral of Glasgow afford some examples of English spelling in 1612. The first, upon the tombstone of Dr. Peter Low, founder of the faculty of physicians and surgeons:

Stay, Passenger, and View this Stone,
For Under it Lyes Such a One
Who cuired many; while he lieved,
Soa Gracious He no man grieved
Yea when his physick's Force oft failed
His pleasant purpose then prevailed,
For of his God he got the grace
To live in Mirth and die in peace.
Heaven hes his Soul, his Corps this Stone,
Sigh, passenger, and Soe begone.

Another tombstone in the same yard bears the following:

Ah me I gravell am and dust
And to the grave deshend I most.
Oh painted peice of liveing clay,
Man, be not proud of thy short day.

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

"Who is your family physician, Freddy?" asked Mr. Hendricks of the Brown boy. "We've got none," said the boy. "Pa's a homeopath, ma's an allopath, Sister Jane is a Christian scientist, grandpa and grandma buys all the quack medicins going, Uncle James believes in massage, and Brother Bill is a horse doctor. I tell you, sir, we're in a bad shape."

"Tommy is not well. He has a bad cold, and is a little shy," said Mrs. Yerger to a visitor, in explanation of the boy's conduct. "If he is a little horse, I don't wonder that he shies," replied the visitor.

Edna's grandmother has two friends, each named Mrs. Jones. As one is tall and the other quite short, they are often called in the family big Mrs. Jones and little Mrs. Jones. The other day a neighbor came in and Edna met her with the information: "Gamma's gone to see Mis' Jones—way-up-high Mis' Jones."

"My friends," said a temperance lecturer, lowering his voice to an impressiv whisper, "if all the grog-shops were at the bottom of the sea, what would be the result?" For answer from a youngster came: "Lots of people would get drowned!"

Little Bessie dropped an armful of playthings. "Did you break anything?" asked the mother. "Nothing but the quiet," she replied, "and that's mended already."

A mother was correcting her little boy the other day, and, appealing to him, asked how he would feel if he had a son who didn't do that, and so on. When she had reached the end of the inquiry he answered, "Well, mamma, if I had a little boy eight years old, I don't think I'd expect the earth of him."

A little chap, whose love of Bible history is indulged in at all times and in all places, was recently reproved by his mother for his lack of order. "You must get in the habit of putting away your rubbers and overcoat," she said, "and not leave it for others to do." "Well, mamma," replied the young reasoner, "don't you know that a person's head can only contain just so much? Now, if I put rubbers and overcoats and such things into mine, then Moses and the kings and all the prophets will hav to be crowded out."

THOUGHTS ON SCIENCE, THEOLOGY, AND ETHICS.

BY JOHN WILSON, M.A.

The object of the book, as expressed in the preface, is to giv a correct sketch of the main lines of modern thought in small compass, and in language simple enough to be easily understood. In other words, it is a condensation of more voluminous writers, and classification of their definitions of science, theology, and ethics, and a statement of what belongs to each. As a text-book to clear thinking and logical reasoning, and a guide in forming scientific conclusions, this book is invaluable. The Literary Guide ranks it as "one of the foremost works of the present century;" while the Freethinker, in "heartily recommending it" as "simple and lucid in style, correct in thought, and ample in information," declares that it "is just the thing to put in the hands of a plain man who desires the best ideas on evolution in relation to science and ethics in a moderate compass."

Poetry.

Songs of the Elizabethan Age.

From the Independent.

A PEDLER'S SONG.

Fine knacks for ladies, cheap, choice, brave, and new,
Good pennyworths, but money cannot move;
I keep a fair but for the fair to view,
A beggar may be liberal of love.
Though all my wares be trash, the heart is true,
The heart is true.

Great gifts are guiles and look for gifts again,
My trifles come as treasures from my mind;
It is a precious jewel to be plain;
Sometimes in shell the orient'st pearls we find;
Of others take a sheaf, of me a grain,
Of me a grain.

THE POWER OF LOVE.

In Sherwood lived stout Robin Hood,
An archer great, none greater,
His bow and shafts were sure and good,
Yet Cupid's were much better;
Robin could shoot at many a hart and miss,
Cupid at first could hit a heart of his.
Hey, jolly Robin Hood! ho, jolly Robin Hood!
Love finds out me
As well as thee,
To follow me to the greenwood.

A noble thief was Robin Hood,
Wise was he could deceive him;
Yet Marian in his bravest mood
Could of his heart bereave him.
No greater thief lies hidden under skies
Than beauty closely lodged in women's eyes.

An outlaw was this Robin Hood,
His life free and unruly,
Yet to fair Marian bound he stood
And love's debt paid her duly:
Whom curb of strictest law could not hold in,
Love to obedience with a wink could win.

Now wend we home, stout Robin Hood,
Leave we the woods behind us;
Love-passions must not be withstood,
Love everywhere will find us.
I lived in field, and town, and so did he;
I got me to the woods; Love followed me;
Hey, jolly Robin Hood! ho, jolly Robin Hood!
Love finds out me
As well as thee,
To follow me to the greenwood.

DOMESTIC ADVICE.

Never love unless you can
Bear with all the faults of man;
Men sometimes will jealous be,
Though but little cause they see,
And hang their head as discontent,
And speak what straight they will repent.

Men that but one saint adore
Make a show of love to more;
Beauty must be scorned in none,
Though but truly served in one;
For what is courtship but disguise?
True hearts may hav dissembling eyes.

Men, when their affairs require,
Must awhile themselvs retire;
Sometimes hunt and sometimes hawk,
And not ever sit and talk.
If these and such like you can bear,
Then like, and love, and never fear.

CUPID'S VOYAGE.

Upon a summer's day Love went to swim,
And cast himself into a sea of tears;
The clouds called in their light and heaven waxed dim,
And sighs did raise a tempest, causing fears;
The naked boy could not so wield his arms,
But that the waves were masters of his might,
And threatened him to work far greater harms
If he devised not to scape by flight;
Then for a boat his quiver stood instead,
His bow unbent did serve him for a mast,
Whereby to sail his cloth of veil he spread,
His shafts for oars on either board he cast;
From shipwreck safe this wag got thus to shore,
And sware to bathe in lovers' tears no more.

The Ways of the Clergy.

The ways of the clergy are truly past all understanding, says T. L. McCready, in the Standard. A great political campaign has just been fought, and during this same campaign the electoral franchise has been prostituted as it never was before. Men of influence and note in Christian circles hav unblushingly collected and contributed huge sums of money for the purchase of voters, hav issued instructions for the guidance of vote-buyers, hav actually bought and paid for votes, hav compelled their employees under threat of discharge to assist in political demonstrations, hav done all in their power to convert the ballot, which should be the safeguard and guarantee of freedom, into a weapon of monopoly. All this the clergy hav seen in silence. It was none of their business. Politics and religion must be kept separate if religion would preserve its dignity and influence. They simply stood on one side, and either said that what everybody knew perfectly well to be so was not so, or else admitting and mildly regretting the facts, murmured gently that no religious principle was involved, and that much must be allowed to men in the heat of a political struggle. But now, at last, the clergy—or a remnant of them, at all events—hav waked up. They hav decided that there is a point beyond which even politicians may not go without incurring religious censure. They can stand robbery, they can stand vote-buying, they can stand the degradation of free-born Americans, they can stand lying and slander and forgery. All these things are mere incidents of politics, regrettable, perhaps, from a purely ethical point of view, but in no way irreligious. But when it comes to an inauguration ball, they feel bound to speak. Against round dances, low-necked dresses, and the possibility of champagne and Roman punch, they uplift their voices in solemn warning that if such things are permitted, the future of the republic is indeed gloomy. They are a comical set, these preachers of the gospel of things as they are.

Thorough Christians and Thoroughly Superstitious.

The Sun's Taney County, Mo., Correspondence.

"It will never come out until it's burnt out—that's what they say." So remarked an intelligent business man of Forsyth, pointing to a black stain of blood on the floor of J. S. B. Berry's old store, where Captain Kinney, the Knobber chief, had fallen when shot to death by young Bill Miles. A "good many hav tried to scrub out blood stains, they say, but never could do it."

This is a common mountain superstition. The mountaineers hav noticed that blood stains on cotton goods turn black and are not easily washed away. They conclude that some supernatural power, instead of a chemical combination, keeps the stain there. It is a common practice, they say, to cut out blood stains and burn them.

If there is any place in the country where a living spirit of evil, the personal devil, is believed in unquestioningly, it is here. Satan travels up and down the gulches and ravines and peers in at the open doorways at the firesides, or, finding an open door, "just melts his way in." Those who hav read the story of the Bald Knobbers will perhaps think there is good reason for their faith. But the mountaineer goes further. He sees Satan and his imps. There are mysterious sounds and sights in the woods—that is, they are not understood by him, and he says the spirits are responsible for the mysteries. Not alone does he see the evil spirits, but the souls of the murdered dead, he believes, are never at rest. Captain Kinney, the dead Knobber chief, stalks forth by night clad in mask as of old, but now with a blood-stained shroud around him instead of the marshal's coat of blue that was his pride. That he will seek vengeance on those who oppose the Knobbers is not doubted.

On the other hand, there are those in plenty who say the old oak from which the Taylor boys were hanged by Kinney's men still shrieks and groans in agony as the boys did vainly for mercy, while the spirit of murdered Coggburn comes down to the village square, and there materializing as a man once more, throws up his left hand, and striving to draw a revolver fails to get it raised. Then, falling backward on the ground, it hurls a phantom pistol away through the darkness.

They do not believe that the spirits of the dead seek vengeance vainly. Whenever misfortune befalls anyone they shake their heads ominously if he has ever shed human blood. Sickness, accident, death, are not the results of bad sanitary conditions or carelessness; they are the visitations of justice-loving spirits. But the fear of future visits of spirits never acts as a power to keep the ready hand from the pistol.

Perhaps good people who hav read of the cold-blooded murders that hav been committed here hav wished that missionaries might be sent hither to preach the gospel of peace. That would be a natural wish. But the Taney man would hear it in astonishment. The truth is that they hav nearly all been converted, according to their understanding of holy writ. Preachers and churches abound. There are twelve preachers in a population of seven thousand now. What more could one wish? Only the low trash are beyond the pale of the church. "All the best citizens of the country" are church-members. They read the Bible carefully, they sing religious hymns melodiously, they pray and say amen fervently. They giv liberally to the poor; they are careful to entertain strangers. But somehow they never comprehend the Sermon on the Mount or the seventh Commandment. There is old Uncle John Hildreth. He is the remover of warts for the mountaineer lads and lasses. The old man takes a piece of thread six inches long and ties a knot, drawing the knot tight directly above the wart, saying some mysterious words as he does it. The wart goes away, the mountaineers say, within a week.

The superstition about the number thirteen has a curious hold here. They think a combination of thirteen people for a purpose will be invincible. The Knobbers are said to hav organized in groups of thirteen at the first, and there are those that believe that had that principle been adhered to the Knobbers would hav still ruled the Ozarks as they did in 1886. In their thirst for whipping people they wholly neglected to organize gangs of thirteen or multiples of that number. Hence their downfall.

There is another curious theory held by some of the mountaineers. Thus, Liveryman Ray, who carried a visitor from New York to see the victims of the Knobbers in the vicinity of Sparta, told of a revolver that he had, which would sweat drops of blood when fired under proper circumstances. Two men had been killed with it. When a weapon has killed two men it will thereafter sweat a drop of blood whenever fired at a living target. An inanimate target is of no effect, they say.

The whips that were used to whip men with were invariably burnt afterward. It would hav brought bad luck to hav left a bloody switch in existence. Various theories about the ill luck that would follow were held. Jarvis Lawrence says that such a whip would turn to a serpent that would hunt the man who had used it and avenge the blood of the victim with a bite. There was no use in taking whisky for such a bite. Death was sure to follow. Another notion is that the cattle of the men who used the whip were sure to find it within a year and lick it with their tongues. Then they would die of the murrain.

A little while ago in Sparta the village hogs that everywhere run the streets in this country were dying at the rate of three or four a day right in the street. The reason was plain enough to one who knew anything about hog cholera, so called. There was a great pool of stagnant water near the center of the village that was the resort of all the hogs of the neighborhood. They had wallowed in it the season through, and got nothing else to drink save when a rain storm made scarcely less filthy pools elsewhere. Why shouldn't they die? Would the hog-owners see it? Not at all. It was a mysterious visitation. Probably enough when the Knobbers were hanged at Ozark the hogs would not die any more. That's what the anti-Knobbers thought and said. The Knobbers said it was a just infliction on a people that were going to sacrifice four victims to blind prejudice, and that, too, when the hogs of both factions were dying. Of course there were others who thought that the cholera was due to a visitation on general principles—a sort of a warning to the whole people to abandon their sins. When the people get to dying of diphtheria this winter, as they are pretty sure to do from drinking well water contaminated by that pool, the visitation will fill the churchyards.

Captain Kinney, the Knobber chief, understood the people very well when he devised the horned mask for his murderous crew. It is impossible to appreciate the abject terror which those masks created among the majority of those who were visited. The relativs of the murdered men in Christian county, Charley Green and Will Edens, are unable to go on with their stories when they come to describe the impression created by the masks. Old Mrs. Elizabeth Eden turns white at the mention of the word, and barely escapes fainting. It is said that men who had determined to fight and were well fixed for a battle lost their courage and wits entirely when they saw the masks, and took their whippings like cowed curs.

Reminiscences of a Preacher,

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this they will probably do so at once.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

News of the Week.

SUNDAY labor is increasing in all the large cities.

THE mayor of Syracuse, N. Y., has got into trouble with the clergymen by recommending that saloons be opened part of Sunday.

MRS. JAY GOULD died on the 13th.

MR. O'CONNOR, M.P., says that Socialism is spreading in England.

GOVERNOR HILL is mentioned as the next Democratic presidential candidate.

THE pope recently gave a cordial reception to Charles A. Dana, editor of the New York Sun.

NOTWITHSTANDING the reports that John Bright was dying, he now seems on the way to recovery.

MEETINGS are being held in Belgium and Holland to protest against Italy's treatment of the pope.

ON the 9th a cyclone destroyed many buildings with a large loss of life at Reading and Pittsburgh, Pa.

THE clergymen who hav been praying free for the Indiana legislature hav refused to continue unless they get $5 per prayer.

AFTER some bloodshed, the disgraceful jealous war as to the county seat between Cimarron and Ingalls, Kan., seems over for the present.

FRANCE is manufacturing millions of rifles, that each soldier may hav four ready when mobilization comes.

THE pope recently instructed visiting American prelates strenuously to combat the Socialism spreading among Irish Catholics in America.

IT is said that Gladstone has agreed that if he can be returned to power he will promote a European congress to adjudicate between the Vatican and Italy.

EX-REV. MR. PENTECOST says: "The pious briber is another corrupter of the ballot, but as long as he goes to church and pays for his pew he is considered anything but a ballot-briber."

MRS. GLADSTONE is quoted as saying that her husband "considers it one of his most sacred duties to do his utmost to check the flood of Infidelity that is sweeping over England."

FROM the Catholic University at our national capital there will go forth, says an eminent Catholic writer, "generations of priests, of jurists, of physicians, of artists, and of scientists, to be the leaders of thought."

IN all the states the tremendous bribery at the election has roused agitation toward measures against its growth. Radical labor reformers say that in a country containing a very rich class and a poor and ignorant class it is inevitable.

MONSIGNOR POHOSKI arrived at Waterbury, Conn., last week, sent by the Propaganda to "look after the spiritual welfare of the Russian, Polish, Italian, and Hungarian children of the church whose ignorance of the English language is an obstacle."

A TEXT used extensivly by workers for reform of election bribery is the late affirmation of Judge Gresham: "It is men of prominence and respectability who raise these large sums of money knowing the use that they will be put to, men who deal openly in corruption one day and go to church the next."

FATHER LAVELLE of the New York Cathedral says: "What sort of Protestants are the public schools turning out? You can find the answer any Sunday in scores and scores of almost empty Protestant churches. Our churches are not big enough for our people. The most thoughtful of Protestants are recognizing the necessity of teaching religion in the schools."

HIS MAJESTY GIVETH BALAAM A PIECE OF HIS MIND.

And Balak's anger was kindled against Balaam, and he smote his hands together: and Balak said unto Balaam, I called thee to curse mine enemies, and, behold, thou hast altogether blessed them these three times. Therefore now flee thou to thy place. I thought to promote thee unto great honor; but, lo, the Lord hath kept thee back from honor.—Num. xxiv, 10, 11.

Odds and Ends.

BOBBY: "Ma, is the church raising a fund to send our minister to Europe?" Mother: "Yes, dear." Bobby: "And will the church be closed while he is gone?" Mother: "Yes." Bobby: "Well, ma, can't I giv that dollar I've saved up to the fund?"

"MISS BIGGS made those slippers," remarked the parson's wife, as she glanced over the proceeds of the donation party. "How do you know, dear?" asked the meek, long-suffering man. "Because I recognize the old blue shawl she ripped up to get the worsted."

"WHAT'S up between Miss Dorcas Holder, daughter of P. U. Holder, and the young curate? He used to walk home with her regularly after Sunday-school." "I don't know, positivly; but they say he presented her with a box of Sunday-school candy at the Christmas celebration, and now all is over between them."

A BOY who had been in the habit of repeating a formulated prayer every evening surprised his parents the other evening by saying, "O God, I wish you would make the trees walk!" When remonstrated with for his singular request, he replied: "You say God can do anything, and I want to see the trees walk, and I shan't pray for anything else until they do."

"DARLING, will you marry me?" asked young George De Sappy, in low, passionate tones. "Yes," she softly murmured, as she tried to sink on his shoulders, like girls she'd read about. "Well, all right," he replied coldly. "I just wanted to know in case I ever got the worst of it on any other deal of this kind." And the lawyer she consulted said he didn't see how she could make a case.

THE other night a lady of the listener's acquaintance happened to be visiting in a household where it is safe to say "Robert Elsmere" has not been read, because the family are of the extremest sect of orthodoxy. There was a little girl, and after dinner this little girl found her way to the visitor's lap, where she sat, big-eyed and wistful. The visitor asked: "Would you like to hav me tell you a story?" "Oh, no," said the child with a little shudder, "'cause God would 'trike you dead if you told a 'tory!" This anecdote is absolutely true, and yet we send missionaries to Japan and the South Sea islands.

A TRAVELER through the woods of Tennessee came upon a "raw-boned" man standing near a rivulet. The traveler asked the direction to the nearest railway station. The man looked up, gazed at the stranger for a moment, and then said: "Ef I was at myself I mout tell you all about this country, but in my present trouble I can't talk about no worldly matter." "If you are in trouble I am sorry that I disturbed you," the traveler replied. "May I ask the nature of your difficulty?" "Religion." "Ah, unsettled in your mind concerning the course to pursue, eh?" "No, not that. I know all about the right course, but ain't able to follow it. Wall, I'll tell you all about it. I professed religion an' j'ined the church about two months ago. I stopped cussin' the steers an giv up stealin' licker outen the still-house, an' ever'thing went on like a bullfrog a-swimmin' till about half a hour ago." "What occurred then?" the traveler asked. "Why, I lost my religion right here as I jumped across this branch." "Nonsense, man." "No, it ain't nonsense. I came along here all right, but jest as I jumped across this branch I heard suthin' snap, an' dinged ef it wa'n't my religion. Yes, sir, jest as soon as it snapped I knowed what was up." The traveler was amused. This strong superstitious belief of the backwoodsman was new to him. "What are you going to do about it?" "Wall, I'll hafter wait till the next protracted meetin'—about next fodder pullin' time—an' try the mourner's bench another whirl. Ef that don't patch me up I'm gone."

HE had been wondering for some time how he could escape from the toils that were gently creeping around him, and break the spell of soft converse and witching eyes. An opportunity came at last. As she ended a spirited description of her journey through the Alps, she said impulsivly: "Oh, Mr. Slopace, I think you ought to travel!" He looked at her rigidly, rose slowly, and grasped his hat. "No woman shall say that twice to me," he remarked, in a firm and desperate voice. "I knew it was after eleven o'clock, but I thought—that is—I hoped—no matter. Farewell, Miss Phineweb—I will travel!" And he did with alacrity.

My old Uncle Peter's a famous relater
  Of marvelous stories; but my Uncle Peter
Is a vigorous foe and a rigorous hater
  Of wile and of guile; he despises a cheater;
He's frank and sincere on a very large scale,
And this is his manner of telling a tale:

"Oh, once in the chivalric days of old,
  In the wonderful long ago,
There dwelt a giant full bad and bold
  (But this is not a fact, you know)—
In whose darksome dungeon a maiden fair,
  Whom atrociously he had stole;
She languished and wept (to be candid, there
  Was no such girl nor hole).

"But, lo! on a rapturous morn there rode
  A valorous knight that way;
His snowy palfrey he bravely bestrode
  (Don't credit this fiction, pray),
And straight he sprang from the noble steed;
  His sword it gleamed in the sun,
And the dragon that guarded the gate (a deed
  Which he could be no means hav done)

"He felled at a blow, and with mighty force
  He battered the dungeon wall,
And he seized the sorrowing maid. (Of course
  It never transpired at all)—
And he slew the giant, the dauntless youth,
  And the beauteous maid he wed
(But you mustn't imagin a grain of truth
In a single word that I've said)."

Oh, my old Uncle Peter's a famous relater!
  But I wish, goodness me, that my old Uncle Peter
Could be rather more of a prevaricator—
  His stories would be more absorbing and neater;
I wish his integrity didn't prevail
In so stern a degree—when he's telling a tale.

Gems of Thought.

CREEDS are very handy for reference by church-members when they hav occasion to know what they believe. By this means they can become informed of what are presumed to be their beliefs, without the mortification of applying to their spiritual advisers to giv them the instruction.—Robert C. Adams.

IT is the duty of each and every one to maintain his individuality. "This above all, to thine own self be true, and it must follow as the night the day, thou canst not then be false to any man." It is a magnificent thing to be the sole proprietor of yourself. It is a terrible thing to wake up at night and say, "There is nobody in this bed." It is humiliating to know that your ideas are all borrowed; that you are indebted to your memory for your principles; that your religion is simply one of your habits, and that you would hav convictions if they were only contagious. It is mortifying to feel that you belong to a mental mob and cry "crucify him," because the others do; that you reap what the great and brave hav sown, and that you can benefit the world only by leaving it.—Ingersoll.

SACRILEGE: A dreadful word invented by the priests to designate a fearful crime which is committed by any one touching with a profane hand anything they, the priests, hav proclaimed sacred. Anything that wrongs the priests wrongs God. Hence it is evident that to take from God, who is the sovereign owner of heaven and earth, is a far more heinous crime than to take from the poor, who hav nothing. The richer the despoiled, the greater the crime of the despoiler; thus, he who robs the Lord shall be burnt, he who robs a rich man shall be hanged; but he who robs the poor shall hav nothing to fear.—Voltaire's Pocket Theology.

THE judges of (the only independent) ecclesiastic courts confined their attention to ferocious punishments of neglect in the payments of tithes, and the performance of socage duties and ceremonies. The belief in the divine right of potentates, and passiv submission to even the most outrageous abuse of that power, were assiduously inculcated as primary duties of a Christian citizen. Natural justice, civil rights, and the laws of humanity had no place in that code of revealed ethics.—Prof. Felix L. Oswald in The Bible of Nature.

IT was believed by our intelligent ancestors that all law derived its sacredness and its binding force from the fact that it had been communicated to man by the ghosts. Of course it was not pretended that the ghosts told everybody the law; but they told it to a few, and the few told it to the people, and the people, as a rule, paid them exceedingly well for their trouble. It was thousands of ages before the people commenced making laws for themselvs, and strange as it may appear, most of these laws were vastly superior to the ghost article. Through the web and woof of human legislation began to run and shine and glitter the golden thread of justice.—Ingersoll.

THE greater portions of the Bible were undoubtedly written since the Institutes of Menu were penned, since the voluminous Vedas and Puranas were written, since the grand teachings of Zoroaster and the Avesta were committed to parchment; long since the cuneiform inscriptions of Nineveh and Assyria were executed; since many of the sacred writings and inscriptions of Egypt were produced; about the time, perhaps, of the Indian saint, Buddha, and the wonderful sayings he uttered, and the grand old Chinese philosopher, Confucius, with his eminently practical and useful precepts and morals. All these were written by men, and you will hardly claim that Jehovah had anything to do with them; and as they are, in point of ability, purity, and grandeur, equal, and more than equal, to the Jehovistic sacred writings, it is preposterous to insist that these latter could not also hav been written by men.—D. M. Bennett.

IN all ages of which any record has been preserved, there hav been those who gave their ideas of justice, charity, liberty, love, and law. Now, if the Bible is really the work of God, it should contain the grandest and sublimest truths. It should, in all respects, excel the works of man. Within that book should be found the best and loftiest definitions of justice; the truest conceptions of human liberty; the clearest outlines of duty; the tenderest, the highest, and the noblest thoughts—not that the human mind has produced, but that the human mind is capable of receiving. Upon every page should be found the luminous evidence of its divine origin. Unless it contains grander and more wonderful things than man has written, we are not only justified in saying, but we are compelled to say, that it was written by no being superior to man. It may be said that it is unfair to cite certain bad things in the Bible, while the good are not so much as mentioned. To this it may be replied that a divine being would not put bad things in a book. Certainly a being of infinit intelligence, power, and goodness could never fall below the ideal of "depraved and barbarous" man.—Ingersoll.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 16. No. 4. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY.} New York, Saturday, January 26, 1889. {28 LAFAYETTE PL.} $3.00 per year.

A PROVIDENTIAL OVERSIGHT.—AN INCIDENT OF THE LATE STORM.

Notes and Clippings.

A BOSTONIAN speaks of "those two great Infidels, Robert Ingersoll and Robert Elsmere."

AGREEABLY to the wishes of the German emperor, the theaters hav resolved to abolish all French theatrical terms which hav crept into the language.

JAMES REDPATH is about to sever his connection with the North American Review. He will go to Ireland to represent an American newspaper syndicate.

BELVA ANN LOCKWOOD has been appointed representativ of the Universal Peace Society of America at the Paris Exposition. She will start for France about the 1st of May.

A MAN wrote the Sun to know if a man can consistently tend bar and be a Christian at the same time, and the Sun replied: "Why, certainly. Why not?" Jesus Christ was a wine-maker.

COL. ELLIOTT F. SHEPARD speaks of "our own beloved city of New York." How sweet and lovely a thing it is, says the World, for a great, big, wicked city to win the affection of such a good man as Shepard.

IRELAND no longer sends the greatest number of emigrants to this country, being behind Scotland and England. During last September and October the number of emigrants from these countries was three times the number from Ireland. During the ten months of 1888 ending in October there came 237,814 English and Scotch emigrants, against 129,779 from Ireland. The influx from Italy also bids fair overshadow that from Ireland.

CHARLES WATTS'S Secular Thought notices that "Dr. Oswald is rapidly taking a foremost place among the foremost writers of the time. His 'Secret of the East,' 'Bible of Nature,' and works on sanitary science are becoming widely read and are producing remarkable effects."

THE Rev. Dr. Keeling and the Rev. Dr. Everett hav entered upon a lively contest for the chaplaincy of the Pennsylvania senate. It has been proposed to them that each shall make a prayer on alternate days and divide the salary of $300. They seem inclined to accept this compromise.

THEY are still pegging away at the Cape Cod ship canal, which was begun nine years ago. The contract requires the work to be finished by June 20, 1891, but as there are seven miles yet to be dug, and as during 1888 there was only about seven-eighths of a mile opened, the prospects are not good for the fulfilment of the contract.

ILLINOIS census returns show that outside of the cities the population is decreasing. The school census of 1888 shows that in July last there were in the state 843,976 males under twenty-one years of age. In 1880 there were 789,676. This is a gain of 54,300, but the gain in Cook county was 83,217, so that the loss in the rest of the state was 28,917.

THE Catholic Champion says: "The strongest argument for the pew system is that it enables the rich to hav the best seats. As the best seats are those which afford the greatest edification from the service and sermon, and as it is by the teaching of scripture very much harder for rich people to get to heaven than or the poor, it is right that the rich should receive the maximum of help in their difficult task of being saved."

ONE of the proof-readers of the Charleston, S. C., World, is an unmarried woman of refinement, who is glad to support herself in that way. She goes to her work about 8 o'clock in the evening, and does not quit the office until 3 the next morning. Then she lights a lantern, and with that in one hand and a loaded revolver in the other she goes home. Speaking of her the Atlanta Constitution says: "She has no fears in the heart of Carolina, where woman is next in divinity to God;" but to the Sun it looks very much as if she thought that the divinity of woman even in the heart of Carolina wasn't as good a protection as powder and ball.

VERILY it looks now, says Life, as if the unholy abomination that exists in the rattling of the Fifth avenue stages on Sunday is at last to be banished permanently from the pious thoroughfare of our local aristocracy, owing to the efforts of the great and good man, Elliott F. Shepard. Hereafter those foolish and improvident Christians, who hav not accumulated sufficient wealth to set up carriages, and hav been in the habit of using the stages as a means of traveling to and from church, may stay at home, or walk, or go to houses of worship that are nearer their humble domicils—a result that will hav this beneficial effect, at least, that the rich may not be annoyed in the houses of God on Fifth avenue by the presence of the poor, and that the creator may be glorified in having at least a few temples in the city where the congregations are nearer his own social level than in the plebeian churches of less exalted neighborhoods.

ABOUT half of the Baptist church at Cedar Springs, says the Kalamazoo Gazette, believe there is no harm in dancing or playing cards at social parties. The pastor thinks differently, and has denounced the practice in no measured terms. This raised the ire of the money-paying members of the church, and they demanded that the Rev. C. Oldfield resign. He was not built that way, and the doors and windows of the church were nailed up. The Gazette sympathizes with the preacher, and says: "Those who believe in card-playing and dancing are worldly and hav no business claiming membership in the Baptist church. Get out, you heathen, and leave that preacher in the enjoyment of his just rights!"

THE Maharajah Dhuleep Singh is just now in Paris; and has been telling an interviewer what he thinks of the English. "A thieving, hypocritical Christian nation, grabbing at what does not belong to them all over the world. Let them wait a bit; in less than three years—in less than two, perhaps—I and my 250,000,000 fellow-countrymen will hav driven them out of India. I am working quietly, secretly, but none the less surely, and in the long run we will see who shall prevail. I am the proud and implacable foe of England. Individually I do not hate Englishmen, from whom, during the course of my thirty-two years' residence in their country, I received much kindness. But as a nation I hate them. I am laying my plans for a grand coup. I intend to consolidate the nativs of India against the common enemy. No compromise with the British government is possible now. I would not even accept from it the indemnity I originally asked. It is war to the knife. Wait and see!"

More About Bible Poetry and Evolution.

Such samples as we hav already given demonstrate beyond doubt the human qualities, not always of the highest character, of biblical poetry. They show conclusivly that the Bible versemakers had low ideas of God and man, small ideas of nature, and no idea whatever of duty apart from obedience to a supposed divine command. None of them sing the praises of virtue for virtue's sake. The sentiment of Socrates, that "a man who is good for anything ought not to calculate the chance of living or dying; he ought only to consider whether in doing anything he is doing right or wrong, acting the part of a good man or a bad," was quite beyond them. They were in favor of bad deeds which they supposed were sanctioned by deity, and good deeds, in their judgment, had no special value, unless they were commanded by Jahveh. Still, it would be a gross misrepresentation of facts to say that there were no good sentiments poetically expressed by the contributors to the pages of the Bible; on the contrary, there are many, and we now proceed to giv a few examples.

Job recognized that the world did not always appear to be governed upon just principles, that sometimes the innocent suffered for the guilty, and the wicked gloried in their sin. This is how he expresses it:

There are those who rebel against the light: they know not the ways thereof, nor abide in the paths thereof.
The murderer rising with the light killeth the poor and needy and in the night is as a thief.

But Job did not think that the wicked went altogether unpunished. He felt sure that nemesis awaited them.

For the morning is to them even as the shadow of death, if one know them they are in the terrors of the shadow of death.
He is swift as the waters; their portion is cursed in the earth; he beholdeth not the way of the vineyards.
Drouth and heat consume the snow waters; so doth the grave those which hav sinned.
The womb shall forget him; the worm shall feed sweetly on him: he shall be no more remembered; and wickedness shall be broken as a tree (Job xxiv, 17-20).

Shakspere said:

Murder, though it hav no tongue,
Will speak with most miraculous organ.

And so indeed it does. But Job seems to think, and the sentiment does him credit, that even the undiscovered murderer does not go unpunished in this world, whether there's another or not.

David in the Psalms proclaims the highest principle for the regulation of conduct in the Theist's life when he says:

O worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness; fear before him all the earth.
Say among the heathen that the Lord reigneth: the world also shall be established that it shall not be moved; he shall judge the people righteously (Psalms xcvi, 9, 10).

For a cheerful song of praise take the Psalm c:

Make a joyful noise unto the Lord, all ye lands.
Serve the Lord with gladness; come before his presence with a song.
Know ye that the Lord he is God; it is he that hath made us, and not we ourselvs; we are his people, and the sheep of his pasture.
Enter into his gates with thanksgiving, and into his courts with praise; be thankful unto him, and bless his name.
For the Lord is good, his mercy is everlasting; and his truth endureth to all generations.

And for daring metaphor we may take:

Bless the Lord, O my soul. O Lord my God, thou art very great; thou art clothed with honor and majesty.
Who coverest thyself with light as with a garment; who stretchest out the heavens like a curtain.
Who layeth the beams of his chambers in the waters; who maketh the clouds his chariots; who walketh upon the wings of the wind.
Who maketh his angels spirits; his ministers a flaming fire (Psalms civ, 1-4).

The Proverbs also contain some good teachings felicitously expressed, and may be regarded as model prose poems. Here are a few:

Every prudent man dealeth with knowledge; but a fool layeth open his folly.
A wicked messenger falleth into mischief; but a faithful ambassador is health.
Poverty and shame shall be to him that refuseth instruction; but he that regardeth reproof shall be honored (Prov. xiii, 16-18).
Better is a dry morsel and quietness therewith, than a house full of sacrifices with strife (Ibid. xvii, 1).
A merry heart doeth good like a medicin; but a broken spirit drieth the bones (Ibid. xvii, 22).
Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging; and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise (Ibid. xx, 1).
The getting of treasures by a lying tongue is a vanity tossed to and fro of them that seek death (Ibid. xxi, 6).
It is better to dwell in a corner of the housetop than with a brawling woman in a wide house (Ibid. xxi, 9).
A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches, and loving favor rather than silver and gold (Ibid. xxii, 1).
The wicked flee when no man pursueth, but the righteous are bold as a lion (Ibid. xxviii, 1).

But for voluptuous imagery take the following passage from the Song of Solomon. The following lines are supposed to refer to the graces of the church:

How beautiful are thy feet with shoes, O prince's daughter! the joints of thy thighs are like jewels, the work of the hands of a cunning workman.
Thy navel is like a round goblet, which wanteth not liquor; thy belly is like a heap of wheat set about with lilies.
Thy two breasts are like two young roes that are twins, etc. (Song of Solomon vii, 1-3).

Though there are many fine passages which we hav not quoted, the above may be taken as fair samples of the variety of styles as well as diversity of sentiment in the poetry that pervades the pages of the Bible.

Our contention is that the poetry of the early books of the Bible is poor, both in conception and execution, as compared with that of the more recent books. And further, that there is a distinct development—an undoubted evolution—in all the poetry of the Bible no less than in poetical effusions of profane writers.

True it is, no doubt, that one poet among many will stand out prominently at times by virtue of the largeness of his mind, of the loftiness of his sentiments, the nobility of his ideals, or by some special skill he possesses in the expression of his ideas. And just as we may say that the writers of such books as Job, Proverbs, Psalms, etc.—the authorship in each case being extremely doubtful—are conspicuously fine among all the biblical singers, so may we say that in every age in the world's history there hav been one or two masters and multitudes of minor poets, and that each has expressed up to the fullest measure of his ability the ideas and sentiments of the age in which he lived.

In a few very exceptional cases, such as Homer, Chaucer, Shakspere, Milton, Shelley, we find ideas beyond the age of the writers—ideas which seem to embody sentiments that are new, or are soon destined to become universal.

From the poets of the world we may glean ideas upon which to found the noblest philosophy, the highest morality, the purest religion—using the latter word in a purely secular sense.

Beginning with the crudest thoughts we go step by step, until we are able to build up a veritable pyramid of ideas, which would demonstrate the progressiv character of humanity in all ages—in its social, political, and moral life.

In an earlier stage of this article we endeavored to show that beneath the undoubtedly poetical effusions of the biblical poets we frequently found low and coarse ideas of God and man, debasing ideas concerning man's work and his conduct toward his fellowman, and if we are able to show that poets who laid no claim to divine inspiration were capable of loftier and holier views than those entertained by the so-called God-inspired writers of antiquity, we shall hav demonstrated either that the Bible poets were not so highly developed as most people imagin—that is, they were less civilized than their descendants—or that uninspired persons are often superior both mentally and morally to inspired ones—in which case the value of inspiration is not only doubted but denied.

Mr. Gladstone has recently shown that the poet Homer held very lofty ideas in respect to God and man; but when the learned and esteemed English statesman goes as far as declaring that Homer was in all respects equal to Shakspere, we may regard it in the same light as the exaggerated statement of Algernon Swinburne—the modern Shelley—who affirmed in an article in the Nineteenth Century that Shakspere had only one equal in the world's history, as poet, philosopher, and playwright, and that was Victor Hugo.

Our opinion is that every man of genius stands alone and unapproachable in his own particular line; and just as no man of good sense would think of comparing a great tragedian with a great comedian—though both were actors—or even one tragedian with another, unless each enacted the same part, so no great poet can be justly compared with another master, because each in his own line has great qualities, indefinable qualities, which make comparison impossible. That Shakspere was a great poet all men acknowledge; that he held lofty ideas of humanity is unquestionable. Take his sublime declaration:

What a piece of work is man! How noble in reason! how infinit in faculties! in form, and moving, how express and admirable! in action, how like an angel! in apprehension, how like a god! the beauty of the world! the paragon of animals!

Next to a lofty idea of man is a noble idea of nature as a whole—of purity and beauty considered per se. Of the beautiful in nature John Keats says:

A thing of beauty is a joy forever.
Its loveliness increases; it will never Pass into nothingness, but still will keep
A bower quiet for us, and a sleep
Full of sweet dreams, and health and quiet breathing;
Therefore on every morrow are we wreathing
A flowery band to bind us to the earth
Spite of despondence, of the inhuman dearth
Of noble natures, of the gloomy days,
Of all the unhealthy and o'erdarkened ways
Made for our searching. Yes, in spite of all,
Some shape of beauty moves away the pall
From our dark spirits. Such the sun, the moon,
Trees, old and young, sprouting a shady boon
For simple sheep; and such are daffodils
With the green world they liv in; and clear rills,
That for themselvs a cooling covert make
'Gainst the hot season; the mid-forest brake,
Rich with the sprinkling of fair musk rose blooms,
And such, too, is the grandeur of the dooms
We hav imagined for the mighty dead;
All lonely tales that we hav heard or read;
An endless fountain of immortal drink
Pouring into us from the heaven's brink.

And if men hav any opinion of God at all, any belief in him, it is well to hav a good one. For a lofty and majestic view take Pope's. He says:

All are but parts of one stupendous whole,
Whose body Nature is, and God the soul;
That, changed through all, and yet in all the same,
Great in the earth as in the ethereal frame;
Warms in the sun, refreshes in the breeze,
Glows in the stars, and blossoms in the trees,
Livs through all life, and extends through all extent,
Spreads undivided, operates unspent;
Breathes in our soul, informs our mortal part;
As full, as perfect, in a hair as heart;
As full, as perfect, in vile man that mourns
As the rapt seraph that adores and burns.
To him, no high, no low, no great, no small:
He fills, he bounds, connects, and equals all.

Here, then, we hav from profane writers nobler ideas than any that entered the minds of the Bible poets. Bible poets sang the song of warfare—uninspired poets hav sent up an earnest cry for peace. Physical and intellectual freedom were as nothing to the Bible poets, yet profane poets for ages, growing stronger in each successiv age, hav pleaded for Liberty in every form as the great essential to progress. Shall we quote Shelley, or Milton, or Burns? Let the maligned Atheist poet speak. What says he? Giv heed to his words:

ODE TO THE ASSERTERS OF LIBERTY.

Arise, arise, arise!
There is blood on the earth that denies ye bread.
Be your wounds like eyes
To weep for the dead, the dead, the dead.
What other grief were it just to pay?
Your sons, your wives, your brethren were they
Who said they were slain on the battle day.

Awaken, awaken, awaken!
The slave and the tyrant are twin-born foes;
Be the cold chains shaken.
To the dust where your kindred repose, repose,
Their bones in the grave will start and move,
When they hear the voices of those they love
Most loud in the holy combat above.

Wave, wave high the banner
When freedom is riding to conquest by,
Though the slaves that fan her
Be famin and toil, giving sigh for sigh.
And ye who attend her imperial car,
Lift not your hands in the banded war,
But in her defense whose children ye are.

Glory, glory, glory
To those who hav suffered and done!
Never name in story
Was greater than that which ye shall hav won.
Conquerers hav conquered their foes alone
Whose revenge, pride, and power they hav overthrown.
Rise ye, more victorious, over your own.

Bind, bind every brow
With crownals of violet, ivy, and pine;
Hide the blood stains now
With hues which sweet Nature has made divine—
Green strength, azure hope, eternity.
But let not the pansy among them be;
Ye were injured, and that means memory.

Or again:

Rise like lions after slumber
In unvanquishable number;
Shake your chains to earth like dew
Which in sleep had fallen on you.
Ye are many, they are few.

(The Masque of Anarchy, page 470).

Intellectual Liberty we want that we may discover truth, to the end that we may act upon our knowledge, by living a career of virtue. For Truth, Russell Lowell sings:

Truth needs no champions; in the infinit deep
Of everlasting soul her strength abides,
From nature's heart her mighty pulses leap,
Through nature's veins her strength undying tides.

I watch the circle of the eternal years,
And read forever on the storied page
One lengthened roll of blood and wrong and tears,
One onward step of truth from age to age.

No power can die that ever wrought for truth;
Thereby a law of nature it became,
And livs unwithered in its sinewy youth,
When he who called it forth is but a name.

And for the efficacy of Virtue we quote again from Shelley, "The Virtuous Man:"

As great in his humility as kings
Are little in their grandeur; he who leads Invincibly a life of resolute good,
And stands amid the silent dungeon depths
More free and fearless than the trembling judge,
Who, clothed in venal power, vainly strove
To bind the impassiv spirit; when he falls
His mild eye beams benevolence no more;
Withered the hand outstretched but to relieve;
Sunk reason's simple eloquence, that rolled
But to appall the guilty. Yes, the grave
Hath quenched that eye, and death's relentless frost
Withered that arm: but the unfading fame
Which virtue hangs upon its votary's tomb;
The deathless memory of that man whom kings
Call to their mind and tremble; the remembrance
With which the happy spirit contemplates
Its well-spent pilgrimage on earth,
Shall never pass away.

Herein we find the highest sentiments of all the ages. And what a vast gulf it is that separates us from the remote past—the ages of ignorance and superstition, the ages of lust and passion, of folly and faith!

Yet from the distant past to the present there is an unbroken chain even in the world of poetry. Every poetic effect has had its cause, and though we cannot put our finger upon every link, who can doubt that there is a perfect chain of development from the earliest dawn of poetry till the sun shall reach its zenith? Tennyson well says:

Yet I doubt not through the ages one increasing purpose runs,
And the thoughts of men are widened with the process of the suns;
Knowledge comes, but wisdom lingers, and I linger on the shore,
And the individual withers and the world is more and more.

And this is true, whether there is a God behind phenomena or not; whether the process is an intelligent one, or results only from the inherent forces of nature operating through invariable law through all time.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

Prophecy Honored Overmuch.

One of the main reliances of the Christian theology is the alleged fulfilment of prophecy in the life of tne man Jesus, as set forth in the writings known as the gospels. In those writings it is frequently appealed to as evidence that the extraordinary character claimed for him is susceptible of the strongest kind of support. For the sweeping away of this evidence, however, no very deep study is required; though the deeper the study the more apparent becomes the fact that, even admitting that the older writings in the Bible contain anything "which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet"—that is to say, uttered by deity through human agency—there is nothing in them that can, except by clever wresting of its meaning, be made to refer to the birth, life, or death of Jesus of Nazareth. In some portions of his history, as told, there certainly are things that suggest the poetical utterances of the older Hebrew writers, but in many instances the suggestion is a faint one, requiring a large degree of credulity to believe that "there was fulfilled that which was spoken."

One noteworthy instance is all that need be cited here, for my object is not to prove that Jesus was not a being whose advent in this world had been promised through prophetic inspiration, but to present some arguments in favor of the position that there is not, and never has been, such a thing as prophecy, interpreting the word according to the views of theologians and religionists.

The man, deified by his followers, was known as Jesus of Nazareth throughout his life, and, according to the gospel attributed to John, this name was embodied in the inscription placed by Pilate over the cross upon which he died. He was called a Nazarene. His activ life begins with a journey to Jerusalem from the city that gave him the title, to which city his parents directed their way, when, returning from Egypt, whither they had fled with the child to save him from Herod's destructiv fury, they feared to go to their own home on account of reports they had heard concerning Archelaus, Herod's son, who succeeded his father as ruler in Judea. The father of Jesus, so the gospel attributed to Matthew says, "came and dwelt in a city called Nazareth," and then the writer givs as a reason, "that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets, he shall be called a Nazarene."

It would puzzle the best-informed biblical student that ever lived to find in any part of the Old Testament the words embodying this alleged prophecy, and to sustain Matthew's claim concerning it. In fact, such an utterance is not to be found. In what is known as "reference" Bibles the reader will be referred to several passages in the Old Testament that by means of the punster's art seem to support the claim, and by those who accept the Bible as God's word are accepted as doing so. To examin one of these passages will be sufficient for my purpose.

One of the heroes of the Old Testament was Samson. In Judges xiii a wonderful story is told to the effect that Samson's mother, hitherto barren, was visited by an angel, who said to her (see verse 5 of the chapter): "Lo, thou shalt conceive and bear a son; and no razor shall come on his head; for the child shall be a Nazarite unto God from the womb; and he shall begin to deliver Israel out of the hand of the Philistines."

Without pausing to more than note the fact that this prophecy, if such was really uttered, was fulfilled in the history of a man who came into the world and passed out of it again centuries before Jesus was born, let us see whether it can be made to apply to Jesus.

What is a Nazarite? I will take a good orthodox authority in answer to the question—the "Dictionary of the Bible," by Rev. William Smith, LL.D.—and here is what I find. In the first place, the etymology of the word makes it indicate "one separated." Dr. Smith says a Nazarite was "one of either sex who was bound by a vow of a peculiar kind to be set apart from others for the service of God. The obligation was either for life or for a defined time." There is no record that Jesus was set apart or that he was under any vow. His long fast in the wilderness might be adduced to show that he was a Nazarite, but even that could not make him a fulfilment of the prophecy, "the child shall be a Nazarite to God from the womb." Further on Dr. Smith states that the Nazarite was forbidden "to approach any dead body, even that of his nearest relation." Jesus, according to the chroniclers of his life, not only approached dead bodies, but touched them. And, to make a final quotation, Dr. Smith says: "We do not know whether the vow for life was ever taken by the individual. In all the cases mentioned in the sacred history it was made by the parents before the birth of the Nazarite himself." If such a vow was made by the parents of Jesus, there is no record of it. In truth, he was not a Nazarite at all, and the application to him of any of the so-called prophecies as to Nazarites is simply a pun—the only one, I think, that the Bible contains.

Now as to the idea of prophecy itself. Is there any proof that such a thing, as it is regarded by theologians and religionists, exists, or ever existed? The burden of proof rests upon them, and we who deny their affirmation that God has spoken through his prophets might very safely leave the burden there and hav the best of the argument. We deny the truth of the claim. We go further and support our denial.

At the outset I am ready to admit much more than the other side would expect me to admit. They may take the books of both the Old and the New Testament as veritable history, and then, quoting some poetical passage from the older books, show me the realization of it in some event or some person described in the later writings. The argument is a good one, and can be made repeatedly from the story of Jesus and from other portions of so-called sacred history.

But if the argument is a sound one—if some scene in the life of Jesus, suggesting some grand poetic utterance of Isaiah, or some wail of Jeremiah, proves that God was speaking of the yet unborn Nazarene through the mouths of his prophets—every realization, in the entire history of the world, of the lofty aspirations or dreams of poet or thinker proves that through that poet or thinker God spoke of that coming event wherein the realization was effected.

And so-called profane history is as full of these coincidences as the Bible is. I will take an example from recent times, finding my prophecy in words written several hundreds of years ago.

Shakspere in his play of "Midsummer Night's Dream" makes the fairy Puck exclaim, when Oberon sends him upon a mission, bidding him be back "ere the leviathan can swim a league:"

I'd put a girdle round about the earth
In forty minutes.

Cables under the ocean pulse to-day with currents of an element Shakspere knew nothing of except as the lightning in the sky. These currents carry, swift as thought itself, the thoughts of men between the old world in which Shakspere lived to a new world of which he did not even dream. Over a vast continent, unknown and pathless in Shakspere's time, many wires stretch, and carry men's messages in a flash from the shores of one great ocean to those of another. The occurrence of the hour is known all around the world within the hour. Shall I not, in view of all this, say, "And now is brought to pass that which was said of the Lord by his prophet, William Shakspere?"

If God spoke of Jesus in the Hebrew prophet's description of the king and deliverer for whom the downtrodden Jews were hoping and praying—if God spoke of Jesus in the sensuous Song of Solomon—if God spoke at all through those men whose utterances make up the Bible—then he spoke through Shakspere as he has spoken through every man who ever had an aspiration or an imagination that carried his thought beyond the age in which he lived.

And what is more, I contend that it would honor God more to class as his utterances such "prophecies" as the one just quoted from Shakspere, than to attribute to him such filth as Solomon's Song.

The world has always had its dreamers—will always hav them. Dreams will be realized as long as the world lasts, and there will always be opportunities for saying, "Now is fulfilled," but the day has gone by in which the thinking man can believe that anything which may hav been fulfilled in any age or clime was ever "spoken of the Lord by his prophet."

F. W. WEBBER.

Mrs. Slenker to Mr. McArthur.

I do not mean to "quarrel" at all. Words may be "trifles," but they are, in all arguments of this kind, the only implements or weapons we can use, and so become of the greatest importance.

I object to the word "violent" as being applied to my opposition of the Spiritual philosophy. I never intend violence in any debate or mental contest. I confess to being a persistent opponent of all that I deem false and untrue everywhere. I hav said many kind words of the Spiritual philosophy and its advocates, and probably hav more kindly correspondence with believers and mediums than most of the readers of our dear old TRUTH SEEKER. I did not, as the great majority of skeptics do, refuse to read and investigate, and content myself by poohing at it and pushing it on one side, but entered heart and soul into the work of trying to prove it true or false. I find a world of beauty in the idea of a life in a summerland where all is love. Evolution, hope, and happiness are all tending that way. No downward, backward dissolution, but all onward and upward. No hell with its horrors, but smiles, flowers, and perpetual paradises everywhere.

I presume where two people passionately love one individual, and wish to hav him or her as their own special dearest, there will be special homes and neighborhoods for each, where each shall hav the self-same Mary or John, and all the surroundings.

The man who has four wives and one after another dies, and he takes a fifth and loves them all, and they love him, will find himself multiplied into five individualities, and scattered into five different localities. Or how will it be? It's very puzzling to me, but no doubt McArthur's larger brain has it all nicely arranged. No doubt he knows whether I can hav my first sweetheart, whom Spiritists would say is now reunited to his dead wife, and my duplicate can hav my present husband, or whoever it prefers. Oh, the tangled web!

McArthur seems to ask for further descriptions of other séances, but he has only mentioned the one of eight lines, which was only a preface. True, the others did not deal in raps; the raps were plenty, but did not amount to anything so far as I was concerned.

I hav sat at numerous home séances for raps, but never, in any other case, heard what I called a rap. The table would tip and crack, etc., but no real rap. Questions were answered, but no real test. A lady friend told me one time that, simply out of a spirit of mischief, she took up the role of fortune-telling. She was surprised and confounded to see how often she hit the nail on the head.

She would tell entire strangers they would receive a ring, or some other present; would be married, be sick, hear bad or good news, receive money, take a journey, etc., and customers flocked in till she had to own up to her deception, and even then a great many insisted on her occult powers, just as Spiritualists now do in the case of every medium who confesses to fraud, or is detected in it.

I never said Spiritualists believed any of the phenomena was "miracle;" only that if it really occurred much of it, to me, seemed miracle.

As to the portion of phenomena I believe real, much depends upon the meaning we attach to that word "phenomena."

Things may be real and we not understand the laws that govern their occurrence or the causes that produce them. We are not bound to say why a thing is or else accept it as Spiritual. We hav a right to wait for knowledge.

It is you who claim a Spiritual origin for a thing who are the ones who should furnish evidence and proof that it has such. I never claimed that there was nothing outside or beyond the brain capacity of anyone, for I know too well there is. But this is no reason we should not seek for light whenever we can, and refuse to accept what seems to us impossible, as real facts.

I am sorry for "fools," but cannot say I despise them. They, like all of us, are the outcome of circumstances, and deserve pity rather than condemnation.

The quotation from our grand and good Ingersoll I accept as our rule and guide, and hope to keep within its bounds.

Two Opinions.

THE STRONGLY DEVOUT GENERAL VON MOLTKE.

War is a holy thing, of divine institution; it is one of the sacred laws of the world; it keeps men from sinking into the most hideous Materialism.

THE FREETHINKER VICTOR HUGO.

If to kill is a crime, to kill much cannot be an extenuating circumstance. If to steal is a disgrace, to rob a nation can not be a glory. Te Deums are of small significance here; homicide is homicide; bloodshed is bloodshed; it alters nothing to call one's self Cæsar or Napoleon; in the eyes of the eternal God, a murderer is not changed in character because, instead of a hangman's cap, there is placed upon his head an emperor's crown. Ah, my friends, let us proclaim absolute verities! Let us dishonor war! No; bloody glory does not exist. No; it is not good, and it is not honorable, to make corpses. No, it cannot be that life should travail for death. No, O mothers who surround me, it cannot be that War, the thief, is to continue to seize and immolate your offspring! No, it cannot be that women are to bear children in anguish; that men are to be born; that communities are to plow and sow; that the peasant is to fertilize the fields and workmen enrich the cities; that thinkers are to meditate and instructors to teach; that industry is to perform its marvels; that genius is to accomplish its prodigies; that the vast human activity is to multiply, in the presence of the starry heavens, its efforts and creations, in order to produce that frightful international exhibition which is called a field of battle! [The whole audience rises and applauds the speaker.] The true field of battle—behold it! [pointing to the International Exhibition.] That is the true battle-field of the human race, the rendezvous of the masterpieces of human labor, which Paris presents to the world at this moment!

To the Sheriff of said County, to execute and return in due form of law.

Witness, Henry Best, Clerk of said Court, and the seal thereof, at Chicago, aforesaid, this 14th day of January, A.D. 1889.

[L.S.] HENRY BEST, Clerk.

That Injunction.

The law's delay is proverbial, but if a person wishes to know the amount of moral cowardice which many of its practitioners exhibit, when confronted with an opportunity to correct a gigantic wrong, as well as the amount of impediments and obstructions its administrators can throw in the way, he only needs my experiences of the past week. Having authorized an attorney about a month ago to keep a sharp look-out for a bill which I thought barely possible the St. Mary's Training School might or might not present, since the supreme court's decision so emphatically pronounced their receiving public funds illegal, you may imagin my surprise to find that the bill was presented, and chagrin that my legal friend was reluctant to go into the case at all. There was no time to waste, so I went to consult General Stiles. He was at home sick. From that point it would occupy the larger portion of THE TRUTH SEEKER to synopsize the various interviews with lawyers, some of whom would "just like to take the case, but they were so fearfully rushed with business," you know. Then I thought of our friend Judge F. C. Russell, who accepted without a word of objection, buttoned up his overcoat, and sallied forth in the worst storm of the winter to collect the facts.

In a couple of days the lengthy legal document was drawn up, asking for a writ of injunction. The next thing was to find a master in chancery who would recommend its issuance. Knowing that I. K. Boyeson was a professed Freethinker, I thought it safe to see him. But I had not taken into consideration that he was also a Democratic politician with aspirations. He absolutely refused. Master in Chancery Windes was next visited. He read the document through, acknowledged that we had a strong case, but he would like his friend Russell to get one of the chancellors to recommend him to issue the writ, as he bravely said, "Then I will do my duty," but he wanted the responsibility to rest on some one else's shoulder. We returned to the various judges' chambers. None were comeatable. This being Saturday, the board would meet and probably pass the bill Monday. Friend Galpin, who had been waiting to appear as our bondsman, had returned home long ago. In case of emergency our old comrade, A. C. Berg, had also promised to sign the bond. Finally Horatio L. Waite, a master in chancery, gave us the recommendation for the writ, subject to the approval of one of the chancery judges.

Monday morning, the preliminaries having been gone through, Judge O. H. Horton signed the recommendation, and our ever-present helper in time of trouble, A. D. O'Neil, scheduled enough property to cover the bond, and thus did honor to himself and the cause.

On Saturday I was desirous to secure a down-town bondsman, so that part of it would be conveniently settled, and I called on a friend of ample property. I asked him if he would go on my bond. He said, "Cheerfully." When I explained matters, he begged off, saying, "If I did that, I might just as well shut up shop." Still there are those who pretend the Romish church exercises no arbitrary power in the community.

Seventeen copies of the writ must be served on the board and county treasurer, and thirty summonses for the board of the Training School to appear; so there is money needed. This will be the last ditch of Romish raiders on the Cook county treasury, and if we win, our triumph will be complete, and establish a precedent throughout the entire state.

On account of the vast interests involved, the Romish church will doubtless make a stubborn fight in the courts. But it seems as though we hav a clear case.

Already the secretary is receiving the congratulations of citizens, for they find the American Secular Union is doing a patriotic, necessary, and practical work.

THE PROPOSED CONFERENCE.

Doubtless, disappointment will be felt at its postponement. While I realize that midwinter is not a propitious time for traveling in this region, and that the notice of such a meeting was scarcely given ample time, yet I also know that at least two hundred people were directly communicated with the majority of whom never answered the letters or circulars. Fearing that such a poor turn-out would hav more of a chilling effect than no conference at all, I hav concluded to await more favorable weather and greater exhibition of energy and fervor by individual Liberals in behalf of their rights and liberties. The financial aid promised or sent was far in excess of the attendance pledged, which proves the passiv interest of many, but we must at this crisis expect nobler effort. The battle of mental liberty must be fought out again, as we cannot rely on substitutes in this conflict. Each one man should fill a gap in the breach. We do not need the conference for Chicago, and a conference not well attended would retard rather than advance the interests of Secularism at this critical period. A great many hav written me letters praising the idea, but so few could attend that the best interest will be served by awaiting a better time. Those who sent funds and those who pledged them will hear from me personally.

Do Liberals realize the dangers of the hour? Are they not willing to respond personally when the cry for help goes forth? Do they wish to resist the powerful machinations of

The God-in-the-Constitution party.

The Evangelical Alliance.

The "King Jesus" of the Women's Christian Temperance Union.

The American Sabbath Union.

The compulsory (Christian) Educational Amendment Act.

The ecclesiastical trick to make the centennial Washington inaugural a big boom for the church power.

Besides the innumerable injustices and robberies now extant, and last, but not least, resistance to the inroads of Rome on our public school system, as well as its raids on the various treasuries?

A valiant veteran writes: "It seems to me, Friend Stevens, what is wanted is more earnest, honest, and intelligent enthusiasm among our people on the subject of the danger to our American institutions of liberty and independence from the encroachments of this old tyrannical . . . system of superstition. When we try to bring this before the people they will turn up their noses and say, 'Oh, fudge! there's no danger.' That is just where the danger is. They sleep, as it were, on a magazine of deadly explosivs."

Another activ comrade says: "The American Secular Union is not properly supported. The burdens fall upon a few, while the others loaf around the throne and sing psalms at the expense of the workers."

It is for those who read this to remedy this state of things not only in their own case, but on the part of everyone with whom they come in contact. Ask yourselvs, Hav you any duty in this matter?

PROGRESS IN MICHIGAN.

My friend Hon. Judson Grenell informs me that Hon. A. F. Wettaufer has presented a bill in the legislature which, although it is not what I wanted, will perhaps do as a starter. The bill exempts all personal property from taxation, and proposes to tax all land, which, of course, includes church sites.

If the Liberals of Michigan approve of this, let them write me, and those, also, who will volunteer to appear before the committee of the legislature should notify me at their earliest convenience.

ANOTHER CHRISTIAN SCHEME.

Washington's centennial inaugural is going to be used to advance the interests of the ecclesiastical party, as will be observed by the following:

A committee of clergymen, which has been for some time assisting the executiv committee of the centennial celebration of Washington's inauguration, has prepared an address, which was made public to-day and will be sent to the ministers and churches throughout the country. The address concluded:

The morning of April 30, 1789, the bells at 9 o'clock summoned the people to the churches to implore the blessing of heaven on the nation and its chosen president. We respectfully and earnestly request of fellow-citizens of every name, race, and creed of this city and throughout the entire country, following the example of our fathers, to meet in their respectiv places of worship at 9 o'clock the morning of April 30, 1889, and to hold such religious services of thanksgiving and praise as may seem suitable in view of what God has done for us and our land during the century which has elapsed since George Washington took the chair of state. Religion and patriotism hav been united among us as a people from the very beginning. May they so continue forever.

The address is signed by Morton J. Brophy, representing Archbishop Corrigan; John W. Brown, rector of St. Thomas's church; E. Winchester Donald, church of the Ascension; Talbot W. Chambers, of the Collegiate Dutch church; Gustav Gottheld, of the Temple Emanuel; John Hall, Fifth Avenue church; William M. Taylor, Broadway Tabernacle; James M. King, Methodist Episcopal; G. P. Copel, English Lutheran; R. S. McArthur, Calvary Baptist church; and William Hayes Ward, editor of the Independent.

Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll.

Max O'Rell in his "Jonathan and His Continent."

I one day asked one of the cleverest ladies of New York whether she had met Colonel Ingersoll.

"No," she answered, "I never met him, and do not wish to make his acquaintance."

"May I ask why?" I said.

She replied: "Simply because I am told that it is impossible to know him without admiring and loving him."

"Well?"

"Well, I don't want to admire or love him."

. . . . . .

I had the honor of making his acquaintance, and, like all those who hav approached and known him, I soon admired him.

He is one of the greatest figures of his great country. In a book on contemporary America one must needs speak of this celebrated advocate. He is a personality apart. He has little in common with the rest of his countrymen but the title of colonel.

Once more I say it: in this book of jottings I do not sit in judgment, I merely describe impressions. It is not necessary to indorse a man's theories in order to enjoy his society, and this is especially true in the case of Colonel Ingersoll, who is many-sided in his powers, and who charms theologians and Agnostics alike when the subject of religion is not to the fore.

Col. Robert Ingersoll is a man of about sixty, six feet high and strongly built, a colossus physically and intellectually. The eyes sparkle with wit and beam with the enjoyment of life; the mouth is humorous and smiling; the head large and well planted on broad shoulders; the face shaven, the brain bristling with humanitarian thoughts; a man with the heart of a lion to fight the battles of life, but the heart of a woman in presence of human suffering.

He has substituted for the love of religion, the religion of love and of the family. According to him, religion should hav but one aim: to teach us how to be happy in this life. He repeats with Christ: "Love one another, do not to others what you would not hav others do to you." And he adds: "A God that is represented as weaving webs to catch the souls of men whom he has created is not adorable." As to a future life, the colonel does not commit himself. He says: "We do not know, we cannot tell, whether death is a door or a wall, a spreading of pinions to soar or the folding forever of wings." In the eyes of most pious people, his theories are abominable, and he is the Antichrist; but the Americans are unanimous in admitting his extraordinary talents, and among the dear friends of the colonel and his family are many Presbyterians, some of them ministers.

Antichrist if you will—that is, if you can imagin such a personage endowed with every moral and intellectual faculty.

In his presence men feel themselvs small, and women put their hands over their eyes, being careful to keep the fingers well apart. A decidedly dangerous Antichrist, this.

Mr. Ingersoll is not only America's greatest living orator, he is a great writer and a great thinker; an infusion, as it were, of Johnson, Voltaire, and Milton. He possesses the logic of the first, the persiflage of the second, and some of the sublimity of the third. His arguments are constructed like propositions of Euclid; his style is vigorous, as clear as it is graceful, as poetic as it is humorous, and his verve is inexhaustible.

The trinity that he worships is the trinity of science—reason, observation, and experience.

His enemies call him Atheist, because he does not believe in their God. Man has made unto himself a God in his own image, and is apt to treat as Atheists all who do not worship him. Voltaire, who said that "if God did not exist we should hav to invent him," is still called an Atheist by many ignorant people.

I never heard Mr. Ingersoll say he did not believe in a God.

He will not acknowledge the existence of Jehovah, the God of the Jews, a God who commanded the people of his choice to exterminate their enemies, sparing neither old men, women, nor children. In his eyes Jehovah is a myth; the creation of a cowardly, ungrateful, and bloodthirsty race.

In the opinion of Robert Ingersoll, a religion is not moral which practically says to man: "Do not sin; but if you do sin, console yourself, come to me and I will forgiv you." Such a theory is not calculated to improve mankind, who should be taught to do good, not in the hope of being one day rewarded for it, not in the fear of being punished for the neglect of it, but out of love and admiration for what is good, and with the aim of adding to the happiness of their fellow-creatures. Mr. Ingersoll's religion is the religion of humanity; he says: "Happiness is the only good; the time to be happy is now, and the way to be happy is to make others so." Liv to do good, to love, and to be beloved by those around, and then lie down and sleep with the consciousness of having done your duty to men. Do not ask pardon of God for an injury done to man. Ask pardon of the man, and make reparation to him for your offense.

"I rob Smith," exclaims Mr. Ingersoll in the ironical language he is such a master of, "God forgivs me. How does that help Smith?"

He maintains that the Christian religion teaches less the love of an infinitly just and merciful God than the fear of a demon thirsting for human victims. This charge is borne out by a proverb used by the Scot, who is a student of human nature.

Needless to say that he looks upon the Bible, not as an inspired book, but as a collection of literatures, something akin to the "Arabian Nights," and this is what makes discussion with him difficult, if not out of the question. How is it possible to imagin a discussion between faith and reason?

To Protestants, the practice of religion is an occupation for Sundays. To Colonel Ingersoll, it is an occupation for every waking hour, and consists in accomplishing your duty to your fellow-creatures.

Son of a Protestant minister, Robert Ingersoll early showed special aptitude for the discussion of theological questions. By the age of sixteen he had thoroughly studied the Old Testament, and would reason upon it like a doctor of divinity. The father in vain drew Robert's attention to the beauties of the Bible; the son could see little in it but absurdities and inconsistencies. The old minister was heard to say: "It grieves me to hear my Robbie talk so, but I declare he is too much for me; I cannot answer him."

Who can answer Ingersoll? is a question often asked. Apparently not the ministers of the hundreds of different Protestant sects that flourish in America; not Mr. Gladstone, student of the Bible and profound reasoner though he be.

For more than a year the president of the Nineteenth Century Club of New York was trying to get a Protestant minister to break a lance with this redoubtable Agnostic in public, but without avail. No one felt equal to the task.

That which makes this man so formidable is not so much his eloquence, his quick repartee, his sarcasm, his pathos, his humor; it is above all the life he leads, the example he sets of all the domestic virtues. One must hav the privilege of knowing him intimately, of penetrating into that sanctuary of conjugal happiness, his home, before one can form an idea of the respect he must inspire even in those who abhor his doctrins. His house is the home of the purest joys; it holds four hearts that beat as one.

Mr. Ingersoll livs in one of the handsome houses on Fifth avenue. His family consists of his wife and two lovely daughters. Athens and Venice, as an American whom I met at Colonel Ingersoll's used to call them. Indeed, one reminds you of the beautiful creations of Titian. The other seems like a mythological vision, a nymph from the banks of Erymanthus. As you look at her, while she speaks to you with her eyes modestly lowered, almost seeming to apologize for being so lovely, you involuntarily think of "Le Jeune Malade," of André Chénier, that last of the Greek poets, as Edmund About called him.

Authors, artists, journalists, members of the thinking world of New York, may be met at the colonel's charming Sunday evenings. About eleven at night, when all but the intimate friends of the family hav left, these latter draw around their host and entice him to talk upon one of his favorit subjects, poetry, music, or maybe the "Mistakes of Moses," while they listen with avidity. He knows his Shakspere as thoroughly as the Bible, only he speaks of him with far more respect and admiration. He adores Wagner, whom he sets even above Beethoven. I mention this to prove once more that we hav all our little faults, and that Colonel Ingersoll, in common with his fellow-mortals, is not perfect. Between midnight and one in the morning the last visitors reluctantly depart. On the way home you think of all the witty things that hav been said, the arrows of satire that hav been shot at hypocrisy and humbug, the ennobling humanitarian opinions that hav been advanced; and though you may not feel converted or diverted or perverted to Ingersollism, you are sure to leave that house feeling fuller of good will toward all men, and saying to yourself: "What a delightful evening I hav passed!"

I was present one evening at a meeting of the Nineteenth Century Club to hear a discussion on "The Poetry of the Future." Colonel Ingersoll was to hav taken part in it; but, being retained professionally at Washington, he was obliged to excuse himself at the eleventh hour. The president immediately telegraphed to a well-known minister, asking him to take the colonel's place.

"I distinctly decline to take Colonel Ingersoll's place in this world or the next," exclaimed the recipient of the telegram, as soon as he had read it. The reverend gentleman nevertheless took part in the evening's debate, and when he repeated his repartee to the audience, was greeted with hearty laughter and applause.

Now, the lot of Colonel Ingersoll in this world is very enviable, for his profession brings him in a magnificent income. As to refusing his place in the next, what an absurdity!

When Robert Ingersoll presents himself at the gates of paradise, and St. Peter sees that good, open face, radiant with happiness, the doors will be thrown wide to let him pass, and the saint will say:

"Come, Robert, come in. Thy happy face pleases me. We hav just let in a cargo of long-faced folk—Presbyterians, I'll be bound—and it does one good to look at thee. Thou hast done thy utmost to stifle the hydra-headed monster Superstition, and to destroy the infamies which are in circulation on the subject of the Lord. Come in, friend, thou hast loved, thou hast been beloved, thou hast preached concord, mercy, peace, love, and happiness; come, take thy place amongst the benefactors of the human race."

Gender and the Great Cosmic Unity.

The article by Ella E. Gibson in reply to my communication escaped my observation. The lady, I am glad to know, approves the monism advocated by me, but objects to two expressions used by me in referring to the Great Cosmic Unity.

First, she objects to my use of the masculin gender "he" I adopted purposely. Her point would hav been well taken if it had been my intention to designate the male sex, exclusiv of the female one, as the attribute of the "God."

Being obliged to use the masculin or the feminin or the neuter, I was compelled to utilize the masculin for the reason that it, the masculin, also includes the feminin, as the words "man" or "mankind," that include as well "woman" and "womankind."

I could not use the neuter (or the negativ and steril) gender to designate the fountain-source of procreation and fecundity, the Great Cosmic Unity, inherent in which is the principle of both the paternal and maternal creativ powers. All the mythologies and anthropomorphisms hav established one or several personal gods and goddesses to represent the positiv nature and prolific or fecund powers of the universe. As to the negativ and steril powers of nothingness, they had rightly represented them as devils having nullum cujusvis sexus indicium, or as being without any sex and essentially steril.

It is true that, at times, some devils hav been represented as prolifics; as, for instance, in the old Christian legend of Robert the Devil, duke of Normandy; but it was during the Dark Ages. Then mythological symbols had lost their primitiv meanings, and had been, little by little, transformed by public ignorance and by priestly craft into mere gross superstition and fetichism. In this legend of Robert the Devil, the Christian object was to illustrate the dual nature attributed to man, attracted as he is at one and the same time in opposit directions, toward good and toward evil.

In the Greek and Roman mythologies it is darkness, night, death, horror, despair, etc.—i.e., negation only—in all its human aspects that is begotten by the negativ fecundity of infernal deities.

So it is only the masculin gender that could properly be employed in reference to the Great Cosmic Unity.

Of course, if there existed that ideal hermaphrodite gender dreamed of by the great Greek philosophers and formulated by the great Greek artists (as evidenced by the Hermaphrodite of the villa Borghese, on whom are seen cujusvis sexus indicia); if there was, in the English language, such a gender, combining, in an august unity, the two creativ "electricities"—the paternal and the maternal—I would certainly hav used it, instead of the masculin that has been misunderstood by your correspondent, Ella E. Gibson, as an ungallant masculin egotism, and an unjust slight of her own sex.

The lady is again mistaken when she objects to the use of the word God as bringing back to her mind the remembrance of all the superstitions, fetichisms, and anthropomorphisms by which the progress of civilization has been so long trammeled. The word God is, again, the only word in the language that can be used by a thinker to express the infinitude of the Great Unity, of his power, wisdom, and beauty.

The Great Cosmic Unity, with his "holy" trinity—Substance, Movement, and Law—is greater than any anthropomorphic god. The only defect of the word God, when applied to the Great Unity, is its relativ insignificance. But there is no greater one in the language, and one can but use that which he possesses. To refuse the highest possible title to the Great Unity, would be as ridiculous as unjust and irreverent. No true believer in the Great Unity of substance, no intelligent monist—be he (or she) a philosopher, a poet, or an artist—will ever refuse his (or her) worship to the sublime Great Cosmic Unity.

Lectures and Meetings.

GEORGE LONGFORD, secretary of the Philadelphia Liberal League, writes: "Friendship Liberal League of Philadelphia will commemorate the anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine, on Sunday, Feb. 3, 1889, in Industrial Hall, Broad and Wood streets, at 2:30 and 7:30 P.M., order of exercises consisting of orations by talented lady speakers, vocal and instrumental music, recitations, etc. There will be refreshments served during the intermission at 5 to 7 P.M. Tickets, twenty-five cents. We hav secured a spacious hall for this occasion, so that there will be ample room for people coming a long distance. Liberals, let us show our appreciation by turning out in full force!"

W. S. BELL sends this notice: "I am going to start next April on a lecture trip to the West, and would say a word or two to the Liberal 'brethren' who may be likely to be interested in my lectures, through the columns of your valuable paper. My line of travel will be through St. Louis, Denver, Leadville, Salt Lake City, Sacramento, to San Francisco. I would like to hav many opportunities to ring the liberty Bell at places on or near this line of travel, as I shall not return the same way. From San Francisco I shall follow in the footsteps of my illustrious predecessors, S. P. Putnam, C. B. Reynolds, and B. F. Underwood, in my tour through Washington territory, Oregon, and parts of Idaho. I would like to get into correspondence with our Liberal friends all along the line from Chicago to Seattle at once, to arrange for lectures. Address, 248 State street, Chicago, Ill."

W. F. JAMIESON was given a week of lectures in Shenandoah, Ia., and now Christianity is at the boiling point. Says the Post: "The mental, moral, and spiritual forces of this community were in a state of violent agitation, this week, as they were affected with the Week of Prayer services and sermons, Professor Jamieson's Freethought lectures, the stirring revivals in the Christian and Free Methodist churches, and the grandly impressiv Odd Fellows installation services. After all this, we ought to be a very wise and good community." In the same issue appeared the following: "Professor Jamieson is a pleasant speaker, and attracts a large audience every evening, in the Knights of Labor Hall, to listen to his Freethought lectures." His address is Shenandoah, Ia.

Only a Catholic Version.

"Peace on earth to men of good will" is not a paraphrase of a New Testament text by the editor of Freethought. You will find in the Douay version that when the angelic host greeted the illegitimate child of the Virgin Mary they said: "Glory in the highest to God, and on earth peace to men of good will." All Catholics read it that way. ANTIC.

Communications.

The Cowardice of the Board of Missions.

It has long been a cause of righteous indignation with me that, after having enforced upon her ages of subjection, humiliation, and inferior education and position, men should demand of woman that she fight her own battle for freedom and equality of opportunity. That she plead her own cause, that she sustain her own arguments and convince him, against his will and his sisters, in spite of his influence and disabling precautions, that she has the right to the same status as a human being that is enjoyed by her brothers. He handicaps her with every conceivable device, and then says: "Show me that you can compete with me, prove to me that you are able, and I will cease to oppose you." But he does more than this. He denies his wife and daughters all broadening education, occupation, and stimulus; he lets them know in a thousand ways that he thinks it a woman's duty to be satisfied with what he is pleased to term her "sphere;" he makes her whole life dependent mentally, socially, legally, and morally upon his pleasure and opinions, and above all he keeps her his financial dependant, and then he says, triumphantly, "If women wanted to be free; if they desired equality before the law; if they demanded it, they could hav it quick enough. They don't want it. They don't feel equal to it, therefore they don't deserve it."

It is as if a man and his wife start out for a walk, and he givs her the baby and a market-basket and a lighted lamp to carry. Another man attacks them and he dodges behind a post and says: "Now, Mathilda, you show him you're not to be put upon. You fight. Show him you're game. Sail in, but don't drop the lamp, and hold the basket so things won't spill out, and keep the baby from getting hurt. Look out! Don't hit that way, it will hurt him. Remember his feelings are tender. Don't kick, it isn't ladylike. Stop biting, men hate to see a woman use her teeth on things that will soil them. Dear me, dear me! I didn't think Mathilda would run. I didn't know she was such a coward. But I begin to agree with you now that women are all cowards, and besides, they rather like to be thrashed."

I repeat that I hav grown somewhat weary of this sort of thing, and in several instances hav declined on this ground to reply to articles which were submitted to me by editors for that purpose. It is, therefore, peculiarly gratifying to see any phase of woman's cause taken up by men who hav not been shamed into it, but it is especially pleasant when it is done by a man so capable as E. H. House. His last novel, "Yone Santo," * is a most beautiful story, but it is far more than this. Its exquisit literary workmanship places it in the front rank, but even yet its value is not told. It is one of the tenderest studies of young womanhood in one of the phases of her bound and disabled condition that it has ever been my fortune to read. It is written with the heart of a good woman who cries out against the fate of her daughters, and with the experience and force of a good man who blames himself and his kind for forcing such a fate upon them. Mr. House holds his readers with the threefold strength of a woman's tenderness and insight, a man's power and experience, and withal the literary skill and exquisit workmanship of a polished man of letters.

Incidentally he touches upon one or two points of a theological nature, and for this reason it was sought to suppress the book, and the effort would hav been successful but for a happy accident which enabled Mr. House to secure a friendly publisher in the firm of Belford, Clarke & Co. There is no novel recently written that deserves such careful reading. There is not one more thoroughly interesting, more effectiv, more genuinly progressiv, and if there has been one of recent date that is its equal in finish and artistic ability, I hav not chanced to read it.

Every Liberal-minded person will wish to read it when I say it was sought to suppress it by the board of missions, and that they do not dare attempt to answer its brave and effectiv exposure of some of their doings in the Lord's field. Every woman should read it, for it is the sweetest and most tenderly appreciativ work possible in its dealings with the trials of a pure young girl, whose mental development has endangered her peace of mind and comfort of body in the narrow limits of the sphere assigned her, and under which she is compelled to liv.

It is a plea and a protest so strong, so simple, so tender, and withal so gentle, that, although it claims to be but the story of one little maid in a distant land, it is the story of many little maids in every land. This American gentleman, this gentle American, has done a brave thing, a good thing, and a much broader thing in its scope than I believe he himself has fully understood, and he has done it so well that I, for one, feel that he has extended to me a personal favor. In the person of his sweet little heroin he has fought for us all—for every woman of every country. It is the new chivalry, and we are to be congratulated that the knight who breaks the lance for progress and fair play is so well equipped for the battle. I would not hav it inferred from what I say that the book is either a theological treatis or an equal-rights argument. It is simply and solely, so far as its rank goes, a story. It is no more an argument than was "Adam Bede," or "Bleak House." It is no more a theological treatis than "The Scarlet Letter," but the missionary board took exception to it as it appeared in the Atlantic Monthly, and found means to frighten Houghton, Mifflin & Co. into submission to their desires to see the book suppressed. But the story of this outrage is told most effectivly by its gifted author in a postscript to the book itself, and a most striking commentary it is upon free speech and free press in this country.

The board of missions did not attempt to answer it—in so far as it purported to giv an account of some of their doings in Japan, where the author then lived—but to force a great publishing house to suppress it. And they succeeded in so far as that they found means to control those publishers. I hav had the pleasure of seeing a somewhat long and interesting correspondence on the subject, and I do not hesitate to say that, in my opinion, it is the most dangerous and serious case of attempted subjugation of the press and of free speech by the pulpit that I hav yet known to occur in America. For the book is only a novel. It makes no pretense to be history. It is a work of fiction by a gifted and cultured man. Has the time come in America when, in such a work, the author may not even refer to certain abuses of which he was an eye-witness, unless he first asks permission of some body of ecclesiastics who are too holy to be even criticised in a novel? Drop "Robert Elsmere" and "John Ward, Preacher," and "The Story of An African Farm," long enough to read "Yone Santo," which is written with far more literary skill than any of them, and see if you think it a book to be suppressed, or that Americans can afford to stand by while it is done and say nothing. The book is written with such depth of feeling that from the first page to the last one is touched to the quick, and one's sympathies enlisted for those who suffer or are tried beyond their strength, wheresoever they may liv, whomsoever they may be—and yet this is the book the board of Christian missions tried to suppress! There is not a line in it, from first to last, that is not for the uplifting of those who are weak, for the encouragement of those who aspire, for the condemnation of those who are cruel or wicked or hardened—and this is the book the board of Christian missions tried to suppress. Every Christian who is an honorable man will scorn them for it, and every woman who reads the book—no matter to what church she belongs—if she has within her a heart to feel, will look upon the organization that attempted such an outrage with the contempt it deserves, and with the suspicion it now proves itself entitled to by its own acts in a land where it is not so easy to cover up its tracks as in the one of which the book is written. If those who read the book closed it with any doubt as to the justice of its criticisms of the spirit of those missionaries in the little land of which Mr. House wrote, their own actions in dealing with the book, and with this crippled son of genius (whom they believed they could crush because of his physical misfortunes), would more than brush the doubts away and make one feel "the half has not been told."

HELEN H. GARDENER.

* Yone Santo, a Child of Japan. By E. H. House. 285 pp. Paper, 50 cents.

Our London Letter.

The Christmas season has once more produced its quota of pulpit lying and hypocrisy. Once again are we told Christmas day is the anniversary of the most beneficial event to man in history, and the simple sheep is informed by the artful shepherd that the reputed birth of Christ has been a wonderful power for good, resulting in the brotherhood of man and the general establishment of peace and good will. Christian labor-sweaters hav shown their excessiv love for their fellows by assisting their poorer brethren by means of dinner tickets entitling the fortunate holders to a pound or two of butchers' scraps and sufficient material to make a microscopic plum-pudding; not too rich, though, out of tender consideration for their weak digestions. One band of Christian workers has been so overpoweringly generous as to distribute fifteen hundred new sixpences to as many workhouse children. Fancy one Christian parish containing that number of workhouse children!

Altogether this has been a season of great rejoicing. Everybody ought to hav been happy and contented, though the papers record several cases of obstinate, unregenerate individuals who would persist—no doubt possessed of the devil—in dying of cold and starvation. What can be done with such people? They are prayed for continually, and will not, in spite of all that can be done in this direction, humbly and resignedly wait for the heavenly ravens to feed them. No doubt the ravens are trying to find them, but they will persist in hiding away in dark arches and empty coal-cellars, and all sorts of most out-of-the-way places, where no decent ravens could properly go, and thus rush on their own fate.

After all the hungry hav been fed and the naked clothed, those who hav done these good deeds, the churches, settle down to enjoy their own well-earned reward, and enjoy themselvs immensely on the eve of the new year.

I saw an advertisment on a board in front of a neighboring gospel-shop, that at 9:30 a meat supper would be provided, tickets one shilling each; if two or more were taken the price was only ninepence each; and at 11 P.M. there would be spiritual refreshment in the way of prayer and spiritual songs. The announcement did not mention if drink was provided at the meat supper. But as there was a public house just opposit, possibly the publican had managed to supply liquid refreshment on equally liberal terms.

A retrospect of the year does not offer much encouragement to the Christian party. The superstition is slowly dying, genuin believers are few and far between, and the form is only kept up by strenuous efforts on the part of those most interested in doing so. Lectures on topics of the day take the place of the old-fashioned sermon, trained singers hav taken the place of congregational amateur performances, theatricals in the church school-room are instituted, bazars and lotteries are indulged in, and yet it is extremely difficult to keep a decent number of members on the church books. Education is developing common sense, and unsuspected reasoning powers are brought into play. People are becoming less superstitious and more natural, and a slow but sure development is observable. The Romish church is the most powerful of all the Christian sects, and if not firmly opposed will place the United States in the same position as Europe during the Dark Ages. While losing ground in the Old, it appears to be concentrating its chief efforts in the New World, and will do incalculable damage if it has the power.

I wish you, your staff, and subscribers greater happiness in this than preceding years, and all success to the cause of Liberalism.

The Unfortunate Prince.

From the London Freethinker.

[During the year of grace 1888, Dr. Voelkel, the able Freethought lecturer and editor of the Neues Freireligiöses Sonntags-Blatt, Magdeburg, was tried on a charge of "indirect blasphemy, gross insult of Christian doctrin, and abuse of the Bible," contained in a tale entitled, "Der Unglückliche Erbprinz." The case was heard with closed doors, but Dr. Voelkel obtained a verdict of "Not guilty." We publish a translation of the indicted story.]

Once upon a time there was born a hereditary prince, and his name was Man. He was promised all the power and glory on earth, and was to be invested in them the day on which he would marry Princess Liberty, who was of the same age. The bringing up of Prince Man was intrusted by the Lord God to Uncle State and Aunt Church, a husband and wife who had been living in heaven from all eternity.

They were, however, a malicious uncle and a wicked aunt. They hated poor Princess Liberty, and, longing to possess all the power and glory themselvs, they would take care to prevent the Prince ever getting out of leading strings and becoming acquainted with Princess Liberty.

And a very strange affair it was. The Prince, having grown up a tall, strong lad, desired to eat roast meat and drink wine, but he was still nourished with ewe's milk. He desired to climb trees and swim through the river, but he was still swaddled like a baby; and when he kicked and complained he was threatened with the black man, or else the sugar-stick of Patience was put in his mouth.

Now, Aunt Church had engaged a maid called Science, who behaved quite submissivly, but she was really also a princess and was faithfully attached to her sister, Liberty. One day the Prince asked of her his age, and the maid told him he was many thousand years old. The malevolent aunt having heard this, the poor servant was much scolded and beaten, and shut in the dark chamber, whilst the lad, although a hereditary prince, was every day called a stupid little boy.

The good and faithful maid got weary of her sufferings. She ran from the house, and thenceforth living in the fresh air, grew very tall and pretty. At night she went secretly to the Prince, taught him to read, and told him about the wonders of the sky and many other beautiful things.

Prince Man now became aware of his strength. He tore his swaddling clothes to pieces, and although they punished him severely with the rod of the law; they could no longer restrain him. They were compelled to giv him his first breeches and allow him to walk in the garden.

"He feels his strength; we must giv him some occupation," said the malicious uncle to the wicked aunt. So they put a stripe to his breeches, and gave him a colored coat and a saber. He could now run to his heart's content against trees and rocks. And when he hit himself with his own sword and fell to the ground badly hurt Uncle State praised him, for he thought he could in this way repress the lad. But when the Prince tried to climb the wall which separated the garden from the realm of Princess Liberty, he was again forcibly put into swaddling clothes, which they wrapped so tightly that his flesh was cut, and he cried he would never do it again.

In order that he should not become too wild, and having learned to read, Aunt Church put in his hands a charm-book which makes everyone blind and lame who reads it three times. But there was a leaf in the book that contained a counter charm, and this leaf, which the bad aunt had forgotten to tear out, was read by the Prince in preference to all the other leaves in the charm-book, for it treated of love.

"I desire a sweetheart; I will marry," said Prince Man one day to the evil-minded old couple. This terrified them immensely, for they knew very well that their dominion was in danger. They sent to the chamber of the Prince, who had long been a tall, strong young man, at the same time three maids named Faith, Hope, and Charity. But though they could look devoutly toward heaven, they had neither flesh nor bones, and our Prince turned sadly away from them.

At that time it happened that the two old people often had shocking quarrels about the allowance and the jewels which by right belonged to the Prince. When they were engaged in one of these bickerings, the Prince quickly climbed up a high tree and looked over the garden wall. Ah, what did he see! The sun shining and glittering, the birds singing joyous songs on all the trees, huge blossoms exhaling wonderfully sweet perfume. And in all this glory the fair Princess Liberty was walking, her golden hair flowing about her. From her large, proud eyes a dazzling flame darted to the heart of the Prince. Sister Science touched with a magic wand the wall, making it fall with a crash. The youth leaped boldly over the ruins, embraced the Princess and kissed her, holding her closely pressed to his heart, fondly fancying they had been united forever.

But Uncle State and Aunt Church had hastened to the spot in the greatest rage, surrounded by the colossal army of priests, monks, knights, officers, jailers, and soldiers; in short, by all the detestable demons that were kept in the pay of the malicious couple for the protection of their dishonest rule.

Alas, alas, what a dreadful fight! Of what avail Prince Man's strong fists? what use was Liberty's flaming sword? From behind these legions seized the lovers, twined ropes around their bodies, stupefied their senses with vapors of incense, and with scepters broke their noble limbs.

The Prince was cast into the darkest prison chamber, and when Uncle State did not beat him with a stick, Aunt Church preached to him a sermon with much worse effect. Science, having been reduced to an abject state, entered into service again, and Liberty, bleeding and soiled with the dirt of scorn, fled far, far away, exiled, broken-hearted, dying.

Dead? No. Sometimes, in the quiet hours of the night, when Prince Man was in terrible pain and thought of his distress and misery, the nightingale would sing to him a song of Princess Liberty betrayed and sold, and the loud, sweet tones would cause his heart to melt in tears of love. And oftentimes a joyful ray of light would struggle through the prison bars and proclaim to him that Liberty was living still and would get well again—he should yet call her his own. Then his heart rejoiced; and he, in fetters, sang a proud and hopeful song of the time to come.

"That was a sad tale," said the child to whom I told it; "there is not even a wedding in it."

"Yes, my child, and much more sad because the tale is true, and has happened more than once, and will happen again and again."

"Is there no end to it?" asked the child.

"Oh, yes, for you and me. When we are in the grave, the tale is at an end." R. R.

Liberalism East and West.

From San Francisco Freethought.

The TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1889 is a publication of unusual importance. Its illustrations are good; its calendar is most valuable; its review of "Freethought in the United States, 1888," written in thunderous Gladstonian sentences, is complete and comprehensiv, if we except its failure to record the birth and growth of a Freethought journal in San Francisco; its Symposium on "Liberalism" is the greatest and best addition to Liberal literature made for many years, and the collocation entitled "Ingersoll and Shakspere" is nothing less than wonderful.

But the chief feature of the ANNUAL is the Symposium. The Editor submitted a series of fourteen questions to the leading Freethinkers of the country, and twenty-four replied. The fourteen questions cover a great deal of debatable ground, but perhaps the one the answers to which will be of the most interest to the readers of Freethought is this:

Where are the most Liberals, and in what section of the country is the best work for Liberalism being done?

Colonel Ingersoll answers as follows:

The most Liberals are in the most intelligent section of the United States. Where people think the most, you will find the most Liberals; where people think the least, you will find the most bigots. Bigotry is produced by feeling; Liberalism, by thinking—that is to say, the one is a prejudice, the other a principle.

James Parton answers none of these questions, but, as he says, merely sends the thought that came into his mind when he read them.

Charles Watts replies that according to his experience, there are most Liberals and the best work is done in Grand Rapids, Mich.; Chicago, Ill.; Philadelphia and Pittsburgh, Pa., and in Toronto and the Lower Provinces, Canada.

Capt. Robert C. Adams mentions Canada and Boston.

J. D. Shaw finds most Liberals among the reading classes.

J. H. Burnham believes that both the East and the West offer interesting fields.

Mrs. E. D. Slenker names New York and Boston as the best points for Liberalism, though not in proportion to population.

Thus three writers locate the center of Liberalism in the East, and four are non-committal. Now let us quote the seventeen others. They answer the question where the best work is being done for Liberalism in this way:

Helen Gardener: "In the West and Northwest."
S. P. Putnam: "The West."
E. A. Stevens: "In the West."
Parker Pillsbury: "In and west of New York."
F. M. Holland: "In the Northwest."
E. B. Foote, Jr.: "West of the Mississippi."
Lucy N. Colman: "The West."
L. K. Washburn: "In the Western states."
Ella E. Gibson: "In the West."
Susan H. Wixon: "In the West."
John Peck: "The grand prairies of the West."
W. S. Bell: "In the wide West."
E. C. Walker: "The Pacific coast, the territories, and Texas."
Mattie A. Freeman: "In the West."
Juliet H. Severance, M.D.: "In the West."
John R. Kelso: "I would prefer the Pacific coast."
G. H. Dawes: "North Central and Pacific states."

Out of twenty writers, therefore, who express an opinion, seventeen agree that the best work for Liberalism is being done in the West. It is certainly high praise to the workers in this section; but a few years ago, before the American Secular Union had sent its secretary through the country to lecture wherever an audience could be found, this verdict would not hav been given. Since that time, however, and especially during the past year, there is little doubt that the West has been the scene of the greater activity in Liberal work. THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Liberal Club in New York; the Investigator and L. K. Washburn in Boston; E. A. Stevens and the local Secular Union in Chicago; Charles Watts and Secular Thought in Toronto, Can.; the Pennsylvania Liberals, and others, are doing magnificent service. The lecture and newspaper work in the West has heretofore been done largely by non-residents. Now that this state of affairs is changed, still greater results may be looked for in the future.

Not a Religious Nation.

Milwaukee Evening Wisconsin.

The battle for religious liberty was fought out and settled in this country during its evolution between the landing of the Mayflower and the adoption of the federal Constitution. In that great debate the members of all denominations took an activ part, and, to their lasting credit be it said, the clergy of all shades of religious belief agreed that a purely secular government would best subserve the highest interests of the American people. The framers of the Constitution proceeded cautiously along this line, and the name of the supreme ruler of the universe is not once mentioned in the organic act. Many pious people regarded this omission as a great disgrace, and several unsuccessful efforts hav been made to hav God recognized in the fundamental law of the land. The same class of religious thinkers who would like to hav the name of deity incorporated somewhere in the Constitution would also like to hav some kind of religious instruction given in the public schools; but experience has shown that the only way to get along to the best advantage and suit the most people is to make both the government and the schools purely secular. The reason is that neither the civil government nor the public school has any interest whatever in any other life except the present, and one world is enough at a time. Religious belief is founded on faith rather than upon knowledge; and as religion mostly concerns itself with the destiny of man beyond the grave, the secular government is best adapted to deal with mankind on this side.

The fathers builded wisely therefore when they prohibited all religious tests for public officers, and drew the line on morality in founding the common school system. The state has a deep interest in having men of good moral character for citizens, and that they shall obey the laws, and neither steal, murder, nor bear false witness. The state has nothing whatever to do with saving men's souls, nor has it any means of knowing officially whether men are immortal beings or not. Hence, in this country there is no state religion, no taxes levied for the support of religion in any of its multitudinous forms, and the man who objects to being sworn is allowed to affirm.

Many of the old forms and customs are either omitted or are being modified. In some states of the Union an Atheist was once not considered a competent witness in courts of justice, and the testimony of an Infidel would not be taken in evidence in a civil suit, much less in trials for capital offenses. In other places a man could not be supposed to be telling the truth under oath if he was a disbeliever in the everlasting punishment of the wicked after death, though that dogma rests upon evidence that would be rejected by any court of justice. Formerly it was the custom to ask a witness to kiss the Bible after being sworn, and before he proceeded to giv in his testimony. The judicial oath was not considered binding unless it ended with, "So help you God."

The other day at the inauguration of Governor Hoard the venerable Chief Justice Cole omitted to say, "So help you God," when he administered the oath of office to the new executiv, but merely solemnly pledged him to do his duty to the best of his ability.

Calvary Nowhere, But to Be Moved.

Rev. Dr. Charles S. Robinson in the Century.

The only representativ site for Calvary now offered pilgrims in Jerusalem is found in a couple of rooms inside the old edifice; one is owned and exhibited by the Greeks, another by the Latins. These share the same disability; both—since the church is already so full of traditions on the ground floor—had to go up a flight of stairs into free space nearer the roof. And there it is, amidst tawdry curtains and gilt bedizenments of candles and altar-shrines, that this ancient spot upon which the cross of Jesus Christ rested is pointed out, and the veritable hole is shown in which it was planted. And the thieves' crosses—a decorous but rather inadequate distance of five feet between them on the right and left of the middle-one—are ranged alongside. And down underneath, far below, across some intervening space left by grading away the actual soil of the hill, so we are sagely told, is the grave of Adam. Tradition has related that at the crucifixion of Jesus some drops of blood fell through upon Adam's skull aud raised him suddenly to life; and there are commentators who declare that so the prophecy quoted by the apostle Paul (Eph. v, 14) was well fulfilled: "Awake, thou Adam that sleepest [for thus the former versions read in the text], and arise from the dead, for Christ shall touch thee." The art-people say that this is the origin of the fact that in those early rude representations of the death of our Lord a skull is introduced.

Can any man of sense be blamed if he makes an imperious demand that something more—something else at least—shall greet him in answer to his question, Where was our Lord crucified? If there should be no other advantage gained by the acceptance of a new site as now proposed, this would be enough; it would put an end to the awkward and offensiv impostures daily exhibited under the roof of that filthy old church. They are a standing mockery of the claims of the Christianity they profess to uphold. Those ceremonies of Easter at the tomb where our Lord is declared to hav been buried are a caricature of an event so glad and holy. The struggle around the flames that are chemically forced out of the smoky hold in the sepulcher, so that devotees in frantic zeal may light their lamps, brings death from the trampling of thousands, fills the house with howls that put heathenism to shame, and sends true believers away with infinit disgust and horror deep in their hearts. How long must such a scandal be patiently endured?

A Methodist Episcopal Opinion.

From the Enterprise, Kan., Independent, M. K. DeMotte, Editor.

A few days since a young man sent us a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER, one of the most bitter and unreasonable opponents of Christianity published by an Infidel press. It was marked through and through, showing careful and critical reading. Even the book notices had been marked to indicate that they had not been overlooked, or possibly to indicate that the books had been ordered. In addition to the paper there was a bundle of tracts of the Valley Falls style of Freethought. We are pained to see a young man who ought to be a noble support to everything good and true, compass sea and land to convince himself that he has no soul; that Christianity is a farce, and that after all he is only a brute. Not that we question the right of man to thoughtfully consider the claims of Christianity. This is right. The Bible courts the most critical inquiry, and the religion it teaches has stood the severest tests for centuries. But such literature as THE TRUTH SEEKER is more dangerous than the most vicious dime novel, or the vilest obscenity that ever came from the press. Young man, let that stuff alone! Your mother's religion, the religion which sustained her through life's fiercest conflicts, which brought light and comfort to her in the hour of death, that religion will carry you safely through storm and tempest. Without it you are like a ship without a rudder, or you are billow-tossed in darkness which can be felt, with no compass to guide you. You may laugh at the suggestion, but there will dawn a day when you will reach out a trembling hand for something to sustain you, and the religion of Jesus Christ will be a diadem of precious brilliancy and value just beyond your reach. For as you seek to seize it your doubts will come in and dash the sparkling jewel from you. Be careful how you trifle with your faith in God's word. You may see many things you don't understand, many things you cannot know, but rest assured the simplicity which takes the Bible for God's revealed truth is priceless in comparison with your boasted independence which ridicules its grandeur and beauty. You'll see the day—or night—when one ray of simple faith in the Bible would be worth a whole volume of Infidelity, and you'd giv anything to hav your mother's hope of heaven.

A Most Excellent Policy.

From the Investigator.

To Whom It May Concern: Ever since our management of the Investigator, we hav endeavored to keep it clear of personal attacks or quarrels, believing that this was the best course for us to pursue. We hav never had, in all our long work of fifty years, and amid exciting times, but one personal quarrel or wrangle in the paper, and that was not of our choosing, for we were dragged into it and came out of it unhurt, but as we hav no desire to hav another we prefer a peaceful disposition and quiet nerves for the rest of our days.

We will fight bigotry, superstition, priestcraft, tyranny, and intolerance until our last breath, and longer—if we can. Yet as our warfare is against doctrins and principles rather than men, we shall always hav room for the former, but never for the latter. Questions of public interest are of course admissible in a newspaper, but personal disputes should be settled privately.

Sound Judgments.

The TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1889 is one of the best literary productions ever placed before the public, being filled with useful information and interesting reading. The price is twenty-five cents, postpaid.

From the Workmen's Advocate.

Unusually interesting this year. The main feature of the ANNUAL is a Symposium on Liberalism, contributed by twenty-four leading American Freethinkers.

The Blair Bill.

Mr. Samuel R. Wetherill, of Jobstown, N. J., writes:

"I am getting up petitions through this county against the Blair bill in the Senate. I copied it from THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 12th, and shall send them to Hon. John R. McPherson, senator from New Jersey. When would be the best time to forward them to him? Please answer and let me know what you think about it."

The best time to send these petitions is to-day, to-morrow, and every day thereafter, until the last shall hav been heard of this bigot's bill.

The Sabbath Union has had space for a department presented to it by pious Shepard of the Mail and Express, and in that organ of last Saturday Wilbur F. Crafts, field secretary of the Union, wrote:

"The great fourteen-million petition was yesterday presented in the Senate, and made an impressiv spectacle. It is desirable that the snowstorm of letters and petitions shall fall upon the desk of every senator every day until the Sunday law is passed."

That shows what the Christians are doing to enslave us. Let the snowstorm of counter petitions be as heavy as the fall which would smother liberty.

The Fight in Chicago.

In the Secular Union department will be found the injunction granted by Judge Horton restraining the Board of Commissioners of Cook county, Illinois, from paying any more money to the Roman Catholic institution called St. Mary's Training School.

The importance of this result of the application of the Secretary of the Union cannot be overestimated. It is a victory at the threshold of a struggle gigantic in dimensions and far-reaching as the existence of the American republic. Catholicism is rampant all over the country. It is entrenched in custom and statute. It controls majorities in votes. It puts its men in office and they giv it millions of dollars. In our large cities it has its grasp on all municipal departments. It prescribes the studies and the methods of studies of the school children. It has its men in the tax department. It selects juries and it appoints judges. It exacts pledges from politicians and demands compliance with its wishes. It has forced presidents to flatter popes. Its shadow is over all; its cunning hand is in all the trades and dickers of lawmakers. It makes and unmakes senators, assemblymen, and aldermen. Its purpose for its own aggrandizement is constant and unrelenting. Men come and go, but the Roman machine goes on unceasingly. Its aim is to control the people and the people's government—to subordinate the state to the church—to tax the people for its own benefit—to build itself legal fortresses from which it can never be dislodged. In Boston it has received a temporary setback. In New York it has won a huge victory, and won it quietly through the greed of our politicians and the blindness of the voters. In the West—in Iowa, in Wisconsin, in Minnesota, in Kansas, Nebraska, and Colorado—it controls whole sections of the country. In isolated towns in other states it has ruined the schools and grabbed the reins of secular government. Thousands of parochial schools hav been established within the past four years. In these institutions of ignorance children are taught that their first duty is toward God or the church and second to the state. It teaches that Rome is supreme in all matters of faith and morals, and in the first it puts all social relations and the right to think; in the second, all political matters and the right to vote. Over all—over every act of life, even of death—the church claims to be an infallible ruler, guiding, controling, using all for her own unalterable purpose of subjugating a New World to replace the Old she has lost.

Rome's methods are known to all, and the St. Mary's Training School is but one of hundreds of similar institutions which Rome conducts for her own business and which she makes the people at large pay for. For years the country has paid the expenses of this school, the church first getting laws giving her so much per month for each child supported, and then getting the children by legal hook and crook, through poverty of parents and favoritism of judges who owe, perhaps, their office to Catholic votes or influence. This year the officers foresaw no trouble in renewing the contract, and the County Commissioners were equally willing. The officers of the school proposed that the county should pay them eight dollars per month for small boys, seven dollars for large boys, and nine for cripples, in addition to what the institution could make from the boys' labor. But the Secular Union had its eye on them and their purpose. The supreme court had decided that institutions of this sort are sectarian within the meaning of the section of the Illinois constitution which prohibits counties from granting money to sectarian schools, and egged on by Secretary Stevens District-Attorney Bliss had prevented some twenty thousand dollars from going to a similar institution. No decision had been made against St. Mary's school, and no one but the Liberals seemed disposed to question its right to the county's money. Mr. Stevens, therefore, sought the injunction, basing his plea on the decision of the supreme court. It was a hard fight, but he won, and until other courts overrule Judge Horton, St. Mary's Training School will get no public money to pay for the manufacture of Catholics.

In a personal letter, Mr. Stevens describes his experience in the courts. "We went," he says, "to Master after Master in chancery, and some of them would hardly look at the papers. If anyone wants to know the power of Romanism in Chicago, let him try to get out an injunction against the church. He will find that most lawyers will shrink and shrivel up into miserable specimens of manhood." This is to be expected. There is nothing the average lawyer so hates as a case with religion in it. They are afraid of it. Custom has made cowards of them all. It takes a brave man to stand up against prejudice of any sort, and religious prejudice is the most bitter of all malignant passions. And for attacking Rome, lawyers know that somehow they will be punished. If they hav political aspirations she will take her revenge at the polls. If they practice in civil courts, she will through her judges hamper them and make them lose cases and clients. Lawyers, therefore, are shy of such cases, and electiv judges are absolutely frightened by them. All honor to Judge Horton for his manly independence.

This case is probably not settled yet. The principle of state subsidy to religious schools is too valuable for the church to giv it up without a great war. She has unlimited money, and enormous influence. St. Mary's School is but one among dozens in Illinois which would lose thousands of dollars annually. The legal fight, therefore, is not ended, and Secretary Stevens needs the moral encouragement and financial backing of the Liberals of the country. This is a national question, and citizens of all states are equally interested, for if Illinois can be redeemed from the clutches of Rome, the prospects for other states are brighter. The power of Rome must be broken, and to do it completely and effectually it must be done by Liberals. Protestants will but substitute their own faith for that of Rome, and if they drive Rome out of the state treasuries it is that there may be but the more for themselvs to steal.

Blasphemy in New Jersey.

In the unique blasphemy laws of New Jersey is this section: "All impostors in religion, such as personate our savior, Jesus Christ, or suffer their followers to worship or pay them divine honors, or terrify, delude, or abuse the people by false denunciations of judgments, shall, on conviction, be punished for every such offense by a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars, or imprisonment not exceeding three months, or both."

In the spring of 1887 a man calling himself Rev. Henry M. Mnason, but whose real name is Mnason Huntsman, put in an appearance at Park Ridge, and with Rev. Samuel H. Switzer, another crank, started a revival meeting. Huntsman is a crazy Christian, like Greenslade who calls himself Lewis the Light, and who has just been sent to the insane asylum by the New York authorities. Huntsman imagined himself endowed with the divine spirit, whatever that is, and likened himself to Jesus Christ. He obtained great influence over other fanatics whose minds were prepared by an ignorant but honest belief in the Bible to welcome another messiah, and these followers transferred to Huntsman some portion of their idolatrous regard for Jesus Christ. Huntsman also threatened the inhabitants of Park Ridge with the vengeance of God, called them all the opprobrious names hurled at the Pharisees by his prototype Jesus—hypocrits, vipers, serpents, etc.—told the ministers that they were blind guides, making their proselytes twofold more children of hell than themselvs, and consigned all the Park Ridgeians, preachers and people, to perdition.

According to the New Testament Mr. Huntsman was probably right, for the New Jerseyites are the kind of Christians who "do all their works for to be seen of men," making broad their phylacteries and enlarging the borders of their garments, but within full of extortion and excess. But they do not like to be told of it, and their mirrored selvs are to them like the visions of the inebriate. So they told Mr. Huntsman to depart from among them, which had the effect only of making that follower of Christ more emphatic in his preaching. Then one of the Park Ridgeians visited the revival tent and knocked both preachers down. Mobs also gathered round the canvas tabernacle, stoning it as the crowd did Peter, and making threats to lynch the preacher. Mr. Switzer deserted Huntsman, and the latter was left alone. He was visited at his boarding-house, cowhided, his beard and hair shaved close, and conducted to the railroad station with an invitation to make himself hard to find. He came to this city, but could not giv up his mission to the New Jerseyites, whom he regards as the direct descendants of the scribes and Pharisees who once sat in Moses's seat, and whom Jesus verbally chastised in the same language that Huntsman applied to the Park Ridgeians, He returned to New Jersey, setting up his tent at Phillipsburg, and held meetings, talking to the multitude and to his disciples, who comprised two women and one man. He and his apostles were arrested, and the women were sent to jail, the male apostle and himself escaping. The Phillipsburg rulers sent word to the chief priests and elders of Park Ridge to arrest him if he appeared there, which he did a few days later, when his old partner Switzer proved traitor as well as deserter, and with the help of his son tied Huntsman to a fence, and sent for a constable with a stave. The constable said he could not lay hold on him without a warrant, and he was allowed to go his way. Subsequently, however, a Phillipsburg detectiv found him and took him to Belvedere, where the elders sat, and put him in jail to await the action of the grand jury.

On January 5th the jury indicted him, saying that he had spoken blasphemy; what further need hav we of witnesses? and cited the statute. Huntsman was clearly an impostor in religion, and he had deluded, abused, and terrified the people by false denunciations of judgments. On the 17th a petit jury agreed with the grand jury, and the next day the court sentenced him to six months in jail, and to pay a fine of one hundred dollars and costs of prosecution. If the clerk of that court swells out the fees as the clerk of the Morristown court did in the prosecution of C. B. Reynolds, the latter item will be expensiv to Mr. Huntsman.

No doubt the New Jerseyites need this statute for protection, for the temptation to tell them the truth about themselvs is almost irresistible to a visitor in their state. A fair sample of the nativs of that commonwealth is an old farmer we once encountered, who wanted seven dollars for hitching his horses in front of another team and helping pull a load up two rods of hill. He was the fellow whom Jesus had in view when he said some men were full of extortion and excess. But we question the wisdom of calling attention to their peculiarities by such methods as prosecutions of crazy Christians. The Bible is directly responsible for Huntsman's mental condition, and his being lodged in jail for closely following the ways of Jesus only emphasizes the absurdity of founding a religion upon the wild oratory of that irresponsible individual. How do the elders and rulers of Phillipsburg know that Christ's denunciation of judgment was not as false as they presumed Huntsman's to be? And why hold an everlasting hatred against the Jews for doing in a more or less barbaric age precisely what they do who hav all the advantages of civilization to enlighten them? The Jews had the same proof, and no more—namely, his assertion—that Jesus was the authorized messiah, that the New Jersey folks hav that Huntsman is the son of God. Why blame the Jews, therefore, for doing what they hav done themselvs? The Freethinkers who do not believe in crazy saviors are the only ones who can consistently censure the Jews, and must equally censure the New Jerseyites. The best way to treat such ranting nuisances is to let them alone. No one is compelled to attend a revival meeting against his own will, and Mr. Huntsman's declaration that some gentlemen in Park Ridge or Phillipsburg were bound for hell does not necessarily consign them to that region, though it might possibly arouse the latent feeling in their own bosoms that that is about what they deserve.

On the whole, by this prosecution, the New Jersey Christians hav fairly earned the cap and bells, as by their previous prosecution of a heretic they had made good their title to the champion bigots of that year.

The Baptists.

Mr. Edson Smith, of Santa Ana, Cal., writes that some of the Baptists in his neighborhood "claim that they never came out from the Catholic church, but are a directly descended organization from the days of the apostles." Mr. Smith adds that he knows not how to combat these assertions, and asks for information.

We fail to see that the burden of proof is on Mr. Smith. If the Baptists make assertions, let them prove their truth. Let them find some reliable historical account of the existence of any body of Christians previous to the Reformation holding the doctrins of the Baptists, or, as they were first called, Anabaptists. The Baptists were not organized till after Luther had been excommunicated, and are not known as a church till after 1520. The Reformation, of course, was a long time forming, and was not a sudden and instantaneous revolt against the Roman church, and many people for many years before Luther's apostasy held all sorts of notions differing from the orthodox religion—among them Luther's to-be followers, and the Waldenses, Albigenses, etc.—and it is presumable that there were isolated persons holding substantially the Anabaptist faith some score or so of years before the revolt, but there were no churches, and it is certain that no trace of Anabaptism can be found very long anterior to the sect persecuted alike by Lutherans and Catholics. If such trace can be found, it behooves the Baptists of Santa Ana to reveal it.

The Anabaptists of the sixteenth century were regarded as a bad sect, but unjustly. They were cruelly persecuted all over Europe, and hundreds of thousands of them paid the penalty of their independence with their lives. In this country, their record is about the most honorable of any sect. Roger Williams, who introduced the doctrin into the Colonies, denied the right of the church to control in civil matters, and for his independence had to leave Massachusetts, which resulted in the formation of what is now the state of Rhode Island. From Rhode Island the Baptists wandered to Virginia and New York, meeting in both states with persecution from their Christian brethren. The Revolution, however, afforded the other Christians some one else to fight, and the Baptists had their first respit and church recognition. After the war, recollecting the injustice which they had suffered, they strenuously fought in the nation's councils for separation of church and state, and we owe to them a share of the admiration Liberals giv those of our forefathers who secured in the national charter the declaration that the national government shall never establish religion.

We hav no wish to deprive the Baptists of any credit due them, and if they could find Baptists scattered all through the centuries from 1889 to the year 1, and from America to Jerusalem, we should not care to rob them of such ancestral glory. Neither would such establishment of their antiquity attest a whit to the truth of their peculiar theology. But the fact is that the Anabaptists and Baptists must find their primeval ancestor somewhere near the year 1500, and submit their doctrins to the court of reason, like other bodies of religionists. That they hav always contended for a separation of state and church is to their honor, but their contempt for learning, and their blind adherence to a childish faith, must inevitably lessen our respect for their theological and historical claims.

"Thou Shalt Not Steal."

The city of New York owns a block of land between 81st and 82d streets and Madison and Park avenues. The ground is occupied by the St. Joseph's Industrial Home and the Church of the Redeemer, Episcopal. These organizations hold the ground under a license from the Common Council, by paying one dollar per year ground rent. The Catholic institution has the larger portion of the block, the Church of the Redeemer having only eight lots. Two years ago the latter society began the erection of an edifice. The officers of the city, stirred up by Mayor Hewitt, began to investigate the lease, and finally decided that if the church was to be built the ground must be paid for, and the price set was $675,000.

Last week the matter came up before the Sinking Fund Commission, in the shape of a protest against the price from the church officers. The protest recites that once upon a time (before the Catholics controled the city so completely) churches were forced to pay assessments for street improvements, which assessments had so depleted the treasury of the Church of the Redeemer that the ground it then owned had to be given up. Afterward the city allowed the church to use the lots now in controversy. The protest further states, which is obviously untrue, that the charities of the church are such as to relieve the Department of Charities and Correction of expenditures more than enough to make a reasonable ground rent, and that the establishment of the church enhanced the value of property in the neighborhood.

The protest then leaves the broad ground of the rightfulness of general stealing from the public treasuries by any Christian church and pursues the narrow path of sectarianism. It charges, in brief, that the Roman Catholics are getting all the booty, leaving the Church of the Redeemer with nothing. And incidentally its protest shows that our Hebrew fellow-citizens are not above a little quiet robbery of public property. The document sets forth:

"If the city is in need of its real estate, how is it that a certain Hebrew society continues to hold, in direct violation of its license, a large part of the city property in 77th street between Lexington avenue and Third avenue, upon which are erected buildings which are used for purposes quite foreign to any charitable or benevolent object?

"It is a hardship under the circumstances, and after undisturbed possession of the property for twenty-four years, to be forced to purchase it at any price, especially when the balance of the entire square, which is also owned by the city, bounded by 81st street, Madison avenue, 82d street, and Park avenue, is now occupied by a Roman Catholic institution which never paid a cent to the city for it, which is a nuisance to the neighborhood, and which receives from the state $110 per capita per annum for its inmates. Said Roman Catholic institution was licensed to occupy its premises shortly after we were granted license or permission to occupy ours, and instead of trusting implicitly in the faith and the fair dealing of the city and its officials, as we did, they, metaphorically speaking, took the city by the throat and forced it to sign a lease for ninety-nine years at a legal nothing, viz., $1 per annum rental. They remain encouraged and undisturbed in possession, while we, at their instigation, are to be evicted, in order that they may enlarge their buildings over the ground we are forced to vacate. Such religious persecution in the interest of the Roman Catholic church should not be tolerated in a great city like New York and in this enlightened age.

"Upon what basis of law or equity does the city make a proviso in the proposed sale of the property to the Church of the Redeemer that the deed from the city is to provide against encroachment by any obstruction upon the light and air space between the church and the adjacent buildings occupied by the Sisters of Mercy as the St. Joseph's Industrial Home? Has not that institution sufficient light and air on three sides of an entire city block without placing an embargo upon a few feet of adjacent land at the northeast end of the large building? Why should they be protected more than we? They are an expense to the city and state; we are not.

"It is financially impossible for us to pay $675,000 for the property. It is not worth it, with its surroundings; but, inasmuch as the foundation of the new church is laid, we are willing to purchase the eight lots for $60,000, said amount to remain upon bond and mortgage at four per cent per annum for ten years, and without any restrictions in the deed of sale. This is all we are able to do, and, under the circumstances, it is far in excess of the price that we should be forced to pay."

We fail to see any great difference between the Church of the Redeemer, the St. Joseph's Industrial Home, and the Hebrew Society. It is on the part of all of them simply a scramble for property to which they hav no shadow of right, and the occupation of which by them is nothing but robbery of the public. The Catholics hav grabbed all they can, the Hebrews hav done the same, and the Church of the Redeemer is only in the position of a thief who objects to restoring his plunder. The city officials say the ground is worth $675,000, while our Episcopalian marauders think they should hav it for $60,000. The margin is so wide that the transaction ceases to be business and becomes a "charity" where the beggar holds his patron down, and makes him giv up money which is not his.

There is and can never be but one way of finally settling these church quarrels and stealings. That is for every church to pay for its property, and pay its taxes on that property. The officials who gave the block of land to the church ought to hav been sent to the penitentiary for malfeasance in office. They misused their power as much as any other member of the old Tammany gang who robbed this city for years, and whose leader finally died in the prison where he was sent for his crimes. Those were great days for the churches, especially the Catholic institutions, and they improved them like the busiest of busy bees. If some of their honey is now taken from them, they can hav no just cause of complaint. They hav subsisted on stolen goods long enough.

Some of the East African nativs recently attacked a missionary station, captured it, and sold the preachers into slavery. This is carrying opposition to Christianity too far.

In The Truth Seeker of the 12th inst., in acknowledging the receipt of Braden's account of the Eugene City "debate" between him and Mr. Underwood, we said, "We presume there is not a statement made which is not either a falsehood or a fact distorted," though we did really hope that the statement that Mr. Underwood called him "an unmitigated liar and unprincipled scoundrel" was true. We find now, on receiving Freethought, containing an account of the same meeting, that our presumption was true. Braden cannot tell the truth in detail, though stating a general fact. Mr. Underwood did not call him an unmitigated liar and unprincipled scoundrel. He merely stated that Braden was a "mean vilifier and an infamous liar." As we like to giv reverend gentlemen all the credit due them, we make the correction.

We begin to hav a suspicion that the Symposium in the Truth Seeker Annual is not all that our editorial fancy painted it. We had reckoned it to be sound Liberalism, but perhaps it may turn out to be false doctrin. From the use our contemporaries make of it, it seems to be a kind of a Bible in which all find texts and statements supporting their previously formed views of Liberal things. E. C. Walker first counted up the Prohibition texts, and found that the weight of authority was on his side and against the Prohibitionists. Now Freethought uses the Symposium to show that the West is the great civilized district of the country, and that we of the East, consequently, are living in semi-barbaric or Christian darkness. We suppose our related contemporary found this to be so because San Francisco and thereabouts is the last place on the earth looking west. The next editor who dives into that Symposium will also undoubtedly find what he is looking for, and we may yet hav sects in Liberalism, all believing in the Symposium because of the full discovery it makes of the way of man's salvation from the church, the brilliancy of the matter, the efficacy of the doctrin, the majesty of the style, the consent of all the parts, the scope of the whole, the many other incomparable excellences, and the entire perfection thereof, as the "Confession of Faith" has it, yet differing from one another because all things in scripture, to follow the "Confession's" train of thought, are not alike clear unto all, and so we shall hav the original Symposiasts, the free will Symposiasts, the close communion Symposiasts, and other Symposiast sects, some repudiating the vain talk of the Infidel Pelagians and some upholding the good old doctrin that what is writ goes regardless of the commentators. If these suspicions should be well founded the regret of the Editor will be not less keen than the grief of Jeremiah. He will need a "head of waters" big enough to run a saw-mill.

Letters from Friends.

ALHAMBRA, ILL., Dec. 21, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. George H. Dawes, of Pittsville, Wis., has just closed a course of Infidel lectures in our town, and I take pleasure in recommending him through your columns to the public as an interesting, pleasing, and instructing lecturer, using neither sarcasm, wit, nor ridicule, but confining himself strictly to his propositions and lucidly illustrating and demonstrating them to a certainty. HENRY SHARP.

BARRE, MASS., Dec. 28, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I only write to thank you for a copy of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, received last week, and say a word in praise of the neat, impressiv volume; and, further, to add that no TRUTH SEEKER subscriber or Freethinker can afford to do without the present issue, for reasons given in your advertisment. I will do my best to promote its circulation.

Respectfully, ELLA E. GIBSON.

ANGOLA, IND., Dec. 24, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed twenty-five cents, for which send me the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. I hav taken it since the first issue, and liked each one very much, and therefore I wish to hav the present issue. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER; hav taken it ever since the first issue in New York city. I like Heston's pictures very well. I think they are opening the eyes of many persons, and making them think for themselvs. DR. J. H. MOORE.

HANNIBAL, MO., Dec. 28, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Mrs. Mary G. Willis, a lifelong Agnostic, passed away on the 25th day of December, 1888. Apoplexy did its work, at her advanced age of seventy-six years, well spent for Freethought. She was an old citizen of Hannibal, Mo., respected by everybody, regardless of creed. Her body was consigned to the tomb. President Dr. A. R. Ayres of the Brotherhood of Agnostic Moralists conducted the ceremonies at the house and grave in his usual dignified manner.

F. H. RAU.

BLOOK, KAN., Dec. 24, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I think there are many good writers for your valuable paper. I like to read a paper where everyone has his say. We ought to put in our work where it will do the most good, and not quarrel among ourselvs. Liberals, Spiritualists, and everyone that is Liberally inclined, ought to fight the church in some way that would count. I think W. F. Jamieson's ideas, December 22d, good. He is one of our best thinkers. MRS. M. D. LOWE.

CALHOUN, ARK., Dec. 11, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1.50 to pay for one of the best of papers, the fearless TRUTH SEEKER, for six months. I wish to say that I think we hav the most intelligent lady correspondents in our ranks of any society. And I think Col. R. G. Ingersoll the greatest man in this or any other age. You may think that rather extravagant language. Well, I can't help it.

The Democrats are taking their defeat in the South very mildly. Yours, JOHN H. HASLAM.

LEBO, KAN., Dec. 22, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: W. S. Bell has been with us and gone. He gave us his popular lecture, "Liberty and Morality," on the 20th. A special effort was made by church sympathizers to prevent the attendance of many, on account of the bad effect which might be produced upon the great revival effort which has been going on for several weeks. The attendance was small, but Mr. Bell gave us the lecture all the same, and many wondered and regretted that so few should be there to hear it. W. H. PENFIELD.

MOTOR, KAN., Dec. 18, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: You may always count on me as a subscriber, and also a paying one, if we do not starve out, out here in western Kansas. It is now dryer than Gilboa ever was. It has not rained or snowed for six months, and things look gloomy. I say this to warn Freethinkers not to come here, if they do not want to see hard times, as I hav tried this country for sixteen years and know of what I speak. Inclosed please find $5—$3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER; $1 for "Men, Women, and Gods;" fifty cents for Father Hacker; twenty-five cents for the FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC; twenty-five cents for Casey dime fund. H. WADE.

QUINCY, ILL., Dec. 24, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Your ANNUAL for 1888 has been the cause of many a good, hearty laugh in my family, and so I want your ANNUAL for 1889, for which I inclose you twenty-five cents. Your Illustrated Bible Stories answer some questions to perfection. One I must note as being beyond all praise: "Where was Moses when the light went out?" This has been a subject of contention for years among the darkly shining lights of biblical knowledge, and for it to be solved at last by an unbeliever is a stunner not to be forgiven in this world or the world to come—a simon-pure mortal sin against the ghost. Yours in the unfaith, JOHN L. MOORE.

BOND, KAN., Dec. 11, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: It seems as though Liberals with plenty of means at hand should support at least one Liberal paper, but they do not. There are thousands of men who are Radical Infidels who will not admit the necessity of a Liberal press or Liberal agitation. These men, if the church should ascend to power and dethrone Uncle Sam, and begin to turn on the screws, would be the first to complain. They will then bitterly denounce the Liberal press for not being able to swim and carry them. They expect a diamond to shine after being covered with generations of dust which they refused to remove.

Liberals are too conservativ. They refuse to organize. They will not maintain the simplest and best method of organization, the press. They will sit still with arms folded and see ignorant and bigoted cranks deprive their fellow-citizens of their property, their liberty, yes, even their lives, for no other offense than the exercise of their rights.

F. O. HELLSTROM.

GREENVILLE, MICH., Dec. 23, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $5.25 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and a TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL.

My home is the home of a Freethinker. On the many questions of religion I ask no advice of ancient Rome. I am glad that the American Secular Union is activ. Gospel bigots are altogether too numerous. They shadow the path of the people with gloom, and consume their earnings. All they do in return for their salary is to talk hell, and spout fire like so many dragons. Probably they enjoy the price. Do not let us be inactiv, but let us make a desperate scramble for the truth. Sincerely, JOSEPH BURGESS.

FOREST, ONT., CAN., Dec. 23, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I will try to help "Constant Reader" of December 1st, and also Ella E. Gibson, of December 15th, out of their trouble with the Tribune puzzle. "Constant Reader" says, twenty-eight. Ella E. Gibson says, forty-two. I say, twenty-four, because it takes each hen a day and a half to lay one egg; one hen would lay four eggs in six days; six hens in six days twenty-four eggs, and as it takes a day and a half for each hen to lay one egg, they could not possibly lay an egg in one day, and as no doubt they were good Christian hens they rested on the seventh day. S. C. MALLERY.

HAZEN, ARK., Dec. 21, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: "Constant Reader's" hen-and-egg problem in THE TRUTH SEEKER does not seem to be a hard one, as every mathematical rule applied givs twenty-eight eggs. If a hen and a half lay an egg and a half in a day and a half, then three hens would lay three eggs in a day and a half; six hens would lay six eggs in a day and a half; six hens would lay four eggs in one day; one hen would lay two-thirds of an egg in one day; six hens would lay two eggs in a half day, and the result will be twenty-eight eggs in seven days. The hens multiplied by the days, divided by the number of eggs that one hen lays in a day, givs twenty-eight eggs. The above must be right, unless there is something in the statement that we hav overlooked. T. G. STICKELL.

WHITELAND, IND., Dec. 17, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: My subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER began with the first letter of the Humphrey-Bennett debate, and I hav been a constant reader of its pages ever since. And it would now be like parting from an old friend to giv it up. Why are not more such debates as the Humphrey-Bennett discussion published in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER now? I don't think you could publish anything more instructiv, or that would be more likely to arouse a spirit of investigation. And I further believe that such discussions would be a great inducement to church-members to read THE TRUTH SEEKER. And when once started in the road of investigation you know where they will be led to—Infidelity. Yours truly, S. E. BREWER.

PORTLAND, ORE., Dec. 19, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The great trouble with most Freethinkers is that they are afraid to speak out and show their colors. They act as though it was a disgrace to be one, just because the church people say so. Let all Liberal-minded folks not be afraid to let others know what their ideas are, and there would soon be a goodly company of them, and numbers would giv confidence and strength to carry on the good work of Secularism.

I don't believe in a six-year term for the president.

I think J. R. Perry got a little excited over the circular sent to him that he mentioned in his letter of November 27th.

I see more reason to believe in Materialism than Spiritualism, mud or no mud.

In answer to the egg question, I should say they laid twenty-eight eggs. C. W. SAUNDERS.

CATHLAMET, W. T., Dec. 19, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: We hav sent you two new subscribers, two of the best men of our little county.

We were at Stella with Brother Putnam last Saturday night, where we had an enjoyable time. Mr. Putnam sold three or four dollars' worth of literature. We could not stay to the last two lectures, so with "Good-byes" we separated. I must tell a joke on Samuel Putnam. On his other trip he was taken for the father of your humble servant; which I considered highly complimentary. Do not know what view he took of the matter.

Freethought is growing gradually; and we are of good cheer. Hoping you will hav a merry Christmas and prosperous New Year, with hosts of new subscribers, we are,

Yours, etc., MR. AND MRS. S. F. ALBERT.

BALLSTON SPA, N. Y., Dec. 24, E.M. 288.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3.75 for my subscription to the best Infidel paper in the world and three TRUTH SEEKER ANNUALS. Please send one to me, one to Mr. L. Garlick, and one to Mr. J. Allen, of this place. I hav done my best to get some subscribers, but it seems to me that this three-headed monstrosity the Christians hav in the sky has the inside track. But I will never say die while there is a shot in the locker, but will try to dispel the cloud of godly fear that hangs over the minds of the dupes of the so-called Christian church. Oh, how the gospel-pounders do hav their poor fools by the throat! But if I can get a few of them to take THE TRUTH SEEKER, their chains will fall off as did mine, and they will be free. May the day soon come when all the gods, devils, and saviors will be remembered no more, and Science, Reason, and Humanity reign supreme.

Yours for all that is good and true,

WM. THORPE, WIFE, AND FAMILY.

HANOVERTON, O., Dec. 18, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav not failed to mention THE TRUTH SEEKER to my friends, at the same time urging them to support it, but thus far without success; which condition of things may be attributed to the existence of three gospel-mills in our village, which, though almost petrified, still retain sufficient life to make an effort to injure in some way all whom they cannot control.

I like THE TRUTH SEEKER because all classes of thinkers are accorded a hearing without prejudice, which is certainly the most important feature of a Liberal paper.

The pictures furnished by Mr. Heston are a valuable feature of the paper, for which I almost feel like thanking him personally. But, above all else, I approve the paper for the courage with which it opposes the curse of popery, as no thinking man can fail to observe that priest, poverty, and pestilence go hand in hand to prepare the conditions for an increase of vice and criminality, on which this monster fattens and flourishes.

In short, I look upon THE TRUTH SEEKER as an educator which I cannot afford to do without so long as I can secure the means to pay for it. Accordingly you will find inclosed money order for $5.10, for which please continue my paper for one year, and send the following publications: "The Story Hour," for the children; Oswald's "Secret of the East," for myself, and for the remaining ten cents Putnam's poem, "Why Don't He Lend a Hand?" for my wife.

With best wishes for the continued prosperity of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I am, Yours for U. M. L.,

W. H. KINTNER.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., Dec. 23, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The Young Men's Christian Association has resorted to intimidation, or a silent threat to boycott. They canvass a city to see how folks stand on the goose question, as it were, and of course the timid become frightened, and it is hard for them to find one with backbone enough, one with self-respect enough, one with firmness enough, one that is honest enough with himself, one with dignity enough, to tell these goody-goody young men that he is what Christians term an Infidel, but all cringe, crawl, and crawfish to these "nice young men." Two of these young men of Salina refused to buy books of me because I was an Infidel, and told me they did not want to be bothered with me on that account, but still I make the best success of any agent in the same field.

Everybody can see the danger to morals and to liberty from this powerful organization. Then up and be doing. Better do too much work than not enough. What care they for a few Liberals unorganized and without leaders? They are trying to cut off the most influential men in the United States from even as much as whimpering on the subject, so it behooves every individual Liberal to take it upon himself to spread Liberalism in every conceivable way, because churches will hav a very great influence on the incoming administration, and if you would retain your liberty you must recollect that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," and make the opposition so strong that no hypocritical lawmaker will dare to make such a step as the God-in-the-Constitution party will want them to do. I suggest that all Liberals send copies of the local papers they are taking to the editors of Liberal papers for the purpose of procuring names from them to send sample copies to, also send in the names of all you can recollect, and their addresses, for the same purpose, and giv out every Liberal paper after you hav read it. Do not allow one of them to get torn up, but send them out on missionary errands, and you will be surprised how much good you can accomplish. I hav been giving out mine, and the whole neighborhood, nearly, has been Liberalized. Quite a number hav signified their intention of becoming subscribers when I renew my subscription. There are three at Niles and one, I guess, at Calvert that hav become subscribers by my giving out my papers. At least, such is the fact about the first-mentioned place. A Mr. Olds, one of them, said so. JOHN W. ABBOTT.

ST. JOHNS, ILL., Dec. 24, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: After many months of absence from your invaluable paper, I pen a few thoughts. Early last spring I wrote a lengthy letter intended for your paper. In it I had the second time referred to the (as I thought) uncalled-for criticisms of the life and Liberal work of our worthy pioneer hero J. H. Hacker, by Brother Gunther, who professes to be a Liberal and no doubt conscientiously believes himself one. But alas! I wish to remind the reader that conscience is not a true guide by any means. I do not deny that it is the best we hav, but it is often very much at fault. I doubt not (according to the story, if true) that St. Paul was as conscientious when he held the clothes of those murderers who stoned Stephen to death as at any time after his conversion to Christianity—notably when he said, "But I suffer not a woman to teach nor usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence;" a positiv proof of the defects of conscience. Excuse the flight of the imagination, which has seemingly led me off my subject. Anyway, just before I got my article referred to above ready to send for publication I got a letter from old Brother Hacker. After reading its contents, of itself pathetic, and in addition looking on the lines penned by the trembling hand of one who had before those eyes of mine, which are now dimmed by age, stood in the front of battle and manfully fought with tongue and pen for the freedom I and other Liberals are enjoying at so much less danger and cost, my sensibilities were in a condition, as I thought, unfit to do justice to the subject. Consequently I did not forward my letter. I am sometimes confronted with the assertion from my Christian disputants, "Oh, you Infidels differ as much as we do." Also, "Some Infidels if they had power would persecute others for opinion as much as Christians do." In sorrow I am compelled to admit that the truth of the statement applies to many claiming to be Liberals. To me it is easy to see the cause of all this. We can plainly see a similar defect in many otherwise noble characters. For illustration see the manner and mode of those who protested against Catholicism. At first they only eliminated a few of the most silly and absurd doctrins of the mother church. In like manner many who think they are Liberal hav hardly succeeded in breaking the spell of dogmatism. For instance, we see how our friend Knott in the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER speaks of our able and worthy McArthur and the noble Burr family.

I will now get on to a subject more pleasing, and healthy to our mental constitutions. Inclosed you will find $6.50, $3.25 for my renewal another year and the ANNUAL. Also $3.25 for Mr. Thomas Goddard another year and an ANNUAL.

WILLIAM A. THOMPSON.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., Dec. 16, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER should be in every enlightened and common-sense family throughout the United States. THE TRUTH SEEKER has so much various, instructiv, interesting, and useful information for both old and young, that a portion of it should be read every day by all that are able to read. That is, it should become the family Bible in every household, and the old Jew Bible be thrown overboard. THE TRUTH SEEKER, I should judge, is the best Freethought journal ever published. Mr. Macdonald must hav been very favorably considered, to be selected and sent from heaven, or from some equally as good and holy a place, as an angel of mercy to edit and run THE TRUTH SEEKER for the enlightenment and salvation of the benighted Christian world.

The priests and the clergy make their impression on the minds of the faithful that they must believe that Jesus Christ was the son of God, who died on the cross to satisfy divine justice, and they through faith in his death and resurrection, if truly penitent, will be eternally saved. Being redeemed here insures them eternal life with the redeemed hereafter. The priest told them, his dupes, that to secure heaven they must make it their every-day study to liv in the faith, fear, and love of God, and they promised that they would. As I see it, I should think that by such false teaching and misleading these ignorant dupes would be in such a bad and hopeless state as to be beyond redemption, eternally lost.

In "Notes and Clippings" on the title-page there is always instructiv and interesting reading.

The official members of the American Secular Union hav a great deal of work to do, and especially the secretary. There is much that is interesting in the letters very frequently from those activ and very useful members engaged in the lecture field, giving us ample description of the country through which they pass, of the business places of importance, of the picturesque scenery, and of their success in their lecture engagements. Their letters are always very acceptable, instructiv, and pleasant reading.

I think that Mr. Ingersoll's Replies to Cardinal Manning are grand. The editorials are up to the high-water mark in pith, and to the point. I always read them with pleasure. The clergy very often get rather hard knocks. Well, if they don't like it, they must stand from under. "Letters from Friends" are welcome reading to me, although my views do not correspond with the religious views of some of them. I think a great deal of the "Children's Corner," the poetry, the children's letter correspondence with each other and to Miss Wixon. The "Gems of Thought" contain a great deal of food for thought. The cartoons are up to the point and purpose intended. They show up the hypocrits in grand style. It is a grand addition to the paper. Mr. Heston was born to perform that kind of work—a good artist.

THOMAS B. SMITH.

CAMBRIDGEPORT, MASS., Dec. 22, 288.

MR. EDITOR: Four years ago I voted for Cleveland, thinking him a better man than Blaine; at least, I thought him a loyal American. But from the moment I read of his taking that which did not belong to him and giving it to the pope of Rome—giving what ought to be one of the most sacred documents in the United States to be trampled or spit upon by the greatest enemy America has got—I hav changed. I wish I could portray the laugh in his sleeve had by his holiness when he received the Constitution of the United States from poor, knuckling Grover. "Ah," said he, "Grover, my boy, I've got you, but that filthy, man-made document I shall soon be able to trample underfoot!" So right there and then I concluded I should never vote for Mr. Grover again, nor hav I, and glad I am that the people of the United States did not need h m for president again. Of two evil choose the least. We hav now an avowed Presbyterian, but let us hope he will be better than an avowed nothing. At least, I hope and trust he will not bow and scrape to the pope of Rome. Presbyterianism is bad enough, but these poor dupes are not bound hand, foot, and soul to foreign power. And let me add one word about the government of the United States. I think they do very wrong in allowing foreign Catholics to take the oath and pretend to become American citizens, for every one of them who takes the said oath takes a false one, for they hav sworn before and are at the time of taking such oath bound to a foreign power (as witness the oath of T. A. Sequin, which I inclose in this), and it is impossible for them to become citizens of a republic, as the Shorter Catechism (of which Harrison is a full believer) says that all who take a false oath go to hell. So I think it very wrong in the rulers of this country to allow so many poor dupes to take the oath, thereby sending them straight to hell. I hope Harrison will see to it that there shall be no more poor souls roasting in that hot place through his administration. He ought to think of the awful responsibility resting on him and the government of this country by allowing such awful things to go on unchecked, for his—H rrison's—book says they will go to hell surely. Oh, horror of horrors!

I wish to say one word about this lump of mud we are living on. I hav been told that the earth revolves. Christians hav told me the good Lord made it revolve. I hav never heard why it continues to do so, only it is God's wish. Now, I hav an idea which perhaps some may laugh at, but I will giv it to you, and if any person can show me that I am wrong I will readily abandon the idea. Why does the earth revolve? Drop a ball of uneven surface for a considerable distance and it will turn round in falling, and as the earth is heavier than the air it is and has been falling, sinking through space, and as there is no end to space the planets will continue to sink, consequently to turn round.

I. H. ARCHIBALD.

MR. EDITOR: Having been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for several years and always finding pleasure and profit in reading "Letters from Friends," it occurs to me that a few suggestions from my pen may be kindly received. Mrs. Herman's letter of December 3d offers several suggestions which I think Liberals should consider. That Infidels should avoid shocking their Christian friends by rash and ill-considered language seems to be a wise admonition. While we cannot afford to abandon our principles, we should endeavor in setting them forth to do so in language the least calculated to offend our friends and neighbors whose views differ widely from our own. Many Infidels I think injure our cause and repel people from us by using coarse and abusiv language, when a different course might win them over. I know how hard it is to tolerate intolerance, but if we are truly Liberal we will try to deal in a kindly spirit even with the most intolerant. Infidels and Free-thinkers above all others should exhibit charity, kindness, and forbearance in their intercourse with each other. Instead of employing their time and talents, as too many Liberals do, in mutual wrangles and recriminations, why cannot all agree to sink their minor differences and devote all their energies to the cause of Universal Mental Liberty? By united, persistent action we may hope to accomplish something for humanity. By divided, disjointed, and spasmodic effort we accomplish little or nothing. Mrs. Herman's suggestion that Infidel meetings should be opened with singing I heartily indorse, but I must dissent from her proposition to hav gospel songs sung at our meetings. Hav we not enough Liberal songs and hymns available? If it is best to sing orthodox hymns to please our orthodox friends, if it is so very important to please them that we should stultify ourselvs in this way, why not go a little further and hav orthodox sermons, too? I for one am perfectly willing that Christians should worship in their own way and sing their own gospel hymns, but when we are asked to indorse their superstition in that way, I think there can be but one answer. While genuin Liberalism would lead us to deal kindly with those who differ from us in belief, and avoid wounding their feelings unnecessarily, I cannot see that it requires us to desert our principles and inculcate doctrins we abhor, even to please our Christian friends. Does anyone imagin for a moment that the singing of gospel hymns has no effect in inculcating religious dogmas? Just think of singing at an Infidel meeting:

There is a fountain filled with blood
Drawn from Immanuel's veins, or some other hymn indorsing the doctrin of the atonement. No doubt we all desire that our friends and neighbors who attend our meetings should go away well pleased, but if they are not prepared to receive Freethought doctrins—if the presentation of Liberal ideas in a kind and gentle way should shock them, as Mrs. Herman seems to fear—I do not see in that case that we would be to blame. R. B. JACKSON.

HELIX, ORE., Dec. 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1.50. Please send me your paper for six months. I hav been reading it, through the kindness of a friend, for nearly two months, and like it very much; indeed, I can scarcely find an objection to the sentiments expressed in any part of it.

Freethought is my motto, but I find a person is best enabled to think by first obtaining enough education and experience to enable him to arrange his thoughts in a philosophical manner, and he should express those ideas in a comprehensiv and elegant way. Rude language and incorrect spelling are unpardonable in printed matter, especially when it takes the form of argument, for, in a refined mind, it causes a feeling of disgust and disrespect for the author, although his argument may be perfectly sound.

I hav heard remarks made and hav noticed these two faults—particularly the spelling—in your paper, and you will pardon me, for I am deeply interested in your success, and fault-finding by a friend should never giv offense, if I call your attention to the latter fault. I find that words ending in silent e almost invariably hav that letter left off, especially the word hav. Do see that your proofreader corrects this error, and oblige several Freethinkers in this locality, among whom is your new subscriber and interested well-wisher,

LIZZIE COLLIER.

[The following are the rules of spelling English words recommended by the English Philological Society and by the American Philological Association: 1. Drop the final e when it is phonetically useless, for example, giv, hav, etc. 2. Drop the phonetically useless letter from the digraph ea; as in hed, hart, for head and heart. 3. Drop the a from beauty. 4. Drop o from eo when the digraph has the sound of e, as lepard, peple. 5. Omit i from parliament. 6. Write u for o in above, some, etc. 7. Drop o from the digraph ou when it has the sound of u as in nourish. 8. Drop silent u after g in nativ English words, such as guard, guest, etc. 9. Drop final ue in catalog, etc. 10. Substitute rime for rhyme. 11. Drop the final consonant in such words as egg, odd, etc., when it is phonetically useless. 12. Drop silent b in bomb, dumb, limb, debt, doubt. 13. Change c back to s in cinder, pence, etc. 14. Drop h in choler, school, etc. 15. Change d and ed final to t when so pronounced; as crost, past, wisht, etc. 16. Drop g in feign. 17. Drop h in ghost, aghast. 18. Drop l in could. 19. Drop p in receipt. 20. Drop s in island and aisle. 21. Drop c in scent. 22. Drop t in catch. 23. Drop w in whole. 24. Write f for ph when the digraph has the sound of f. Miss Collier will notice that our spelling reform is a very moderate one compared to that advocated by two scientific bodies, who make language their specialty. Miss Collier probably knows that the English language has been a growth, an evolution, from barbaric gutturals to the chaste and copious and flexible expression of to-day. There is no more reason why the language should stop at its present point than at the point attained in Chaucer's time, or at Shakspere's time. Miss Collier probably could not read Chaucer's works in the original or even Shakspere's without a glossary, yet no doubt the people thought they had arrived at perfection then, and the ancient Saxons rebelled when the Normans improved their language by mixing with it the French and Latin of the continent. And there is plenty of room for improving the English language. There is no better reason for dropping the u in labor than for ignoring the silent e in hav, giv, and liv. But the u has gone in America, and the e is going. Let all reformers speed its going.—ED. T. S.]

DICKORY-DOCK RANCH, NEAR MANZANO, N. M., Dec. 21, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find my year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. The fact of it is, the paper has come to be an actual necessity with me. It is to a Freethinker's literary appetite as hog and hominy to the laboring man. Heston is immense. His cartoons hit the Christians just where they liv, and the pious spot is very tender. Your Eastern subscribers think they see something of the wretched rot of ignorant slavery to the Catholic church, but they should see it among the Mexicans, where the priests and Jesuits are little gods among their deluded worshipers. And to see it in its perfection they should witness the march of the Penitents during "Passion Week" in April. They are the modern Flagellants, and torture themselvs in the most barbarous manner. In early times in New Mexico the ceremony of the crucifixion and sacrificing little children to the Christian deities were features of the observance of Passion Week, but the march of civilization has compelled a discontinuance of these more barbarous practices. Parents would even kill their own children as an evidence of devotion to their deities, an idea they got from hearing the story of the old knave Abraham, who was willing to sacrifice his son Isaac. Those old rascals never sacrificed themselvs; it was always some other poor devil they were willing to send to kingdom come—like Mark Twain, who attested his devotion to the country by sending all his wife's relations to the war! So true is it that we bear the misfortunes of others with heroic fortitude.

The communication, "Here It Is," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 1st, by Milleson, is a most valuable and interesting contribution. I read it the third time, so intensely entertaining and instructiv was it to me. It is worth all the superstitious trash ever scribbled by priests or preachers since the first sky-pilot began trading treasures in heaven for cash down. It wipes away, as with a broom, the contemptible yarns with which religious knaves hav from time immemorial duped their deluded followers. The theory of world-making establishes beyond all question that nature is the great architect, and that all the heavenly bodies, like man, hav their successiv ages of infancy, manhood, and decay. No lesson could be more grand or instructiv to mankind, and the more it is pondered and understood by the people, the less use will they hav for preachers et id omne genus.

No question of the popularity of THE TRUTH SEEKER cartoons will be raised in the West. In the East, where the people are priest-ridden, and for the sake of popularity and business bow down to the legends of gods, ghosts, and Jew virgins and their illegitimate offspring, you may expect them to be scared up and shocked by Heston's pictures. It is superstitious nature pictured too severely true, and of course they don't like it. But in the West, where people go to church very little, and where Sunday, if it is a pretty day, is just as good as Friday, the people grow out of the religious nonsense with which they were crammed in their youth, and get to be free men and women who do their own thinking. Such enjoy innocent fun of almost any kind, and Friend Heston's pictorial lampoons, you may be sure, will never hurt their feelings. I only wish there were more of them, and that they could go with the old TRUTH SEEKER into every home where the English language is spoken. Then might we begin to hope for the early coming of the day when the chains of religious servitude could be stricken from all our people, and the superstitious masses, disenthralled by the grand truths of science and the divine religion of humanity, could join in a mighty march onward to an enlightened civilization, compared with which the most utopian ideals of to-day are only crude and commonplace.

Wishing a merry Christmas and happy New Year to THE TRUTH SEEKER and all its friends, and especially its subscribers, I am, Very truly your friend,

JOHN M. BRADFORD.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Mother and Child.

I.

Two little, dimpled, rose-bud feet,
As the apple blossoms sweet,
Nestled in one loving hand,
Where bright sea waves kissed the sand,
Long ago!

Two little hands like the rose leaves lay
On a warm breast as fair as they;
Two little hands all pink and white,
Like the tinted sea-shells bright,
Long ago!

Two merry, glad, wide-open eyes
Looked up with wondering sweet surprise
Into two mirrors, faithful, true,
Which mother eyes looked fondly through,
Long ago!

Two pretty, pouting, pink-pearl lips,
Peach-tinged, like toes and finger-tips;
Two lips of richer, riper red,
On love's warm kisses sweetly fed,
Long ago!

A precious, helpless lump of clay
In which a pure, bright spirit lay
Waiting the mother's watchful eye
To train it for the "by and by,"
Long ago!

. . . . . .

II.

Two wrinkled hands like dead leaves lay
Soft folded o'er a breast of clay;
Two wrinkled, bony, bare, brown hands,
Where sea waves kiss the crystal sands,
Now as then!

Two tired, tired feet, all thin and worn—
On life's rough rocks oft bruised and torn;
Two weary feet too weak to go
On life's rough pathway to and fro,
Now as then!

Two tearless eyes close veiled from light,
'Neath soft fringed lids of pearl-gray white;
Two love-lit eyes, deep, tender, true,
No more the mother soul looks through,
Now as then!

A precious, lifeless lump of clay
From which the soul hath passed away;
A loving woman, tender, sweet,
Kisses the face, the hands, the feet,
Now as then!

"Drunk in the Streets."

"Drunk, your worship," the officer said;
"Drunk in the street, sir!" She raised her head—
A lingering trace of golden grace
Still softened the lines of her woe-worn face.
Unkempt and tangled her rich brown hair,
Yet with all the furrows and stains of care—
The years of anguish and sin and despair—
The child of the city was passing fair.

The ripe red mouth, with lips compressed—
The rise and fall of the heaving breast—
The nervous fingers so taper and small,
Crumpled the fringe of the tattered shawl,
As she stood in her place at the officer's call.
She seemed good and fair, she seemed tender and sweet,
This fallen woman found drunk in the street.

Does the hand that once smoothed the ripple and wave
Of that tangled hair lie still in the grave?
Is the mother who pressed those red lips to her own
Deaf to the pain of their smothered moan?
Has the voice that chimed to the lisping prayer
No accent of hope for the lost one there,
Bearing the burden of sin and despair?

Drunk in the street—in the gutter found—
From a passionate longing to crush and drown
The soul of the woman she might hav been—
To fling off the weight of a fearful dream,
And awake again in the homestead hard by
The wooded mountain that touched the sky;
To linger awhile on the path to school,
And catch in the depths of the limpid pool,
Under the willow shade, green and cool,
A dimpled face and a laughing eye.

Ye men with sisters, and mothers, and wives,
Hav ye no care for these women's lives?
Must they starve for the comfort they never speak?
Must they ever be erring and sinful and weak,
Staggering onward with weary feet,
Stained in the gutter and drunk in the street?

—The Good Templar.

Sad Misconception.

Freethought says that a five-years girl whose father was a strict church-member, told him that at the Sunday-school she had been singing about Jesus. "That's right," he said, "leave off that ugly Yankee Doodle you are so fond of, and sing about Jesus." His horror may be imagined when, a few days thereafter, he heard the little one sing, with great devotion.

Holy Jesu went to town, riding on a pony,
Stuck a feather in his hat and called it maccaroni.
Holy Jesus, keep it up! Jesus is a dandy,
Mind the music and the dance, and with the girls be handy.

Correspondence.

MILTON, DAK., Jan. 9, 1889.

MY DEAR FRIEND MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to the Children's Corner. My papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. I read the Children's Corner. I am ten years old. I hav two brothers and four sisters. I liv on the Pembina mountains, some seven hundred feet above the Red River of the North. Notwithstanding that we are up so high I hav never seen an angel yet. So good-bye. From your Freethinker friend, WM. A. HAIGHT.

VESTA, NEB., Jan. 12, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first letter, so I thought I would write to you. I read THE TRUTH SEEKER, and like the letters in the Children's Corner. I hav five sisters and no brothers. I burnt my thumb and it is real sore. We hav a pet pig and his name i Dexter, and he is as fat as butter. We take THE TRUTH SEEKER to get pieces out of it to speak at literary meetings. I will close for this time, hoping to see this in print.

Yours truly, EDA WEDEKIND.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I inclose ten cents for the Caseys.

I wish you a happy New Year. I read the Children's Corner every week.

I send you some Colorado wild flowers.

Your Freethinker friend,
STELLA E. POWELL.

VESTA, NEB., Jan. 12, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav been going to school for some time. We hav a little puppy and his name is Shep. He is as black as he can be. I am eight years old. I hav five sisters. My papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. I and three of my sisters go to the schoolhouse every Friday night. I read in the Third Reader. I got a book for a Christmas present with 122 pages in it. I will close, for this time. Your little friend,

BERTHA WEDEKIND.

VESTA, NEB., Jan. 12, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I hav been reading in THE TRUTH SEEKER and like the paper very much. We hav two teams of mules; one team is gray and the other is black. I am eleven years old. I and my sister, nine years old, milk the cows; we only milk three. I go to school and read in the Fourth Reader, and study arithmetic, geography, and grammar. Well, I guess I will close for this time. I remain, Ever your friend, MAGGIE WEDEKIND.

BERTRAND, NEB., Jan 10, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am a little girl eight years old. My papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I like to read the Children's Corner. My school is out. I hav an organ, and hav learned to play thirteen pieces on it. I hav a canary bird, and it is a nice singer. I hav one brother nineteen years old. He is a Freethinker, and clerks in a hardware store in Bertrand. I will close for this time.

MAUD A. OLMSTED.

P.S.—Will inclose ten cents to the Casey cow fund. M. A O.

BRIDGEVILLE, TENN., Jan. 7, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I now will write to you while everything is quiet. I hav just been reading the correspondence in the Corner, and I like to read the letters. It has been a long time since I wrote to you, and I hope I will see my letter in print. My papa don't take THE TRUTH SEEKER, but my grandpa does. I am not going to school now, and I would like to hav some of the Liberals write to me, for I get lonesome sometimes. I would answer them. So I will close by saying, I hope to see my letter in print.

Your sincere friend, CLARA LEINART.

BERTRAND, NEB., Jan. 11, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My little girl is greatly taken up with the Corner, and is anxious to contribute to it. To facilitate matters I will copy her letter.

We liv in a new country and hav poor school facilities.

Maud is quite a musical prodigy. She traded her horse for an organ last July, and has become quite a player; but knows nothing of heaven, hell, ghosts, or any of the concomitants of the Christian superstition, nor do we intend to hav her know until she is old enough to understand about them. I read the Investigator, and think that your lecture at the Paine Hall should be read by every lady in the broad land. We pass it around to everyone that will read Liberal literature. Your name has become a household word with my folks. With kind regards and best wishes, etc., HENRY J. OLMSTED.

[Such kind appreciation helps us in the work in which we never weary. May all good things come into the home of our friend Olmsted, and of each reader of the Corner, and, in fact, into all homes the wide world over, is the wish of the ED. C. C.]

The German Emperor's Childhood.

The German emperor was a bumptious and overbearing child, and never endured being beaten in any game. If he could not get his own way he would first sulk, and then try and take advantage of his position as a "royal child." But this was never allowed. The rule in the nursery was strict equality, and the nurses had stringent orders to enforce it. He has a cold, proud manner, which made him anything but popular with his other playmates. It was quite the reverse with Prince Henry and the little Princess Sophie, who were beloved by all.

What the Little Ones are Saying.

A little girl, aged nine, called her father to her bedside the other evening. "Papa," said the little diplomat, "I want to ask your advice." "Well, my dear, what is it about?" "What do you think will be best to giv me on my birthday?"

Teacher: "Now, boys, can any of you tell me what is meant by posthumous works?" Boy at head of class: "Yes, sir, I can." "Well, now, let me hear what it means?" "Sir, posthumous works are books which a man writes after he is dead."

Little Elsa, who has learned that it is night in America when the sun is shining in Germany and vice versa, hears that an aged lady is preparing to go to her son in America, and asks: "How will the old lady ever get used to living there when it is night in the daytime and day in the night time?"

Science Column.

The Goat.

Anna has just seen a goat for the first time. She is quite carried away with it, and says, "Do tell all about the goat." "I will, but you must sit still and listen," I say to her. So she pulls her little rocker close to me and we begin at once. She says the goat she saw was white and black, and had four feet and two horns, and an udder. Now, we learn from that brief description that the goat belongs to the class of mammals. They nurse their babies with their own milk. The pretty word mamma is derived from the Latin mammalia. The goat goes on four feet, therefore it is called quadruped. Goat's milk is said to be very rich. The goat Anna saw must be a female because it givs milk. Such are called "Nanny" goats. The male goat is called the "Billy" goat. They are easily tamed, and will run in and out of doors, and up and down stairs. A lady was greatly frightened once when visiting at a house where the family kept goats. In the night the door of her room was pushed open, and the lady thought she saw a ghost, and screamed. It was only the pet goat who had strolled up the stairs and into my lady's chamber.

Goats are quite intelligent; they can be harnessed to little wagons, and made to draw small loads. They are fond of climbing hills and mountains, and, when domesticated, they do damage by destroying trees and shrubbery. They eat almost everything. The age of goats can be ascertained by their teeth and the knobs on their horns. The goat has four stomachs, and chews the cud like the cow and oxen. Goat meat is considered nice for eating, and resembles lamb meat. The long hair of the goat is used in the manufacture of certain goods, notably that kind known as mohair. The young goats are called kids.

There are several varieties of goats, the most famous being the Angora. It is a nativ of Syria, and its hair is very long, fine, and silky. The material made from it is almost like silk, it is so soft and fine. Lizzie Fuguson sent me a bunch of the Angora fleece, from Arizona. It would readily pass for white human hair. It makes soft, nice yarn, and commands a good price.

Boys enjoy playing with goats, and the animal will follow the boy who is kind to him anywhere. When the goat is teased, he resents the teasing with his horns, and can make his tormentor remember him a long time. S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—To what class does the goat belong? What is the meaning of mammal? What word in common use is derived from it? What is the meaning of quadruped? By what general name are male and female goats known? Tell the ghost story. How can the age of the goat be known? In what respect are goats like some other animals? What is the hair of the goat used for? What is a kid? What is the most popular kind of goat? What is made from its hair? What else? Do boys like to play with and tease goats? How do goats defend themselvs?

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. THOUGHTS ON SCIENCE, THEOLOGY, AND ETHICS.

BY JOHN WILSON, M.A.

The object of the book, as expressed in the preface, is to giv a correct sketch of the main lines of modern thought in small compass, and in language simple enough to be easily understood. In other words, it is a condensation of more voluminous writers, and classification of their definitions of science, theology, and ethics, and a statement of what belongs to each. As a text-book to clear thinking and logical reasoning, and a guide in forming scientific conclusions, this book is invaluable. The Literary Guide ranks it as "one of the foremost works of the present century;" while the Freethinker, in "heartily recommending it" as "simple and lucid in style, correct in thought, and ample in information," declares that it "is just the thing to put in the hands of a plain man who desires the best ideas on evolution in relation to science and ethics in a moderate compass."

MARTYRDOM OF MAN.

A COMPENDIUM OF UNIVERSAL HISTORY.

By WINWOOD READE.

It is really a remarkable book, in which universal history is "boiled down" with surprising skill.—[Literary World.

You turn over his pages with a fascination similar to that experienced in reading Washington Irving.—[Inter-Ocean.

His history has a continuity, a rush, a carrying power, which reminds us strikingly of Gibbon.—[New Haven Palladium.

The sketch of early Egyptian history, in the first chapter, is a masterpiece of historical writing. He has a style that reminds us of Macaulay.—[Penn Monthly.

New Books, Pamphlets, and Papers.

People about to build new houses can get various good ideas from Shoppell's Modern Houses, an architectural quarterly sold for 25 cents by the Coöperativ Building Plan Association, 63 Broadway.

"The Gypsies' Festival" and "The Court of King Christmas" are two amateur theatrical and musical entertainments for young people. Price, 25 cents each, of Harold Roorbach, 9 Murray street, this city.

M. L. Holbrook has printed another edition of "Eating for Strength," in which he considers the relation of food and diet to health and work, and givs several hundred recipes for wholesome foods and drinks. It is a good book. Sold at this office for $1.

"Artificial Persons" is the title of a pamphlet which the author, Mr. Charles T. Palmer, B.L., calls a philosophical view of the law of corporations. It contains also some prefatory remarks by Paul Carus, editor of the Open Court. The pamphlet is a consideration of the relations of corporations to society. Price, about 15 cents.

Members of the American Turner Bund will all want the 1889 almanac of their society, published by the Freidenker Company, 470 East Water street, Milwaukee, Wis., for 25 cents. It is filled with information interesting to the Turners, and poems and essays interesting to others. The circulation is limited to those reading German.

Those interested in "Inebriate Asylums and Their Work," will perhaps find something to think over in a sixteen-page pamphlet by T. D. Crothers, of Hartford, Conn., to which is appended an advertisment of the institution over which Dr. Crothers presides. The pamphlet is part of a lecture delivered before the Young Men's Christian Association of Toronto.

H. S. Drayton has collected and edited the "Masterpieces of Pope, Æsop, Milton, Goldsmith, and Coleridge," and the Fowler & Wells Co. has published them in handsome shape, with profuse illustrations. It is an excellent plan for getting the best of the works of these famous authors, and the volume will be of value to students of literature with limited time at their disposal.

Our neighbor, Science, published at 47 Lafayette place, enlarged with the new year, altered its make-up, and assumed a form and editorial policy which will certainly entitle it to a wider circulation. Science aims to epitomize the scientific news of the week, and to keep its readers informed of the progress in knowledge the world is making. It is more technical than speculativ, and deals with what is rather than with what is thought. The price is $3.50 per year.

"Personal Rights vs. Prohibition, Considered in Conjunction with the Laws of Personal Liberty and Responsibility," is Mr. G. A. Lafayette's contribution to the liquor question. Mr. Lafayette is not a Prohibitionist, and he givs good reasons for not being. If he had told us where he lived, and how much he asks for his sixteen-page pamphlet (two pages blank), we would hav published the information for the benefit of Mr. Walker and other anti's.

The "Confessional Box Unmasked" is one of the rotten sort of pamphlets against Rome that publishers of claptrap put out to please sectarian prejudices. They go as near the edge of obscenity as they dare, and depend upon implied nastiness to sell their books, which are worthless from any reasonable point of view. Rome is dangerous in politics and degrading in religion, but books of this sort are not calculated to turn people away from her. Price, 10 cents—C. L. Palmer, 170 Madison street, Chicago.

Moses Hull has removed his New Thought from Des Moines, Ia., to 675 W. Lake street, Chicago, Ill. The change will no doubt be good for the paper, as it certainly is an improvement for Chicago to hav a decent Spiritualist journal published there. D. W. Hull, Moses's brother, is editing a paper in Colfax, Ia., but he wants to get a fruit farm in a Southern latitude, because ordinary journalism is a slave life, where he has to suppress the useful and print the useless. Infidel Spiritualists will doubtless enjoy a perusal of New Thought.

Charles Watts has written and published in pamphlet form two long essays: one upon "Christianity: Its Origin, Nature, and Influence," and the other upon "Agnosticism and Christian Theism: Which is the More Reasonable?" The titles of these pamphlets lucidly describe their contents. Mr. Watts finds Christianity to be of human origin, and not original with the ostensible inventors. It is, he says, impracticable of application and contradictory in its nature, as well as indefinit in its teachings. Its influence in the world has been bad, and its exit will be the most graceful act of its existence. In the other pamphlet Mr. Watts defines Agnosticism, describes the relation of its philosophy to the universe and to Christian Theism, and affirmativly answers the question, whether it is sufficient to satisfy man's intellectual requirements. To which he appends a discourse on Nature and the Supernatural. Both of these pamphlets will be very useful to Freethinkers. They are written in Mr. Watts's well-known clear and logical manner, and his reasoning and conclusions mark the scholar and thinker. The price of the essay on Christianity is 15 cents; of that on Agnosticism, 10 cents. To be had at this office.

Hiram Maine, late candidate of the Union Labor party for lieutenant-governor of Indiana, has indicted the Democratic and Republican parties with sixty-one counts, and published the indictment at 5 cents per copy, to be had of him at Harlan, Ind. According to Mr. Maine, the politicians of to-day are legislativ scoundrels, who cannot tell the truth and are only kept from stealing the earth because they can't find a place to put it. Union Labor voters will, no doubt, enjoy the book. Democratic and Republican voters will hardly care for it.

"The American Bible and the American God," is the title of a bulky pamphlet by W. D. Condon, of Palatka, Fla. Mr. Condon has been a diligent reader of Ingersoll, Remsburg, and THE TRUTH SEEKER, as well as church and American history, and he scores the orthodox Christians with whips of scorpions. He writes in behalf of a new sect, "The American Christians," whose object is to organize churches and societies to protect religion from Christianity. Were he not so serious in his purpose, we should judge him to be sarcastic in its statement.

Paul Carus, editor of the Open Court, read a paper before the Chicago Society for Ethical Culture, entitled, "The Idea of God," and then printed it in good shape for general circulation. Mr. Carus's notion is that "the idea of God is the grandest thought which in ages past humanity ventured to think," and that when it comes to making a decision whether we shall "faithfully retain it as a sacred inheritance," or "discard it as a fallacy," we may by his method be able to straddle the fence and do both. We disagree with the able editor, as we are no mugwump in religion, but others may not, and such can send 15 cents to the Open Court, 175 La Salle street, Chicago, Ill., and get a copy.

The Christmas number of the London Freethinker for 1888 is not quite so blasphemous as some of the previous issues, but is wicked enough for all practical purposes. It contains sixteen pages in pink cover, filled with humorously illustrated Bible incidents, and much witty reading matter, some of which would scarcely suit the members of the Free Religious Society. And, by the way, we wish the Freethinker artist would giv THE TRUTH SEEKER artist credit when he feels inspired by that individual to outdo himself by reproducing Mr. Heston's cartoons. "With compliments to Watson Heston of THE TRUTH SEEKER of New York," would look well at the bottom of several of his late pictures. We mention this solely upon Mr. Heston's account.

"The readers of the Popular Science Monthly will be glad to learn that Dr. Andrew D. White's 'New Chapters in the Warfare of Science' are to be resumed in the February number. Dr. White has devoted several years to the investigation of this subject, and is now in Europe making an unusually exhaustiv examination of the libraries there for additional material, which shall enable him to continue his remarkable account of the persistent dominance of delusion in the human mind. The chapter immediately forthcoming will treat of 'Demoniac Possession and Insanity.'" The publishers of the Monthly sent us that, and we believe it to be in all respects accurate. Mr. White's showing up of the church is very damaging to that institution.

The "Christian Scientists" hav had a falling out, and Ursula N. Gesterfield has published a 25-cent pamphlet to show that Jesuitic methods are playing the very deuce with the divine science. The pamphlet is chiefly an attack upon Mary B. G. Eddy, of Boston, who claims to be the discoverer or founder of the cult, or sect, or priesthood, whatever it is, and Ursula asserts in substance that because of Mrs. Eddy's egotism and great claims and employment of the spy system of the Jesuits, the house of the Christian scientists is divided against itself, to the great scandal of the faithful, and contrary to the well-being of the pockets of those who liv off the credulity of the Christian people. It is a very pretty quarrel as it stands, and 'twould be a pity to spoil it; therefore St. Ursula's pamphlet should be well circulated.

After the greatest possible solicitation on the part of her friends (so she assures the reader), Miss Adelaide Johnson, of Washington, has "consented, though reluctantly, to formulate her wonderful philosophy, so poetical, and chiefly great in that the cleared way is pointed out to each lover of peace by which to make this existence on earth of that character, in every home as well as the nation." This great reluctance, perhaps as wonderful as the philosophy, takes the form of a pamphlet, called, "Harmony the Real Secret of Health, Beauty, and Happiness; or, Vegetarianism from Principle." The book is "particularly necessary to all instructors in the different departments of healing, Christian science, metaphysics, mental science." Miss Johnson has no reluctance in disclosing the price, which is 25 cents, nor the place where it can be obtained, which is 1603 S street, N. W., Washington, D. C.

Esteemed Mr. Shaw sends us two pamphlets—"Studies in Theology," and a second edition of "The Bible: What Is It?" "Studies in Theology" is a consideration of theological propositions and assertions, with reasons why they are absurd and untenable. Mr. Shaw's reasoning is sound, his language temperate, and his conclusions irrefutable. "The Bible: What Is It?" has proved to be a very popular treatis, and has been reprinted in London in the Secular Review as well as by the author himself. It conclusivly shows that whatever the Bible may be it is not what the Christians claim it is. These two pamphlets are admirable documents to hand to Christians of whose conversion to common sense there may be a moderate hope, and we can strongly recommend them. "Studies in Theology" is 10 cents; "The Bible: What Is It?" is 25 cents.

The Fowler & Wells Company expect us to say this of a sawed-off little book of poems called, "Forward Forever and Other Poems," being a poetical reply to Lord Tennyson's latest pessimism: "The 'other poems' are 'Stand Fast' and 'The Evening Hour,' altogether forming a little chaplet of thirty-four pages. In his 'Forward Forever' Mr. Shaw takes a more cheerful view of life's conditions at the present day than Lord Tennyson does in his late poem, and points in its Alexandrine lines to many features that intimate advancement in moral as well as material affairs. Without claiming to be a great poet, Mr. Shaw reads us in his quaint rhymes lessons of value in our domestic and secular life." We are willing to say it, but expect Mr. Sizer to prove it if it is thrown up at us when the Big Ledger is pulled down off the golden shelf on our arrival before the Throne. Price of the poems, 25 cents.

David A. Andrade, of Melbourne, Australia, sends us "An Anarchist Plan of Campaign." It is a scheme of coöperation for workers by which "they may escape from their intolerable slavery"—that is, employ themselvs, sell their own products, and receive the benefits. Interest, rent, and profit, however, are barred. The idea is to show to the world that there is a system of sociology by which all can be made equal, no one getting more or less than another, and all having a sufficiency. Under this system no one gets anything unless he or she works for it, and no one willing to work can be deprived of the opportunity. The scheme is very much like the Socialist plan, with the noteworthy exception that no one is obliged to come in against his will. Socialists propose that all shall come in or jump off the earth. Price. 10 cents. Sold by B. R. Tucker, box 3,366, Boston, Mass.

The Fowler & Wells Company take great pains to obviate the necessity of our reading the books they send here for review, by always inclosing a ready-made notice, for which they will please accept thanks. The next book which we pull out of the huge pile before us has this notice accompanying: "Nervousness: Its Nature, Causes, Symptoms, and Treatment. Illustrated. By H. S. Drayton, A.M., M.D. Price, 25 cents. This fresh contribution to popular medicin applies to a growing malady in America, and is, therefore, seasonable. The statements are definit with regard to the common causes of nervousness, and no attempt is apparent to excuse or condone the ignorance or impropriety of life among intelligent people. If fashion, habit, vice, be reprehensible, the author shows why, and also reflects not a little light upon unintentional errors that people are constantly committing in their ways of life, and for which nature compels a penalty. The cases from the author's own observations are very instructiv, and hav doubtless many parallels, for which the very reasonable and simple course of treatment will as well serve." It is to be presumed that that is all so.

We always pick up a book by John H. Keyser with interest, and read it with respect, for Mr. Keyser is one of those practical, big-hearted men that the world ought to love, if it doesn't. But "Reason vs. Revelation: The Theological Question. A Reply to Robert G. Ingersoll," is a disappointment. We hav no fault to find with Mr. Keyser's belief in immortality, per se, but when he lowers that belief to a defense, or even to an exegesis, of the Bible, he wanders off into labyrinths where he not only easily gets lost, but makes himself and his cause a trifle ridiculous. To explain the crudities of revelation with the jargon of Christian Spiritualism is only to make confusion worse confounded, and to replace barbaric guesswork with mouthfuls of words which no etymological analyst can translate into sense. Mr. Keyser has become convinced that death is a door instead of a wall, and now "when he opens again the lids of his mother's Bible, lo, its mystic pages glow with a new light." It is needless to say that this Sunday-school sort of literature will never answer Colonel Ingersoll, even so well as Dr. Field, Mr. Gladstone, or Cardinal Manning, three biblical champions whom Mr. Keyser admits hav been overthrown, unhorsed, rolled in the dust, and buried out of controversial sight by Freethought's greatest luminary. Neither will Mrs. Richmond's version of the New Testament hero's mission answer any better, and the citations of miraculous cures from a Catholic correspondent of the Sun, "which hav been authenticated by the ecclesiastical authorities," though accompanied by Mr. Keyser's offer to prove that miracles occur under natural laws, is argument which greatly resembles foolishness. Poems, too, about divine love, maiden's dreams, and morning light, fall from Ingersoll's armor like little leaves from granit walls. Altogether, Mr. Keyser's new spiritual theology is a little less fitted to cope with Infidelity, or to satisfy a public want, than the Christian scheme of salvation. The borderland between theologies of this sort and complete vacancy of mind is extremely narrow; and respect for the author only can prevent harsh criticism. Price, in paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.

In "Vital Force and Magnetic Exchange: Their Relation to Each Other and Life and Happiness," Mr. Albert Chavannes, of Adair Creek, east Tennessee, holds that what we call motion, heat, force, life, knowledge, intelligence, sensation, feeling, consciousness, mind, spirit, soul, are all manifestations of one actual substance, which makes use of atoms to cause what we recognize as material phenomena, and he further believes that this substance is itself subject to the law of evolution; that its combinations are obliged to struggle for existence, and that the test of their adaptation is found in the survival of the fittest. Consequently, the Materialists and Spiritualists are all mistaken. "Vital Force" also contains some chapters advocating doctrins on "Magnetation" peculiar to the Dianites, and much other speculativ matter upon Individuality, Motion, Sensation, Knowledge, Health, Magnetic Exchange, Intellectual, Emotional, and Sexual Magnetism, Mind Reading, Hypnotism, etc. Mr. Chavannes's contention is that Vital Force, of which these are manifestations, is the one thing of importance in the world, the power which builds, maintains, and runs the human machine. Price, 20 cents.

An eminent writer, having in mind the serene passing away of great skeptics, like Courtlandt Palmer, observed that lately the death of unbelievers had been more peaceable than the deaths of believers, and that the church would do well to giv up the scare-ghost of devils lingering at Infidel bedsides to clutch the souls that Satan owned. What is true of this decade is true also of other times, and G. W. Foote shows it in his pamphlet on "Infidel Death-Beds." The "idle tales of dying horrors," with which ministers hav scared the unread and unlearned—such as those about Voltaire and Paine—are but the malicious inventions of priests, for the truth is, as Tyndall testifies, that Atheists usually approach the inexorable goal with no dread of a hangman's whip, with no hope of a heavenly crown, but still as mindful of their duties, and as faithful in the discharge of them, as if their eternal future depended on their latest deeds. Mr. Foote has given good and full accounts of the last hours of the most prominent Freethinkers in history, and in every instance it is seen that the ministerial accounts are slanders of the dead. The book is a good one to hav on hand, with which to silence little country parsons who hav learned nothing since they left school, and forgotten most of what they learned there—theological hyenas who gain fame by despoiling graves and ruining reputations. The price is 50 cents.

Mr. James H. West has begun in Boston the publication of a sixteen-page monthly, to take the place of the Index, deceased. He calls his journal The New Ideal, and has the same corps of contributors as the Index, including F. E. Abbot. The New Ideal is not a destructiv paper, neither anti-religious nor religious, but sort of mugwumpery in tone—neither fish, flesh, nor fowl, nor good red herring. The experience of the Index leads us to seriously doubt if there is a field for it outside of Boston, and there seems not to be a sufficient constituency in that city to support such an organ. Ex-ministers who hav just crawled a little way out of the theological shell, donned a swallow-tail, and drawn on a pair of kid gloves, are like the bumble-bees, biggest when first hatched. They talk of Rationalism before they comprehend its meaning, and prate of culture and refinement when doing the most ungentlemanly acts. We are tired of such pharisees, and hav no sympathy at all with their work. They naturally belong in the church. When an editor is tickled by such words as these, "There is now no Liberal paper in the United States that combines Rationalism with scholarship and refinement, so as to be a suitable means of propagandism with cultured Christians," the first inquiry that occurs is, What dirty business has he been in? and when he announces that his journal is "not free to coarseness, or flippancy, or mere destructivness; not free to crudeness or triviality, or to iconoclasm pure and simple," we wonder why he does not get on the housetop and shout, "I am a pharisee!" Great pretensions to "broadest search, deepest study, widest outlook," are usually cant. If Mr. West and his contributors desire to save a few "shreds and patches" of the old religion, and of them put together a crazy-quilt to hide from dull eyes the loss of the ancient superstition, they should do it without claiming to be Liberals or Rationalists. The world is wide, and there is no use of bumping into other folks when setting out on a journey which is likely to be troublesome enough anyway. The subscription price of The New Ideal is $1, and the address is 620 Atlantic avenue, Boston, Mass.

"Social Struggles," by John P. Phillips, is an elaborate discussion of the relations of labor and capital, and the Socialism which has resulted from their antagonism under the present system. Mr. Phillips sees that these relations are now so strained that unless some form of reconciliation is found in which labor shall get a great deal more of what it produces, something must burst. He has no panacea to offer, but hopes by his presentation of facts to stir up sufficient thought to finally settle the problem. He seems to think that Poverty, like vice,

Is a creature of such hideous mien,
That to be hated it needs but to be seen,

and he has therefore put all our economical evils on view, but we are afraid he has closed the door on them to the very people who need to see them by making so large a book that by one of these classes it cannot be purchased, and by the other it will not be read. All who keep up with current events can agree with Mr. Phillips that Europe is drifting into a terrible revolution; that this country is nearly as badly off; that the resumption of specie payments has not cured the evil of poverty; that the farmers, mechanics, and laborers hav been wronged by legislation in the interests of corporations and wealth, and that all these evils can be remedied at the ballot-box; and that for the present condition of things to remain undisturbed is impossible. These are facts patent to everybody who reads, and if disputed, are easily shown by Mr. Phillips's book itself; but what is more wanted than the pointing out of this condition, is a pointing out of the way to get the voters to hang together, refuse to sell out to church or politician, and to go in for some new legislation and governmental changes which shall relieve the congestion of the country. This Mr. Phillips has not done—perhaps it is impossible to do it—but if his book will stimulate others to undertake the labor, it will prove a very important contribution to economic literature.

The book is published by Tuttle, Morehouse & Taylor, of New Haven, Conn., and the price must be at least $3.

Vol. I of "The Origin of Energy," by Leonidas de Cenci Hamilton, M.A., is at hand. In these volumes Mr. Hamilton has put forth "a new hypothesis which throws light upon all the phenomena of nature," and by which he traces electricity, magnetism, gravitation, light, heat, and chemical action to a single source. Mr. Hamilton places natural science upon mathematical and mechanical principles alone, and whatever theories, suppositions, or systems are not based on these principles, he rejects as unscientific. But the gist of his book can best be given in his own words: "This treatis is based upon the atomic theory, and is an attempt to trace the various forms of energy to a single source, namely, the inherent energy of the atoms of matter. The atoms are conceived to be the simplest geometrical solids, or tetrahedra, varying in the inclination of their angles, and possessed of varying masses and inherent energy in proportion to their mass. This inherent energy is traced to its specialized form or to a persistent tendency to rotation, which is the primal form, and all other forms of energy are but accidental resultants, and, therefore, convertible into the original form when the environing conditions permit their return to it.

"It entirely discards all 'mysterious' or 'occult' forces, and is an attempt to reduce all the phenomena of nature to atomic mechanics. In other words, it is an attempt to reach a mechanical interpretation of all the phenomena of the universe, the object and aim of modern physics.

"It approaches the problem from a new standpoint, however, recognizing motion as the normal state of the atoms of matter, and arrest of motion the abnormal state. Every phenomenon presented by the movements of bodies is conceived to be the resultant of a release from stress which is ever present in the interstellar medium, every motion being in the direction of least resistance. Internal or molecular motion is a release from molecular or atomic stress which is ever present in all bodies. Every body in space is an aggregation of atoms in an abnormal state, or in a state of stress surrounded by an illimitable field of released energy, and it is therefore subject to constant changes upon its surface and throughout its mass."

The price of the book is $3.

Saladin, of the London Secular Review, is blossoming out as a full-fledged Agnostic in philosophy, and with the first of the year calls his paper The Agnostic Journal and Secular Review. In copartnership with Joseph Taylor he has also written a little book giving the reasons why he is an Agnostic. We do not imagin that Saladin is any the less a Secularist, or any the less an Infidel, because of the change of the name, for the Review is as burning hot against orthodoxy as of yore, and we regard the new appellation as only putting a foreign label on nativ wine. Some people with uneducated tastes may think more of it, but the wine is the same—just as good—and probably better than the foreign article it pretends to be. The dual brochure, "Why I Am an Agnostic," is meant to serve the purpose (so the authors explain) "of placing before the honest inquirer the real scope and aim of Agnosticism, and to vindicate that mode of faith against the aspersions and misrepresentations of those who asperse or misrepresent it through hostility or ignorance." It will not escape observation that in this Saladin and Mr. Taylor hav given Agnosticism a progressiv lift from being a negativ philosophical position to an affirmativ belief regarding the absolute. But this belief or faith is not the faith of creedalists, and is entirely independent of dogmas. The faith of our Agnostic authors is the power, so they assure us, of identifying the abstract with the concrete, the ideal with the real. We suppose there is no limit to the capacity of man to construct faiths which may serve him instead of a religion, for even the main affirmation of Atheism—that the universe is all that is, and consequently there is no room for a God—may be used by religiously inclined natures to base a faith upon, leading them ultimately to pantheism, if there be any bump of worship in their heads, but we fail to recognize the utility of any more complications in either theology or philosophy. Theology is now only a splitting of hairs from a head which has mainly disappeared—only the hairs being left—or as Conway puts it, a building seeming to stand from which the foundations hav all been removed. And there is no great object gained, that we can see, in subdividing philosophy into sects—some negativ, some with faith, and some metaphysical, which is a mixture of both. An Agnostic, as defined by Professor Huxley, the coiner of the word, is one who neither affirms nor denies the existence or presence in the universe of the Unknowable or God or a supreme directing intelligence. That is, a certain class of thinkers, recognizing the impossibility of knowing the Unknowable—for when it is known it is not the unknowable—and seeing the logical difficulty of supporting an affirmativ negativ—concluded to achieve greatness by becoming modest, and adopted the title of Agnostics. Others, recognizing the advantage to be gained from that position, and the more to muddle the already floundering theologians, adopted the name and arguments, and when the preachers attacked them would with great candor and polite effusivness admit that they knew nothing of the unknowable, and then ask their opponent, with every appearance of great interest in the reply, if he did. Agnosticism began as a tactical and strategical method of anti-theological warfare: it seems that now it has evoluted into a faith, though, to be fair with the makers of that faith, it is only faith in natural laws, such as the farmer may hav when he sows his grain one year in order to reap a harvest the next. In this case the possible is converted into the actual, the ideal and the real reduced to identity, as the collaborators express it.

The necessity for making this new faith, or at least singling it out for a definit sectarian label, is what we question. "Charley," said an old-school English Secularist-Atheist to an intimate friend and prominent expounder of that philosophy, as they sat in quiet converse, "What in the devil is this new-fangled thing you lecturers are calling Agnosticism? Isn't it our real old-fashioned Atheism under a new name?" "Yes," answered Charles, "it is. The difference is more verbal than actual." "Well," retorted his Atheistic friend, "Atheism is still good enough for me, and I don't propose to change." But that Agnosticism has been and is of considerable use and merit its popularity attests. A great many will call themselvs Agnostics when they would shudder to say Atheist. There is, however, little use of stretching it, by running in hylo-idealism, to the dimensions of a faith.

Having said so much, which some may wrongly think is rather adverse to the merit of the book, it is only candid to say that Saladin and Mr. Taylor hav collaborated a very useful and keen volume, which every student of Freethought and of the various phases of critical heresy will desire to study. They will not, probably, wholly agree with all the statements made, but there is sufficient unimpeachable material to help the best read among the destroyers of creeds. We confess, though, that we like Saladin in his whirlwind assaults upon the citadel of Christian superstition better than in his didactic moods, when he is apt to inoculate his readers with a vague desire to climb after the incomprehensible. With Mr. Taylor's other works we are unacquainted. The price of "Why I Am an Agnostic" is 75 cents in this country.

BALAAM AND BALAK SEPARATE.

And Balaam rose up, and went and returned to his place: and Balak also went his way.—Num. xxiv, 25.

Gems of Thought.

YES, I venerate the grand, infinit, powerful, ever-prevalent Universe, far more than I do the old Jewish divinity who, as has been quaintly described, was one who raised up enemies that he might conquer them—made promises that he might break them—caused moral diseases that he might cure them—who permitted his favorit people to go after other gods that he might butcher them. A God who was before time was; cogitated before there was anything to cogitate about; who made the Universe before there was anything to make it of, and did before there was anything to do. A God who formed man in his own image, though his own image had no form; created an author of evil, though not himself the author of any evil; who caused his children to commit the most abominable crimes and suffer the intensest agonies, though not himself the cause of either criminality or agony. A God who saw the work he had performed was very good, yet presently discovered that it was very bad; foreknew that man would sin, yet was indignantly astonished that he did sin; foreknew that the forbidden fruit would be eaten, yet damned the whole human race because it was eaten. A God who, though always in all places, occasionally came down from heaven just to see how the world wagged; though always of the same opinion, occasionally changed his mind; though in good temper, frequently got into a towering passion; though always merciful to perfection, yet often murdered millions of innocent beings. A God so deceptiv as to send upon his people "strong delusions" that they might believe a lie, so very silly as to suffer himself to be checkmated by the devil, and so ferociously cruel that no human tyrant could ever equal him in monstrous severity and vengeance. A God whose presence would make a hell of heaven; whose virtues are vices (Ex. xx, 5), whose reason would disgrace an idiot (Ex. xxi, 21), whose laws would shock a savage (Num. xv, 31-35), whose fickleness provokes derision (Jer. xv, 6), and whose whole character is a horrible compound, an "intense concentration," of the worse vices which hav stained the worst human natures (Ex. xxxii, 27; Ezek. xiv, 9; 1 Kings xxii, 21, 22).—D. M. Bennett.

THE books containing the revelation on which Christianity is founded everywhere display to us a God of goodness in the commission of wickedness; an omnipotent God whose projects unceasingly miscarry; an immutable God changing his maxims and his conduct; an omniscient God continually deceived unawares; a resolute God repenting of his most important actions; a God of wisdom whose arrangements never attain success. He is a great God, who occupies himself with the most pueril trifles; an all-sufficient God, yet subject to jealousy, and a just God, yet permitting and prescribing the most atrocious iniquities. In a word, he is a perfect God, yet displaying at the same time such imperfections and vices that the most despicable of men would blush to resemble him.—D'Holbach.

IT remains the simple fact that those to whom we owe the earliest Bible teachings about the godhead, so far from being inspired to conceive of deity as almighty, all-wise, all-perfect, pictured a being whose plans were constantly foiled, who was no wiser than they were themselvs, and whose ways were the ways of the worst and most brutal of the savage rulers they chiefly feared.—Professor Proctor.

"WORLDLY pleasures" are still under the ban of our spiritual purists. Daily drudgery and daily self-denial are still considered the proper sphere of a law-abiding citizen, and special affliction a special sign of divine favor. Life has become a socage duty. We do not think it necessary to alleviate the distress of the poor till it reaches a degree that threatens to end it. We hav countless benevolent institutions for the prevention of outright death, not one benevolent enough to make life worth living. Infanticide is now far more rigorously punished than in old times. We enforce every child's right to liv and become a humble, tithe-paying Christian; but, as for its claim to liv happy, we refer it to the sweet by and by. We shudder at the barbarity of the Cæsars, who permitted the combat of men with wild beasts to cater to the amusement of the Roman populace; but we contemplate with great equanimity the misery of millions of our fellow-citizens wearing away their lives in workshops and factories; millions of children of our own nation and country who hav no recreation but sleep, no hope but oblivion; to whom the morning sun brings the summons of a taskmaster, and the summer season nothing but lengthened hours of weary toil—nay, we make it the boast of our pious civilization to deprive them of their sole day of leisure, to interdict their harmless sports, lest the noise, or even the rumor of their merriment, might disturb the solemnity of an assemblage of whining hypocrits. Hence, the recklessness, the Nihilism, and the weary pessimism of our times.—Prof. Felix L. Oswald, M.D., in Physical Education.

Or merely the whale's indigestion?

AFTER their return: The baronet: "I see there has been a great fire in New York." The Lady Frances: "In New York? Fancy! We saw New York, didn't we? The baronet: "Why, of course, my dear. We were there a week. Don't you remember an enormous town with ash-barrels and garbage in front of the houses?"

As coffee; 'tis the finest pipe in town!"
Then, Norah, tossing back her hair unkempt,
Replied in tones of withering contempt:
"Meeshom! Phwat's that? It's not worth while to talk Go 'way wid ye!"

"I WANT to know, sah," said an old negro, addressing the governor of Tennessee, "ef dar's any law lyin' 'bout yere ter perteck a man agin bein' hit by aigs an' tomatoes dat's dun got too ripe?" "What's the matter?" the governor asked. "Men hit me wid rotten aigs an' ole tomatoes, I tell you" "Political trouble?" "No, sah, 'ligious. You see da wanted er new preacher down yander at Shady P'int, an' I made my 'rangements wid de committee ter feed de flock. "No, sah, but he led me on inter makin' er bad blunder." "Probably your views agreed with his." "No, sah, da didn', caze he didn' yere er word I said, fur I afterwards found out dat de triflin' scoun'ul wuz fas' ersleep an' wuz noddin' caze he couldn't he'p it. You say dar's some law yere fur me?" "I don't think you need any." "Whut, you gwineter let folks nod in church dis way an' ruin er preacher's prospects?" "I suppose I hav to." "Den I'm ergin you frum dis time on. Good-day ter yer, sah."

To draw or not to draw? that is the question.
Whether 'tis coonier in the mind to venture
The doubtful chance of skinning for a straight,
Or to stand pat against a C of greenbacks,
And then by bluffing, get 'em. To draw—to ante
More. But by that draw, to fill; and end
The tremors and the thousand direful haps
That hands are bare to. 'Tis a consummation
Devoutly to be wished. To draw—to fill!
To fill?—perchance to bust! Aye, there's the rub!
For in that vagrom draw, what cards may come
When we hav shuffled off th' uncertain pack,
Must giv us pause. There's the foul take
That makes calamity of a bob-tailed flush!
For who would stand the blind, the crafty raise,
The wait upon the age, the reckless straddle,
The insolence of pats, the vile, base cards,
The patient player of the dealer takes
When he as well might his spondulics save,
By simply passing? Who would chaffing bear,
Or grunt and fret under a cruel raise,
Forsake his aces up, lay down three queens,
But that the dread of seeing after call
The undiscovered full, against whose might
No flush can stand, puzzles the will,
And makes us rather nurse the chips we hav
Than curious of hands we know not of.
Thus doth the draw make cowards of us all!
And thus a sanguin four-heart speculation
Is sickened with a black, unwelcome club:
And lovely jack-pots of great wealth and moment,
Without the cards, their fortunes turn awry,
Losing the right to open.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 16. No. 5. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY.} New York, Saturday, February 2, 1889. {28 LAFAYETTE PL.} $3.00 per year

ONE VIEW OF THE SUNDAY QUESTION.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Pennsylvania House of Representativs has passed a bill requiring the schoolmasters of the state to hav the American flag wave over their school-houses during school hours. Delinquents to be fined.

AT the Female Suffrage Convention held in Washington last week, Mrs. May Sewell said that during the past few months two hundred and thirteen clubs of women for the study of political economy had been organized.

OVER in Flushing, L. I., a wide-awake evangelist began business by converting one of the wealthiest young ladies of the village, and then running off with her and marrying her. It is a peculiarity of these wandering missionaries that they always look out for "number one." Harrison, the boy preacher, who has returned here for another onslaught upon Satan, has his $100 a week and his board paid at a hotel, and those who assist him are quite as zealous for the conversion of the mighty dollar into their own pockets.

"I HAD to cut out the sinful part of 'Sweet Lavender,'" said Manager Daniel Frohman the other day, "in order to meet the prejudices of New York theater-goers for purity in a drama. The play has been successful ever since the wicked part of it was eliminated. I observe they are now playing 'Lavender' in the Boston Museum precisely as it was written, and with all the details to which New Yorkers objected fully set forth. Nothing could be more indicativ of the queer temper of Boston people. They go to the Boston Museum simply because it is supposed not to be a theater, and yet they giv countenance there to things which a New York audience would not stand. It is, as I say, an odd illustration of Boston's Puritanism."

THE Hastings, Mich., Plaindealer, prints this petition to the legislature of that state: "To the Honorable Legislature of the State of Michigan: We, the undersigned citizens of the state of Michigan, respectfully ask that you will so amend what is called the Sunday law that mortgage and other interest obligations shall not draw interest on the first day of the week. We deem it unjust that the laborer shall be prohibited from earning wealth on the Sabbath to pay interest, and at the same time allow capital to work on that day."

A BILL has been introduced at Albany to authorize the completion of the addition to the building used as the American Museum of Natural History in Central park, the grading of the grounds and the construction of proper drives, pathways, and approaches. For these purposes it is made the duty of the comptroller, on the authorization of the board of estimate and apportionment, to issue bonds or stock of the city to the amount of $400,000 at not exceeding three per cent interest. Let the appropriation bill become a law, says the World, but let it contain a provision requiring the trustees to keep the museum open every Sunday in the year as a consideration for the money. Private museums can be run as their owners please. But public institutions in which the people invest money must be conducted in a manner acceptable and just to the people.

THE legislature of Maine is deluged with petitions in favor of granting the municipal vote to the women of the state. They are signed by people of both sexes, many of them prominent citizens, and the agitation on the subject is vigorously prosecuted. The advocates of the new system point proudly to the facts that women can now vote at municipal elections in Kansas; that they hav the full right of suffrage in Wyoming, and that they are entitled to vote on school questions in fourteen states. The latest reports from Maine lead to the opinion that the petitioners for municipal suffrage for the women of the state hav a good chance of success in the legislature.

THE following bit of court news is from an Eastern paper. The event occurred in Portland, Me.: "There was a sad scene in the municipal court this morning—one seldom witnessed in Maine. Among the crowd of prisoners there was one easily distinguishable from the usual occupants of the pen. His name is Rev. Benjamin F. Pritchard, and he is a regularly ordained minister of the gospel, who has preached throughout the state a great deal. When his name was called to answer to the charge of being drunk last night and beating his wife, he carefully laid aside his silk hat and responded, 'Not guilty.' Then the officer told his story—how the minister was drunk and beating his wife—and when he had finished his testimony the prisoner straightened up, and, executing an impressiv gesture, said, ''Tis false!' Then another officer testified to his being drunk by the smell of his breath. The minister replied that it was due to the rhubarb he had been drinking. His wife, a remarkably pretty woman, interceded for her husband, and the charge of wife-beating was omitted. He was given thirty days in the county jail, but appealed, and was ordered to recognize in $200 for his appearance at the April term of the superior court. As he can secure no bondsmen, it is probable that he will remain in jail until then."

A CORRESPONDENT of the Advance (Cong.) points out some vagaries of Sunday observance as follows: "I am interested in observing the customs of individuals as to the observance of Sunday. I remember very well when I was a boy in my old home that Sunday afternoons in the summer time my father would go out and dig potatoes in the garden or pick cucumbers from the vines, but he would never pick peas or beans. I remember what an abhorrence I had for the neighbors whose boys could be seen picking and shelling peas Sunday afternoon. I do not know but this is drawing the distinction pretty fine and thin, but nevertheless the distinction was thus drawn in my own home. I hav recently seen a similar instance. We hav been putting into our church in Chicago a little book of responsiv readings. A member came to the janitor, who is selling the volumes, Sunday morning, saying that he desired copies for use during the service, that he disliked any pecuniary transactions on the Sabbath, and would pay him the next day. The janitor told me with a smile, 'It is two weeks since he bought the books, but I am still waiting for the cash, and, what is more, I need it.' I invoked mercy to the debtor from the janitor, and refrained from uttering my opposing sentiments as to the moral value of consistency."

Frigid Atheism vs. the Theism of Incomprehensible Intelligence.

There is a principle which is a bar against all argument, and which cannot fail to keep a man in ignorance. This principle is contempt prior to examination.—Paley.

A very large class of people who claim intelligence as a formula of action seem to take a real satisfaction in berating that system of inductiv philosophy known as Atheism. To be considered an Atheist by the popular mind, although no moral taint appears upon one's social record, is equivalent to being known as a criminal, an Anarchist, a disturber of public morals, and in many instances to being treated as such. This sentiment is by no means limited to those who believe in Theism, but obtains with very many who ape popular sentiment in social affairs, but who in reality are in the "toils of unbelief" and the shadow of uncertainty regarding the origin of nature and the continuity of life. The expressions that "Atheism is frigid," "Materialism gross and horrid," and "Spiritualism a stupendous humbug," are the wild invectivs and cheap word artillery of mental weakness.

Our attention was particularly called to the general criticism upon Atheism by an article from E. N. Beecher in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 29, 1888, and feeling that he is in error regarding the philosophy of that system of thought, and believing that he unwittingly makes a mistake in statement and in logical deduction, we will, at the risk of drawing his concentrated Theistic fire, attempt to direct his attention to these, and to lay before him some pertinent truths which he, in common with other Theists, fails to recognize, and which hav an important bearing upon the discussion.

Mr. Beecher would hav us believe that the fundamental ethics of the Atheist is "the denial of the existence of God," and that his favorit apothegm is, "From nothing nothing comes." I will concede that the denial of the existence of a personal God, or an overruling providence, is a conclusion, a mere sentiment indeed, of Atheistic philosophy. It is one of the mathematical sequences to elemental physical science, as we will demonstrate further on, but can hardly be called the principal postulate of modern Atheism; it is rather a logical deduction.

The "favorit apothegm," that "from nothing nothing comes," is not an apothegm with Atheists in particular, but a mathematical truth which all intelligent minds concede, excepting, perhaps, the Theist, who in his overwrought zeal to explain the origin of cosmos upon the Theistic plan, perverts this truism by declaring that "from nothing something comes." Mental perjury is not a besetting sin of Atheism; that characteristic is rather a trait of its opponents who unblushingly ask civilization to accept their unthinkable propositions, and to ignore mental conceptions of integrity in matters of reason and common sense. Let us note in this connection Mr. Beecher's idea of God. He says: "A clear idea of God is associated only with intelligence, and in my humble opinion God is incomprehensible (sic) intelligence." This may seem clear to Mr. Beecher's mind, but we must confess to some misgivings of conscience when we call a hypothesis intelligent which is incomprehensible. We do not doubt Mr. Beecher's integrity of intent in this definition, but it is too ambiguous in Theistic vernacular to be worthy a place on the page of accurate expression. There is this consolation, however, which we extend to our opponent; he is certain of a very large following in his definition of God, and it comprehends the ideas of nearly all the Theistic factors, and it is fully as lucid as any definition before given.

Mr. Beecher says: "Materialism claims the universe—less life—existed anterior to life, and the credulous believers insist mind was the antecedent of the universe." Who are the credulous believers? Certainly not the Materialists. Theists claim mind existed prior to matter, so our friend must be one of "the credulous believers." In reply to this we desire to say that the physiology of brain structure and the logic of mind action disprove this claim. There must be individualized consciousness before we can hav mind, as mind of whatever character is the result of ingoing waves of sentient motion upon consciousness. Whenever any of the avenues of sensation are closed through any circumstance, modes of motion do not evoke sensation in the central structure, hence the conscious principle is not acted upon and there is no mental action, therefore no mind. This truth is fully established in the operating-room of the surgeon, and in numberless experiments extending over a period of two hundred years in hospitals and asylums where diseases and accidents to the sensory structure are treated. The word "mind" is a term applied to mental action, and in the original languages from which it is derived, relates to the intellectual faculties of man. From childhood to old age the vibrations of objectiv nature are projected upon human consciousness through the structure of nervous ganglia and the sensory system, promoting thought and mind, and the continuation of this phenomenon in any avenue of thought evokes reason, comparison, experiment, and the inductiv formulas of biological and cosmic science. Hence, mind is only the result of modes of motion upon the sensory structure of the cerebral organism and consciousness.

It is claimed by many "that mind invents and creates within itself," and therefore "may be a cause as well as an effect." This claim will be seen, upon close analysis, to be an error, for two especial reasons. First, all so-called inventions and creations within the province of mind, are the result of a thought projection upon the conscious principle of the individual. If consciousness (erroneously called the mind) sees subjectivly the invention or improvement clearly, and is able to comprehend it in all of its details, and it seems practical and complete, volition, a servient attribute of consciousness, can put into operation this mental vision. Individuals lacking in this capacity of consciousness, hav not the mind of the inventor and builder. Mind vision depends upon capacity and genius of consciousness. Our second objection to "mind being a cause" is, that, strictly speaking, there is no such thing as "cause and effect" per se, since every phenomenon occurring in nature is the result of many causes and many effects, and herein lies the fundamental issue between Atheism, which accepts only the revelations of nature with her numerous elemental sources of causation, and Theism, which seeks to trace all causation to a single source. In justice to this discussion, let us amplify more fully the claims of Theism, with its speculativ data, that we may contrast it more clearly with the philosophy of Atheism and its scientific truths.

Theism means the doctrin concerning God. The Theist, popularly speaking, believes that "a personal god is the creator of the world, but is independent of it." There are some who claim to be Theists who reject the personality of God, but believe him (sic) to be a spirit, or overruling power. Theists in general accept the Mosaic account of what is called "the creation;" the "creation" in that treatis meaning our planet, the earth in particular. Since the acceptance of the "Copernican theory of cosmos" by the popular mind, Theists and theologians hav extended the boundaries ascribed in "the revealed word," to include the universe as a whole. This is a little rough on Moses and "divine revelation," but Atheists can note the concession and let it pass with a smile. According to the speculations of Theism, all phenomena in space are "only manifestations of the divine will of God." Cataclysms, earthquakes, cyclones, tornadoes, disasters by sea and land, sickness, famin, and death, are "only manifestations of God's providences." When asked for some reason for these dire calamities upon the just as well as the unjust, we are informed that "it is in consequence of sin and Adam's transgression," and that God visiteth the sins of the fathers upon the sons to the fourth generation, and this just and economic process must, of course, include the "divine visitation" of suffering and death upon many good men. Finally, as a clincher, we are told that "God's ways are past finding out."

Contrast this mental drivel and imbecility with the philosophies of Atheism. It plants its banner of intellectual progression upon the rock of scientific induction. It reasons from the known to the unknown. It establishes its hypothesis in the nebular theory of Kant, Laplace, and Herschel, not in a "handful of primal germs" as Mr. Beecher claims. The ablest expounders of Atheism are evolutionists. The nebulous matter of which our sun and earth are composed, contains all of the chemical forces of nature, as modes of molecular motion which constitute the various elements of visible and invisible nature. Already, though retarded by Theistic bigotry, zeal, and persecution, our savants hav placed the symbol of chemical individuality upon sixty-five primal elements and factors of cosmic causation; and the end to discovery in this direction is not yet. Of the elements already known, repeated chemical and spectrum analysis establish their identity, and the principles underlying chemical equations prove their molecular structure to be automatic. In continuation of this line of scientific discovery, Galileo formulated the fundamental laws of Dynamics. Herschel, Laplace, Kant, and Newton amplified this truth; Newton's further discovery that "the celestial bodies in their movement are a mathematical necessity" is a grim commentary on the omnipotence of the Theistic god. As if to wipe out the last vestige of Theistic superstition, the great discovery by Lavoisier of "the chemical balance," and his deduction that "in nature nothing is created, nothing lost," hav found a place as truisms in the schools and colleges of the civilized world.

Let us ask Mr. Beecher, if his "God of incomprehensible intelligence" figures so potentially in the structure of matter and form, why do we hav this automatic equilibrium in chemical balance; and why dynamical law in the structure of atoms as well as in cosmic systems? Dynamical law of cosmic equilibrium is only continuation of the grand truth of Lavoisier's chemical balance. Does integrity consist, let me ask, in ascribing a fetich to a molecular equipoise? Are honor and morality conserved by declaring a God actuating matter that repeated chemical analysis disproves? It is time that civilization inquires, who are these Theistic Infidels (not faithful to the revelations of nature) that ask us to perjure our senses and renounce the demonstrations of physical science? Theism, with its careless platitudes and cheap certificates of morality, has held sway too long, and intelligence demands that a truth take its place. A truth which demonstrates man's relation to nature, and his mental organization for continued progression; a truth which educes that high moral character is not attained by a belief in gods, but by the evolution of man's intellectual nature, through which alone he rises superior to groveling appetite and sensuous desire.

Mr. Beecher informs us that when Atheists hav answered the questions: What is electricity? What is attraction of gravitation? and What is life? they can perhaps convert the civilized world to their horrid Materialism. We grant you and your compeers that the work of conversion in this instance is a most arduous undertaking and fraught with questionable mental difficulties, since our first labor must be directed toward the civilization of Theism. With that mental weakness dispelled, success would soon emblazon the records of time. Without desiring to be considered an egotist, or thought "horrid," we will answer all of these questions consecutivly. First, What is electricity? Ans. It is an expression of a plus molecular force or activity. Second, What is the attraction of gravitation? Ans. The phenomenon of molecular and cosmic equilibrium demonstrated by "the chemical balance." Third, What is life? Ans. It is that sentient evolution of life principle formed by the blending of those automatic chemical forces that project being. It has its individual vibratory rate in harmony with a law of propagation, and in accord with analogous principles of evolution. Life is manifest throughout the entire range of vegetable and animal nature, from embryotic and fetus, to integral form; and whether vegetal, instinctiv, or sentient, is the resultant of those formativ forces or principles which underlie all plasmatic integrations. Its potential premis obtains in molecular motion, and the tendency in matter to higher form. We assure Mr. Beecher that these answers are "not mere stories," but the inductions of physical and biological science.

Ripon, Wis. W. M. LOCKWOOD.

Able Threshing of Old Straw.

Our free trade friends appear to think that we hav not given the tariff question all the attention that should reasonably be desired. Being on the winning side, and prepared for every emergency, we should afford to stay by them until they are perfectly satisfied, though they should require us to keep up the fusillade, or gasconade, right straight along until after the next presidential election. The assumption that the tariff is a pauper-breeding institution comes with shocking bad grace from those who are continually carping about our importing "pauper labor" from free trade Europe, and is suggestiv of the question, What has pauperized the labor of Europe?

Like cause should produce like effect everywhere, conditions being equal. I think we hav the cause, but not the conditions, and will suggest in this connection that pauper-breeding is the only home industry I am aware of that is likely to be facilitated by free trade.

So long as the entire wealth of the world is owned and controled by a comparativly few, as it always will be if owned at all, the working people cannot reasonably hope to realize any other than an incidental benefit from business transactions, that will be awarded in consideration of their labor, and will usually be the least that they can be persuaded or compelled to accept, and much of that will be extorted from them by various devices. Therefore, when a man endeavors to persuade us that working people will be especially benefited either by a high tariff, low tariff, or no tariff, he givs us good cause to suspect him of being either a knave or an ignoramus. If he is a partisan demagog, we should readily determin which peg to hang him on.

We hav a country that is capable of yielding a greater abundance and variety of products suitable for manufacturing than any other country on the globe; therefore the proper question for working people and their advocates to determin should be, whether it will serve their interests best to send these abroad to be manufactured by "pauper labor," foreign machinery and capital, at a cost of more than a hundred per cent for transportation, commission, and profits, besides the labor; or, to manufacture them ourselvs, and save the hundred per cent cost for employers? I think it better to make millionaires by saving than by plundering either by force or fraud. Hence, I am a protectionist.

The thought comes to me that British statesmen suggested some years ago that England would need protection from American competition unless something was done to prevent such a calamity. Something was done. A firebrand was projected among us, evidently intended to disrupt our national organization, and was lighted at one end with free trade hallucination, and at the other with Abolition fanaticism, and was vigorously fanned until it culminated in our late internal war, when chattel slavery was abolished and protection was demonstrated to be capable of making us a really free and independent nation; that no people can be so long as they are under the necessity of sending their material abroad to be manufactured for them by "pauper labor" in a foreign country, and especially not in time of war. Therefore the ability to do our own manufacturing and utilize the advantage that nature has given us is well worth the cost of our protectiv system, even if all that the advocates of free trade say of it is true, which I am not prepared to admit by a large majority.

At the close of our internal war, the English branch of the Anglo-American conspiracy to disrupt our nationality sent a delegation over here, probably to confer with their conspirators on this side; anyhow, they reported that free trade was dead in the United States. But now that the world is overstocked with all kinds of fabrics, causing a depression in all branches of trade, they evidently hope to resuscitate their old issue by persuading us that the universal stagnation is caused by our protectiv tariff, and if we accept free trade, the excess will disappear as if by magic, and everybody will hav full employment and high wages, and buy everything they need at less than the cost of the labor to procure it. That looks like exaggeration, I admit, but I think it is not. We are informed that our manufacturers are selling some goods at a less price than the English can sell like goods in their own home market, and that free trade will enable us to buy them at half their present price, and will not affect the price of labor. I think that is promising too much.

Will somebody inform us how many Freethinkers there were among the Pennsylvania miners when they were earning $130 to $200 per month? Having been educated from childhood not to think at all, they are not the kind of material that Freethinkers are usually made of. The education of American farmers on that racket has been sadly neglected. It were hardly necessary to pay much attention to it anyhow, for they hav but little time to think of anything but how to get a living and keep a roof over their heads in this "land of the free and home of the brave." They evidently need protection—not from foreign competition, but from home extortion—and are beginning to comprehend the fact that nothing but abolition of ownership to some extent will adequately protect them. But I will suggest that ownership is either a just or an unjust principle. If just, it should be universal, and the exercise of the rights that inhere in it should be unrestricted. If unjust, it should not be tolerated within any limits.

My thanks are due to my fellow-townsman, E. O. Roscoe, for his highly complimentary letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 19th inst. I presume he is well aware of the obvious fact that his quibbles are not arguments, nor do they controvert anything. But inasmuch as they indicate a good will to controvert the facts and arguments if controvertible, the offering of them is a virtual admission that the facts and arguments are incontrovertible. Thanks. Having virtually admitted and indorsed all my propositions and arguments, I shall fail to see the consistency or propriety of his complaining that "these Protectionists do need such a lot of instruction and correction," etc., unless he desires to create the impression that his liberality impels him to generously bestow upon others that which he himself has the most need of. It is because Mr. Tuttle does know that imports are paid for with exports that he proposes that we supply ourselvs with that we hav been importing and hav that for our own profit that we would otherwise export at a heavy discount. His charging Lord Brougham and others over my shoulders with being ignorant of the state of affairs in England at the time of the advent of free trade is suggestiv of idiocy or insanity. They distinctly asserted in Parliament that England then "had a protectiv tariff that was well-nigh prohibitory. Half of her manufacturing population was idle and the other half was on half time, and all England was starving." I think they could hav excepted present company, but these free trade advocates cannot afford to tell the whole truth even when they hav the best of the argument.

It is hardly possible that such a condition of affairs could exist in any country permanently whose agricultural resources are equal to all demands upon them, which the agricultural resources of England notoriously are not. Hence foreign commerce and free trade had become an absolute necessity to England, but it cannot reasonably be pretended that such a necessity is existing in this country or is likely to in the near future. Our manufacturing industries are susceptible of being made equal to all demands upon them if fostered and encouraged by adequate protection. And it is notorious that home competition is equally as potent as foreign competition to keep prices at a minimum. Therefore, we hav no rational pretense for accepting free trade prematurely or at all, except the protection of foreign industries from American competition. And the American who will advocate free trade for that purpose is a traitor to his country, and his innocent dupes should take refuge in our insane asylums until permanently cured of the free trade hallucination.

Commerce is a bargain frequently analogous to that the highwayman offers his victim. Nobody supposes that the English and French waged war upon China and Japan for a bootless victory. The commercial treaties they forced from those nations by the law of "stand and deliver" were supposed to be a sufficient remuneration. J. A. TUTTLE.

Economic Progress.

Having read and admired the communication entitled, "Social Economy," by your interesting contributor H. W. Hammond, I submit the following, partly in reply and partly by way of amplifying the discussion.

Much that your contributor urges with reference to the indifference of Liberals toward social inequality is true—too true. Freethinkers are too willing to believe that the prevailing superstition is the one grand citadel of mental despotism about which should mass the legions of intellectual progress, and slow to see and realize in their entirety the conditions which render possible and shape the galling injustice and inequalities that continue to afflict society. I agree with Mr. Hammond when he says that the duty of a Liberal is double—to free the intellect, to free the animal; but he appears to fail to comprehend an important item in the value of the effort toward ridding the world of the nightmare of theology.

Religion, or a belief in the supernatural, at the present time comes from heredity, and is little else than a species of collectiv insanity. This condition of things simply proves that the human mind is in a state of transition, and is as yet but ill prepared for anything like an advanced condition of intellectual or material prosperity. If men were honest, notably those who shape opinion, this condition of affairs would rapidly disappear. But alas, alas! Mr. Hammond asks: "Does any sensible Liberal imagin that the complete extirpation of theology and its concomitant disadvantages would benefit the world economically to any appreciable extent? Would poverty decrease? Crime diminish? Would it hav a tendency to check the mighty waste of wealth in luxury and dissipation, and turn it to productivness? Would it change the tide and make the poor grow richer and the rich poorer?" Well, no; I am willing to admit that such a consummation would scarcely bring about this beneficent change. Nevertheless, this negativ innovation would go far in clearing the way toward establishing these positiv blessings.

When the thoughtful mind pauses a moment to reflect, it is easily seen that the one overshadowing obstacle in the path of social reform lies in the fact that the human mind is distracted and led away from the tangible evils that afflict us by a slavish fealty to both theological and political superstition; and until this blind adherence to creed and party and public opinion be banished from the mind, there can be absolutely no hope for a better condition of society. Even while I write this, here in a civilized village of the enlightened commonwealth of Illinois, a Christian "revival" of hoodooism is in progress, which has already culminated in an odious puritanical Sunday law. See despotic Russia with her millions of population in want and degradation, her appalling code of penal laws, and her army of exiles! How is it possible to bring relief to these people so long as their leisure time is occupied in kneeling before shrines and kissing the rotten teeth and bones of saints? Look at poor, priest-ridden Ireland, occupying the garden spot of the world, and surrounded by modern civilization, lying prostrate before a foreign power and subsisting on the broken victuals of her enemies, yet whose thoughts are principally engaged on how best to please and propitiate a tyrant in Italy!

Witness throughout enlightened Europe the slavish adoration shown toward monarchy and royalty, and even in our own country the degree of respect and condescension extended to wealth and material power. How often in "free" America do we hold elections which only result in the triumph and ascendency of economic principles antagonistic to the welfare of the people and the advanced thought of our time?

The true solution of the difficulty lies here: Freethinkers should never cease their efforts toward negativ destruction so long as superstition, either religious or political, stands enthroned and fortified in the human mind. When this is accomplished, we can proceed with reasonable hope of success in the work of positiv building up. But in the mean time we should be laying the foundation for the new order of things. Ring out the old, ring in the new.

Above all we should endeavor to establish by painstaking research and absolute honesty correct opinions in political economy, refusing to hav our conclusions shaped by newspaper editorials. Explore occasionally the sources of the streams of knowledge. Endeavor to keep reasonably well informed with regard to the advanced thought of the age by reading occasionally a book culled from the lists given by periodicals like THE TRUTH SEEKER, the North American Review, Popular Science Monthly, and the New York Standard. The Clergy Complaining of Clerical Dishonesty.

I happened lately into an assembly composed of clergymen of various denominations. In the course of the informal interview, several spoke of the alarming increase of dishonesty in their ranks. Mention was made of a class of preachers removing from place to place, and when all credit was gone in one parish seeking another. Names were given of parties who hav habitually done this for thirty or forty years. Instances were mentioned where money was borrowed of the unsuspecting poor, all their savings of many years; and sometimes great privation and suffering were occasioned by the rascality. A doctor of divinity was named who had carried on his tricks for many years, from place to place, living always extravagantly, issuing orders in various directions for gold and silver ornaments, and foremost in borrowing money at fashionable summer resorts. He was finally arrested for getting money under false pretenses, but his tears, entreaties, and the influence of the clergy, released him. Now, the clergy at large knew generally of that man's antecedents in adjoining towns and counties, and far through the state; knew that in one village he owed a poor widow, who supplied his family with milk, nearly $100. She was relying upon this sale for some necessary things for her children, but, with long waiting, received not a single farthing. The clergy knew that the arrival of the doctor of divinity would be followed by his usual fleecing of all who would trust him. But not a warning note was given.

Another of the company said he had been astonished in his travels, and among his home acquaintances, to find how largely this question was engaging the attention of business men; that his own grocerman had said to him, "Don't send me any clerical customers."

Another, a visitor from Philadelphia, said, "Dr. Blank receives as much salary as any man in the city, and yet he seems to be so largely pressed by creditors that a majority of his people are clamoring for his resignation."

Not long since, the daily papers gave notice of a bishop who was sued and compelled to pay a small sum.

Now, this dishonesty has become so extensiv as to be an alarming sign of the times. I can now but call attention to it, but will giv in full statistics and items if the clergy desire. We all know that there are many noble and self-sacrificing pastors; but since the churches offer to lazy young men to support them, and pay for ten years all their expenses at school, college, and seminary, if they will become candidates for the ministry, they are tempting an idle and worthless class into the pulpit. These young dudes, supported by charity for ten years, are tempted, when left to themselvs, to questionable methods for money-getting. U. C.?

Cranks.

I see that "A Liberal," of Worcester, Mass., has been giving you "Some Opinions on Liberalism." "A Liberal" has a right to his opinions. So has another Liberal to "his'n." One of the former is that the word Infidel must be expunged from our vocabulary. One of the latter is that the word Infidel can't be expunged; and that there would be no advantage in expunging it if it could. It is a word borne by thousands as an honorable distinction. And why not? An Infidel means an unbeliever. To believe is to hold something you don't know as firmly as if you did know it. Why be ashamed of not doing this? "A Liberal" thinks the friendship and coöperation of Spiritualism must be courted. I don't object. But how does this proposition agree with his next, "The cranks must be controled?" Who are the cranks? Thousands of Liberals would say the Spiritualists. If they are to be controled, how is their friendship to be courted? "A Liberal" thinks cranks belong to the Shaksperian age. Surely a fair description of those who believe that

> A couple of ghostises
> Sat upon postises.

But, from other allusions to cranks in his paper, I should infer that "A Liberal" would regard Mrs. Besant as a very fair specimen of a crank. How does his proposal to control such specimens harmonize with his other proposition that we should hav some live issues? A proposition which I heartily indorse. It is the mark of a crank to hav live issues; and the mark of live issues to hav cranks. When a live issue ceases to interest cranks it livs no more. Liberalism cannot afford to control cranks. They are the breath of its nostrils; the very differentia which separate it from conservatism. I heartily agree with "A Liberal," however, that the creeds of the church should be left to die of old age and our efforts directed against the organization. Always direct efforts against organizations. In the noble language of Connemara, "Wherever you see a head—hit it!"

A Secular Revival in Minnesota.

For some time Brother Marlett, whose duties take him to Minneapolis each week, has been on a still hunt for Liberals to inaugurate a Secular Society in the latter city, and he discovered several, who were finally drawn together and became enthusiastic for organization. Foremost among these was John Maddock, a stalwart Freethinker, physically and intellectually, and who, I had heard, held down the ministers of Minneapolis through the press, occasionally hiring a hall or opera house to reply to some particularly erroneous or malicious sermonizer. Messrs. Greaves & Lownd, both bright, intelligent business men, took up the question with enthusiasm, and their importing and jobbing house on Nicollet avenue has for some days been alive with Liberal work. Partners and half brothers, they are a unit in sympathy with the American Secular Union, and propose to firmly plant the standard of Universal Mental Liberty in the fairest city of Minnesota.

Some preliminary meetings had been held, and Brother Marlett offering to secure my transportation over the Wisconsin Central line, so that I could more thoroughly explain the attitude and object of the Union, an invitation was sent me to lecture, to which I gladly responded.

Friday night, the 19th, we whirled out of Chicago, and I found, to my surprise, that the Wisconsin Central can boast of as creditably equipped a road as any in the Northwest, although it has been in operation only two years.

Saturday afternoon we passed through St. Paul en route to Minneapolis, and the first thing to attract a stranger's attention was the fur overcoats in which men were attired, giving them the appearance of perambulating bears or stuffed buffalo robes out on a masquerade. The children even wore highly colored toboggan suits in the streets. As it is seldom a favorable impression is obtained from railway tracks of the beauty of a city, I charitably kept that fact in mind in reference to St. Paul. High on one bluff or promontory could be discerned the palatial residence of some magnate, whose minaret-like towers pointed ambitiously upward, but looking down the eye meets the "flats," a sort of scooped-out gully where shanties appear to hav been thrown with particular regard to promiscuity, as no two stand at the same angle. The inhabitants pay $1 per month for ground rent, and throw up their own shanties, seemingly more like pig-pens than habitations for human beings. Little wonder such occupants are lured with stories about houses with many mansions.

A short ride and we are in the "Modern Marvel," Minneapolis, a city scarcely more than a score of years old, a young suburban stripling which has far eclipsed its ancient, saintly sister—but as the saints are generally getting left, St. Paul cannot expect to be made an exception.

We had little time to more than eat supper and visit the barber—as we were warned that Minneapolis ministers allowed no competition in shaving the public on Sunday—before it was time to attend the business meeting in the handsome parlors of the Eastman block. Brother Greaves being secretary of an association meeting there, he secured these luxurious quarters for the Liberals. A pretty silk flag was fastened above a gilt cross, symbolizing the Secular Union motto, "Our Flag Above the Cross."

Among those assembled we met an old acquaintance, W. G. H. Smart, formerly of Boston, who has been in a sort of monastic retirement in Dakota for the past four years, one of the ablest writers on economics I ever read. Readers of the Investigator, Index, and other Liberal journals will well remember him. He cheerfully responded to the call for Secular workers. Mr. George Davis, author of a new theory on the origin of "Life and Species, and Their Distribution," was also there to be enroled.

Dr. and Mrs. Van Damm were activ participants in the formation of the Society, and are Liberals of the cultured class. Mr. Curtis, who acted as a temporary secretary, is one of the grand guard of the old League, as is also Mr. Macomber, whose years hav not impaired his health, mind, or enthusiasm. Years ago he shook up the judges and courts in this city by refusing to swear when drawn on a jury, and the agitation which followed doubtless resulted in the favorable law which Minnesota has since adopted. Mr. West has been reading THE TRUTH SEEKER, which accounts both for his interest and for his heresy. I was also introduced to a young Mr. Stevens, who, I hope, will in Secular work follow my example.

Mrs. John Maddock is an earnest, cordial, motherly matron, anxious that her charming daughters, whom, as I did not learn their names, I will call our Artemis and Aphrodite, shall learn something of the moral lesson of nature, from which there is little fear they will ever backslide. The young ladies are brimful of brilliance and vivacity.

By some misapprehension, the committee on whom devolved the duty of reporting a name, constitution, etc., had reported in favor of naming the organization the Radical Club. However, after a brief exhortation, showing the demand for a national organization to combat the encroachments of church and state, the committee magnanimously and unanimously withdrew their report, and the Secular Society of Minneapolis, a regularly chartered auxiliary of the American Secular Union, with by-laws and constitution drawn up in accordance therewith, was soon an accomplished fact. The meeting remained to a late hour listening to the secretary, who in an informal manner related what the national organization had accomplished in the past, what it was doing now, and the work it had outlined for the future.

Next day Brothers Maddock, Lownd, Marlett, and the writer dined at the Windsor, where I learned something of the remarkable history of Brother Maddock, which would furnish ample material for a first-class romance, as fact is, after all, stranger than fiction. When a boy in his teens he was on a British transport before Sebastopol, in the Crimean war, and helped to carry the wounded from the hospital at Scutari. After that he was in the British naval service, and has seen nearly every country and every clime on the globe, affording opportunities of personal observation and comparison which are a rich mine of wealth to the man of activ mind. Brother Maddock still believes that truth ever sails to windward.

An afternoon lecture having been arranged, I had the pleasure of greeting Brother H. C. Draver, whom we appointed as the executiv member for Minnesota, and who had come down from Stillwater to attend the lectures. Brother Draver is a young man of brilliant attainments, having graduated at the German Freethinkers' Academy of Milwaukee. He is thoroughly alive to Secular interests. As a clerk in a large manufacturing concern he is doubtful whether he can spare the time for the duties, but his desire is for the good of the cause.

I had intended to giv my lecture on Romanism, but by request gave "Reasons in Denial of a Personal Creator," at which Mr. Maddock presided. I prefaced my remarks by stating the attitude of the American Secular Union, giving those present to understand my views were not necessarily those to which members of the Union were expected to subscribe, as the organization, outside the Nine Demands, represented no special beliefs, but stood for the rights of all.

The leading journal of that city, the Tribune, devoted nearly a column to a very fair and impartial report of the afternoon lecture, and prefaced it by remarking:

> The Liberals of Minneapolis were treated to two addresses yesterday by E. A. Stevens, of Chicago, secretary of the American Secular Union. Mr. Stevens is one of the brightest writers in the country on the subject of Liberalism, and he has had an interesting life. At the age of fourteen he ran away from home and joined a cousin who commanded a detachment under Colonel Peard, "Garibaldi's Englishman." He was afterward sent home, and upon the death of his grandmother, apparently the only attachment that held him to England, he came to America, where he served the last year of the Rebellion. He is considered authority on Secularism, and is a contributor to several Freethought publications. The subject of his afternoon lecture was, "Reasons in Denial of a Personal Creator."

In concluding its report the Tribune quoted:

> The primal principle of Christianity is at once a promis and a threat. "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; he that believeth not shall be damned," places a premium on crime. I would rather be damned with intellectual men and women, who hav the courage to reject what seems contrary to their reason and sense of right, than be saved with those who dare not investigate. Prayer and praise are the words of worship Christians employ. They build costly churches in which they tell the creator how great and glorious he is, and how miserable the men and women he created are. This is a doubtful compliment to the creator, and would be an insult, if he was capable of being insulted. This creator of Christianity consigns all human beings after death to two localities—heaven or hell—one a place of happiness, the other of torment. The road to the first is a narrow, contracted, little, moss-grown, miserable tow-path, while the other has to hav broad-gage double tracks for its enormous traffic, with a terminus at the sulphur springs. This comforting religion requires us to believe that countless millions will suffer unending torment; that our dearest friends, if not converted, will be elected to this fate. What a consolation for those who imagin they are not going to get left! This revelation indorses the barbarism of the Jews. It treats women as slaves, made for man's gratification and convenience. The death of our friend Jesus will neither diminish our guilt nor satisfy the demands of justice. Evolution, the basis of Rationalism, is the excelsior of humanity. It is the doctrin of hope and cheer.

The evening lecture was reported in the same cordial and candid manner, and it is evident that the most important paper in Minneapolis is beyond the pale of bigotry and prejudice, at least its reporter is. I cannot do better than take the Tribune report of the evening lecture:

> The evening lecture in Plummer Post Hall was well attended. The subject, "God in the State," was calculated to explain the objects of the Secular movement. After a few introductory remarks, Mr. Stevens said:
> The primary factor which called the American Secular Union into activity was the National Reform Association, which proposed to amend the Constitution of the United States so as to suitably acknowledge almighty God the author of the nation's existence and ultimate source of its authority, Jesus Christ as its ruler, and the Bible as the supreme rule of its conduct, and thus indicate that this is a Christian nation, and place all Christian laws, institutions, and usages on an undeniable legal basis in the fundamental law of the land.
> This amendment brought out appeals, arguments, and censure from the Freethought press, and on Oct. 17, 1875, a few delegates met in Philadelphia and formed a preliminary organization. On July 4, 1876, the National Liberal League was organized. Its purpose was to oppose the amendment of church and state proposed by the God-in-the-state party. These Liberals reaffirmed that this republic was designed to be divided from all religious dogma of Christianity, or any other sect or creed. Activ measures were taken to defeat the amendment and the movement was successful.
> The speaker then gave a number of illustrations showing how religion had been introduced in courts of justice and other public institutions, and people in different parts of the country had been persecuted under outrageous Sunday laws. He opposed the reading of the Bible in public schools, because Jews and Catholics are obliged to listen to Protestant teachings. One of the illustrations showed that the commissioners of the District of Columbia, the headquarters of our national capital, formulated a new code for its "good government" whereby dogs must not bark, cocks dare not crow, and hens must not cackle; there is to be neither whisky-driuking nor cooking on that day; soda-water, when used medicinally, may be by special dispensation taken in small doses, but whisky must be laid in Saturday night; milkmen must not cry "milk," beat gongs, or ring bells, although the Salvationists' trombones and tamborines may raise the devil.
> Nearly every state has laws enforcing Sabbath observance, a glaring example of church and state union, and a manifest outrage on the conscience of anti-Christians. A still more striking illustration of this unholy union is the exemption from taxation of church property. Over $700.000,000 of church property is now exempt from taxes amounting to about $10,000,000, of which the people are defrauded year by year.
> Speaking on the subject of public schools, Mr. Stevens said:
> Our public schools are the main pillar of our republic. In them no sectarianism should be taught. A Protestant preacher demands that we purge our schools of these Catholic intruders, yet begins each day's exercises by reading a chapter of God's word and a prayer. Most Protestants want the King James edition because it teaches Protestantism, while the Catholics oppose it because it does not teach the tenets of their sect. From this Protestant blunder the time is coming when the Catholics will hav turned the tables, for if they increase in the future as they hav in the past, in 1900 they will hav a majority, and, as Father Hecker says, they will take this country and keep it. Then our children will be debauched by such driveling idiocy as is prevalent in such ultra-Catholic countries as Spain and Italy, where intellectuality has been almost eliminated and credulity has reached its highest point. We should resolve ourselvs into an aggressiv, educativ, organizing propaganda for total separation of church and state; taxation of church property; abolition of Sunday laws and chaplaincies; secularization of public schools; security of all citizens in their equal rights and privileges, without regard to their beliefs and disbeliefs.
> At the close of the address the speaker urged those present to become members of the Union and work against what they regard as wrong.

Quite a number responded to the appeal, among whom were Mr. and Mrs. Brockman. The latter, having attended our Chicago meetings, was more than pleased to see a similar movement in Minneapolis. I had also the pleasure of meeting Mr. Corbet, a TRUTH SEEKER reader and ardent lover of liberty. The audience very generally came forward to sign a protest against the Blair Sunday bill.

Bright and early Monday morning Mr. Maddock drove up to the hotel to show me the glories of Minneapolis, and when Brother Lownd had invested me in a fur-lined overcoat, it was concluded that, like Ajax, I was ready to defy the elements. It was gray, frosty, and misty, and it required no great stretch of the imagination to conjure up phantoms of Ossian's heroes doing battle in the heavy-hanging, snow-laden clouds, or seeking fir-trees for spears under the ghostly guidance of some Fingal of the north. As we drove on, I paid little heed to locality, passing beautiful temples of superstition, massiv marts of trade, the finest hotel (said to be) on the American continent, and palatial residences, where but a few years ago wolves in plenty prowled and, possibly, nightly howled. Nineteen years ago, when Mr. Maddock came to this city, not a house was erected over all the space we rode; only a few shanties occupied the splendid main avenue, now as fine a drive as any boulevard. The residences being erected are particularly fine, largely running to the castellated order, having Norman towers, turrets, miniature battlements and embrasures.

Can the imagination take in a panoramic generalization from the landing of the persecuted and persecuting Pilgrims on that rock-bound coast of Plymouth—men who fled from death at the gibbet through religious persecution, and whose spirit and tendency are still manifest to-day—to this modern marvel of the Western World?

How little these Pilgrims knew that, in spite of Blue laws or witch-burning, the great broadening continent stretching out thousands of miles would through that great underlying law, necessity, sweep away their tenets as they would hav swept out cobwebs! The stroke of the first ax made by willing but unskilled hands foretold the aggressiv efforts of man the conqueror. The clearing of the way for this western empire made man more and more conscious of his powers and capacities, and, consequently, less credulous of creeds.

We halt on one side of the mighty Mississippi, whose voice and motion is very pacific, and my worthy guide proceeds to explain how this great river has been harnessed up by man to perform ceaseless labor for these vast flouring-mills. Another mill-race is being made, so we look into the rocky cavity, which suggests Byron's line:

To gaze on the torrent that thundered beneath.

As this was not the great Pittsburgh mill, Brother Maddock, who holds the responsible position of purchasing agent for this vast milling aggregation, the largest interest of the character on the globe, hastened me over the river to a mill claimed to be the eighth wonder of the world, because it grinds about 10,000,000 bushels yearly; has a capacity of 7,000 barrels daily; makes more flour than any two mills on the globe; could feed two cities as large as New York; and 200 cars are daily required to take wheat in and flour out of these mills, whose combined capacity is 10,500 barrels.

I was astonished to learn that wheat ground in this mill goes through 175 different processes. Brother Maddock took me from floor to floor, explaining minutely the machinery, but as the building itself was filled with a continuous monotonous, subdued, "whirring" sound, I could not comprehend half he said. He showed me the turbine wheels, the powerful gearing, the conveyors, separators, cyclone dust-sifters, bolters, and every conceivable device, but when I got through I could not tell whether I was a conveyor, a separator, a grinder, or a bolter—more likely the latter—as that "whirr," "whirr," was still omnipresent. Machinery, to my mind, was always very much of a muddle.

Out of a trap-door at the roof we went to behold the beauties of the city lying innocently at our feet, but as it was one of those and looked so helpless-like, I considerately refrained from concocting a scheme to carry it back to Chicago, and left the whole business untouched for the Minnesotans, who had a narrow escape, especially the owner of a fur-lined overcoat.

Breezy, incense-breathing morns,

One marvel of the mills I should hav mentioned was that everything works automatically. They hav an automatic fire service, which will deluge the floors whether anyone is in the building or not. Elevator doors close automatically, machinery fills the sacks and barrels, and there appears but one handicraft left for human skill—nailing up the barrel-heads, and the rapidity with which they do it is wonderful. Great skill and accuracy is attained in this.

I regretfully learned that Fort Snelling was only five miles distant, and as Major Forwood is stationed there I felt doubly sorry I could not meet our military vice-president.

At 1:15 my train was ready, and though the Opera House was burning down as we passed through St. Paul, I could not stop to save it, as the Paine anniversary was fast approaching and other important work was awaiting.

Well pleased with my visit, I earnestly desire that Minneapolis Secularists will show an unflinching and undaunted front, and, besides the pleasant memories of my sojourn, a grand purpose will hav been given a splendid impetus.

E. A. STEVENS, Sec. A. S. U.

Our Female Daniel Come to Judgment.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav been thinking that the readers of our paper would forget me if I did not write something as a reminder that I still liv. As I read yours of the 19th inst., I perceived Brother Parrish had been waiting for me to act as "general investigator" in the case of Everett vs. Knights of Labor for over two years. That is too bad. If I had only known that such service was expected of me, I should hav had that matter adjusted long ago. However, judging from the letter from the recording secretary of the Local Assembly 4,204, I fear it would not hav been to the liking of Brother Parrish that my judgment would hav been rendered. It is a fact that some of my Atheistic brothers are as dogmatic and unjust as are those they oppose. If Everett did as claimed in that letter, he should hav been repelled as he was. The placing of a book on a table does not require a Bible, and I never saw one used. A spelling book or a novel would do just as well, so far as any requirement of the order is concerned, as it is never read, nor expected to be read, and it was out of place in anyone to object, no matter what the book was, as religion, or irreligion, was equally out of place in the assembly room. There may be some assemblies, or some leaders in the order, who are under church domination, but so far as the law of the order is concerned, I will state explicitly, as one who knows, that there is less of a religious character in the order of the Knights of Labor than in any other organization (with the exception of the Secular Union) I know of in the country. It is more thoroughly secular than the government itself. There are no chaplains, no oaths, no prayers. The Bible is nowhere referred to, nor its authority recognized, hence, I say, a wise man would hav found no fault with anyone who placed a Bible on the table any more than if the "Age of Reason," or a TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, had been placed there. I am known throughout the order as an Atheist, and, still worse, a Spiritualist, and yet I am always treated with respect, and I think the reason for it is, I respect other people in their rights to their opinions, as I wish them to me. Some Atheists, as well as the Christians, fail to remember to do this. The order was founded for the sole and only purpose of aiding in emancipating the toilers from the clutches of greed, irrespectiv of class or creed, hence the wisdom of barring the door against religious disputation. And a master-workman who knew his proper business would at once silence anyone who might so far forget himself as to speak against any form of religion, or in favor of it. Any person who takes the obligation of a Knight knows this, and if he is not satisfied to thus act he can peaceably withdraw without offending anyone. I feel complimented by the allusion of Brother Parrish to my feelings for the Anarchists, with which feeling, I judge from his tone, he has no sympathy, and yet one of these condemned men was a Knight of Labor—an Atheist most pronounced—and still, as long as he lived, was a member in good standing in both local and district assemblies where he lived, and the ignorance and cowardice of his brothers in the order was one of the strands in the rope wherewith he was strangled. The time will come when those whose cowardice caused them to refuse to even ask clemency on the ground of general mercy, will be looked upon with scorn and contempt, while those who faced death so heroically—martyrs to the right of free speech—will be remembered with increasing admiration as the years roll by.

JULIET H. SEVERANCE, M.D.

Milwaukee, Jan. 21, 1889.

Mrs. Holmes's Complaint.

I think I am misrepresented in your number of January 19th, or perhaps misunderstood. This is so easy to do where the critic givs only his own criticisms, leaving the reader to judge or guess at the original article. If everyone who reads your remarks could also read "What Is Secularism?" I should "rest my case." As it is, I wish only to say I never advocated and do not wish that "Liberals should giv up Liberalism and devote their time and talents to economic reform." I would like to see Liberals Liberal, and not think that when the Bible is exposed and the gods demolished all of "Liberalism" is accomplished.

"Giv up" no truth; but if the freeing of one's mind does not lead one to investigate the wrongs of our "Christian" civilization and to endeavor to make this world a better place to liv in, the mind is freed to no purpose. People will not be in a fit state of mind to find out whether my economic principles or anyone else's are the proper things to adopt, if they giv such subjects no study whatever until "Liberalism" or universal Infidelity prevails. My principles or those of my friends are not up for discussion. I do not ask Infidels to "adopt" them; but I do expect of advanced thinkers that when they are clear from old superstitions they will investigate the real world in which they liv, make a study of the conditions of society and the underlying causes of so much unnecessary suffering and poverty, and then draw their own conclusions, adopt their own theories. I expect them to be as Liberal toward such subjects as they think the church ought to be to them, so that discussion may bring out the truth.

I was one of the first members of the old Chicago Liberal League, and know that in the first declaration of principles was a clause saying in effect that no subject of a religious, scientific, industrial, or social nature should be denied a hearing on that platform. Now you are granted free speech "within certain limits;" if you are wise enough to know where the line will be drawn, you may consider yourself well off.

I do believe Universal Mental Liberty precedes economic liberty, but, as I said in the Alarm, I believe mental liberty is practically gained. Even members of orthodox churches are broad in their views, and few define their religious beliefs anywhere near within the old boundary lines of orthodox faith.

I know very many church-members—orthodox as is usual in these days—who are deeply interested in economic agitation, and devote time, money, and talents to the cause. I am acquainted with many Infidels who use all their powers against religion but hav only sneers for every other reform that comes up; and a bigoted Infidel is as bad as a bigoted Christian, and almost as common.

I do not decry the work of the Secular Union. I only ask them to go further with their free minds and do the work in society that is crying loudest to be done—to take less pleasure in crushing a harmless, earnest believer, and pay more attention to the causes that make men and women hungry and homeless in a world of plenty; that make distorted, deformed little automata of tender, innocent children; that create an army of unemployed and an army of criminals, besides that other dark throng of wronged and outcast women. If we saw a group of people drowning we would naturally rush to their rescue rather than spend our strength aiding those who had already "touched bottom" and were wading out.

No. I hav no antagonism to the work of Liberals. I only hope they will be Liberal in all things, and not be ungrateful and silent to old workers because they hav been wronged by the very Christian civilization they are working against.

Chicago, Jan. 24. LIZZIE SWANK HOLMES.

Mr. Walser Angry at Mr. Bell.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your last issue is a most outrageous libel on Liberal as a town, and myself as an individual, from the pen of W. S. Bell.

Every one of those charges is criminally false; and I am very greatly of the mind to bring the matter before the courts in prosecutions for libel. I surely shall do so if a requisition will lie for crimes of that kind, and I am having the matter investigated. I hav suffered so long under such outrages that I am determined to bring the thing to a crisis. The world ought to know from indisputable evidences whether I hav been wronging others, or hav been wronged by those who ought to protect and aid me in my work. I hav nothing to fear. G. H. WALSER.

Death of Eve and Advent of Christ.

The Washington Post of January 25th announced the death of Mrs. Eve in Georgia, and the advent of G. Christ from Arizona. If G. C. had come from Italy, where they spell Jesus with a G, his full name might be Gesus Christ.

For Prohibitionists and Clergymen.

From the Denison, Tex., Sunday Gazetteer.

The Gazetteer has received from the Truth Seeker Publishing Company, of New York city, 28 Lafayette place, a copy of the illustrated TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1889. In addition to the Calendar and copious chronology, it contains one hundred large pages of valuable information. It opens with an able review of the progress of Freethought in the United States during the year just closed, by the editor. The next sixty-six pages are taken up with "Liberalism: A Symposium," which is really a feature of the publication. Fourteen questions are submitted to twenty-four of the prominent Liberalists of the country, and their replies are published in full, the first in the series being a characteristic letter from Colonel Ingersoll. Our friend J. D. Shaw, of the Independent Pulpit, Waco, also furnishes an interesting reply. Then follow the "Nine Demands" of the Secular Society, and a well-written article entitled, "Ingersoll and Shakspere," abounding in quotations from those popular authors. Prohibitionists and all clergymen who desire to keep posted should not fail to secure a copy and peruse it carefully. It will be mailed to any address by the publishers for twenty-five cents.

Altogether, a Great Annual.

From Pittsburgh Truth.

The TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC for 1889 is, in many particulars, superior to the preceding ANNUALS, which is saying a good deal for it. The Calendar is well arranged, and contains about all the useful information that could be crowded into it. The editor's review of the progress of Freethought in the United States for 1888 is very interesting, and shows that our cause keeps gaining in strength. The ANNUAL has a fine illustration of the statue to Giordano Bruno in Rome; also illustrations of the Lick Observatory and its great telescope, the largest in the world and the gift of a Freethinker; and beautiful scenes from "The Story Hour," by Miss Susan H. Wixon. Twenty-four well-known and prominent Freethinkers of the United States and Canada giv their opinions upon fourteen of some of the most vital questions in which Liberals or Secularists are interested, and nearly all of them agree that the prospects of Liberalism are very bright; that the most Liberals are in the West; that Liberalism and Prohibition are diametrically opposed to each other; that Liberals should undertake a reform in the marriage and divorce laws and relations; that they can unite with the Spiritualists; that Liberals should organize; should vote on Liberal issues; that the Catholic church is more dangerous to American institutions than the National Reform Association; that to make this a really free country legally, and to spread their doctrins, Liberals should disseminate Liberal literature, support the Liberal papers, and keep the lecturers busy; that the Christian religion is a fraud. Their opinions upon the economic troubles are not so harmonious, and their reasons for leaving the church are intensely amusing. Among these Freethought writers and lecturers are seven women—some of them old-time reformers—and their opinions upon the fourteen questions propounded by the editor show that they are as well informed upon the leading issues of the day as the men, and just as smart, if not smarter, than the "lords and masters." One of the nicest features in the ANNUAL is the comparison of "Colonel Ingersoll and Shakspere." Many of the most poetic selections from Ingersoll's writings are given with quotations from the immortal poet. The ANNUAL has 124 pages, and should be in the home of every Freethinker. Price, 25 cents.

The Reverends and the Women.

A woman in limbo again. Sada Bailey Fowler and "Irene" hav fallen under the censorship of "the clergy and others," and the book must be suppressed, she is notified, or the district attorney "will proceed against her."

The reverends are disturbed. They are waking up to the fact that woman is not learning of her husband at home, but is exercising her own reasoning powers, and having some confidence in her own judgment. She dares to suggest and to claim that the social state which man has evolved on the lines of fighting, grabbing, and the ownership of woman is not the best that might be. Miserable sinner that she is. This will not do. She must be taught by the proceeding of district attorneys whom she had no voice in choosing, and the execution of laws which she had no part in making, that free speech is only a pretense in our country, and the experiences, and convictions, and humane impulses of women must be bottled up, unless she is willing to be bottled up herself.

The sublime impertinence of the reverends is unsurpassable. One of them has lately informed the women of Chicago from his pulpit that "there was no reason why a woman should not be surrounded by six, eight, or ten children!"

Why should a woman dare to claim that she, as a race-builder, and bearing the heaviest burden in raising a child, or ten of them, has any knowledge, or aptitude, or prevision of any better state of things or of any more favorable social arrangements for the benefit of herself as a mother and for her children when she is surrounded by them?

The reverend says: "There is no reason why a woman should not be surrounded by six, eight, or ten children." He knows, of course. He has had the experience, and understands thoroughly in his own nature and organization the experience of thousands of mothers and wives. And this reverend, too, informs us that Europeans claim that "the danger which most threatens America is not Anarchy nor Communism, but its childless homes!"

Till there are less than forty thousand children of school age who cannot be furnished sittings in schoolhouses in this city, Chicago certainly has no occasion to bewail childless homes. Another reverend has assumed that woman has not yet arrived at discretion and intelligence concerning her bodily structure and her mission—"the purpose for which she was created"—and answers Mrs. Stanton's question, "What is the chief obstacle to woman suffrage?" in this fashion:

> Let woman learn for what purpose she was created, then use all the energies of her body, mind, and soul to the accomplishment of her mission; learn for what purposes God gave her the various organs of the body; the appetites, the desires, and passions all were given for a good purpose, all are perfect, and when used as God intended they should be used every human being born into the world shall be a perfect temple of God in which his spirit can dwell.

These reverends ought to start a crusade, and devote all their "energies of body, mind, and soul" to the instruction of women whereby they may become the creators of "perfect" children. Without doubt they would accomplish this without using any language that would render them liable to suppression by the New York Vice Society. If they are so much more competent than woman to determin how many children she should hav, or whether she should hav any, and if they know, as the last-named reverend claims, that "when woman shall thus learn to fulfill her mission (i.e., to multiply) she shall hav not only the right of suffrage, but every other right and privilege which perfected humanity can giv her," certainly they should stop preaching what does not tend to effect this desirable end, and set about preparing woman to build "perfected humanity."

It is a puzzle, to be sure, in view of the wrecked health and happiness of faithful, devoted wives whose children are victims of syphilis, how the teaching that "appetites and desires are perfect" will accomplish this—but the reverends are so wise.

And, again, it is a puzzle to conjecture how thousands of mothers who are unable even by excessiv toil and rigid economy to properly maintain and care for one, two, or three children can find "no reason why she should not be surrounded by eight or ten."

However, it is no puzzle, nor is there a question, that a putty womanhood that could be overawed by this priestly impertinence would render humanity no high service by the exercise of its high calling in motherhood.

"Irene" suggests that another system of social relations than our present crime-breeding one may abate some of the evils we are appalled with. Dr. Kate Bushnell has made a six months' tour of investigation in Wisconsin since last May. She "went," she says, "with a readiness to find that the terrible picture had been overdrawn—that the stories of women imprisoned in dens of iniquity and hunted by dogs when they attempted to escape were frightful exaggerations of the truth." "After a month's study of the situation she began to realize that the whole truth had not been told."

Has not a woman some other calling than to surround herself with eight or ten children, with the possibility that her daughters may become the victims of the procurer or the hound? Or, that her daughter may, as an innocent, unsuspecting child of sixteen in this city was a few days ago, be subtly chloroformed when on a visit to a mate, and wake to find herself in the clutches of a debauchee?

And if such horrible calamities do not overtake the daughters, or sink the sons of mothers in a worse than brutal debasement, what kind of qualification for motherhood has the woman of to-day who fails to appreciate the physical, moral, and social bondage of the slaves of the sewing-machine, the workshop, factory, and store—of both sexes—in our present system?

Motherhood is more than multiplying forms. The high calling of woman as mother includes the organization and well-being of the social body as well as of the individual, to be her realm of effort.

The book "Irene," however open to criticism it may be, is a gratifying prophecy of awakening womanhood coming to rescue the race from deadening artificiality, blind selfishness, consuming lusts, and perverted social relations.

The hounds of the stockaded dens of Wisconsin pineries are no more persistently set to prevent the victims escaping, than are the abettors of the vice-hunting institution set upon smothering any individual who tries to point to a social structure wherein woman may be free.

Under the present system of society woman necessarily becomes a narrow, flippant, frivolous bit of artificiality—a toy and pet, with no moral backbone or purpose in life—a stifled, toiling drudge—or a rebel. May the tribe of rebels increase, though prison bars await them, till the evolution of intelligence, common sense, humane and fraternal impulses, and enlightened selfishness shall establish such an industrial system and such coöperativ home life and institutions, as shall set woman free from ministering to the desires and appetites.

We may then hope that the human family will find its high estate, and become, as a whole, equal to the few exalted types that hav redeemed the race from such bestiality as builds stockaded dens or gilded houses of infamy.

We may hope that the stifling factory and the treadmill life of the shop shall not stunt and dwarf the future parents, nor the devouring clutch of diabolical vice seize upon tender childhood. We may then expect that the wife who chooses to assume the responsibilities of motherhood will be able to control the conditions of her high calling. Till this is achieved the reverends may expect to hear from woman, and it is to be hoped she will speak fearlessly and without regard to the favor of the wise pulpiteers or the agent of the New York Vice Society.

LUCINDA B. CHANDLER.

What Greenbackers Believe.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Mr. C. L. James has for many years commanded my admiration for the brightness of his intellect and for having "the courage of his opinions." But his article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 12th, page 22, is in evidence that he has not given his best thought to the finance question.

He assures us that some Greenbackers hold to the doctrin that money is wealth. Now, I do not doubt, after what Mr. James has said, that he has heard somebody who thought he was a Greenbacker admit the correctness of this absurd idea, but I hav been a "member in good standing" of the Greenback party for the last twelve years, with "from fair to good" opportunities for learning its doctrins, and I did not know, till Mr. James told me, that there was a single Greenbacker in the whole country who believed any such thing. And I am affected by the information that a portion of the Greenback party hold this doctrin precisely as I should be if told that Col. Robert Ingersoll's favorit ideas were the immaculate conception of the "Virgin Mary" and the literal presence of the body of Christ in the eucharist.

I presume that Mr. James will not care to dispute very much about this matter, but, as a Greenbacker, I naturally feel sensitiv, knowing that a great many very good and tolerably intelligent people know very little about Greenback doctrins, and will naturally calculate that he "speaks by the book."

Anyone at all conversant with Greenback literature has seen it reiterated ten thousand times that money is only "a medium of exchange," a "representativ of value."

Mr. James further credits us with holding that "a high value of paper money means a low value of gold." We do not hold that the relation of (legitimate) paper has any other relation to gold than it has to any other commodity. The dearer the money, the cheaper the commodity, of course.

But Mr. James says "the value of gold is relativly constant." I propose to offset this statement by a quotation from Wm. Pitt Fessenden, secretary of the treasury, in 1864: "The experience of the last few months cannot hav failed to convince the most careless observer that, whatever may be the effect of a redundant circulation upon the price of coin, other causes hav exercised a greater and more deleterious influence. In the course of a few days the price of this article rose from about $1.50 to $2.85 in paper to $1 in specie, and subsequently fell in as short a period to $1.87, and then again rose as rapidly to $2.50; and all without an assignable cause, traceable to an increase or decrease in the circulation of paper money, or an expansion or contraction of credit, or other similar influence on the market, tending to occasion a fluctuation so violent."

Gold is "constant," is it? About as constant as the average husband, who is "virtuous" so long as there is no opportunity! Gold has always proved unreliable when put to the test, as during the late war.

"A high price of bullion means depreciation of notes," precisely as a high price of wheat means depreciation of notes. The dearer the wheat the more money it takes to buy a bushel.

I do wish that men of rare intelligence and high character and purpose, like Mr. James and his comrades, would abandon their unpractical Anarchist nonsense, and join us in doing something available for humanity's interests and advancement.

Kent, O. FRANCIS BARRY.

Indorsed by the Secular Union.

The much-abused Sunday-school at 636 Milwaukee avenue, Chicago, has been investigated by the Chicago Secular Union, with a view to get at the facts, with the following result: That the school is unsectarian—it neither teaching nor condemning any creed, belief, or religion. Further, that it aims to teach morality—not the Christian article, but pure, natural morality. The scholars are also taught lessons in nature, such as the probable formation of the earth and kindred subjects.

It is a falsehood that the children are inoculated with the ideas of Socialism or Anarchy, which should be emphatically denied, as it does a grave injustice to the people who support this school.

We consider that schools of this sort are beneficial and should be maintained, as they provide a place where parents may send their children Sunday, without having them taught the hideous stories of the Old Testament or other mind-debasing tales.

MARY MAND, Sec.

Our Religion and Our Prudery.

Max O'Rell in "Jonathan and His Continent."

The Americans are Christians—that is to say, they attend church on Sundays. Like other Christians, they attend to business on week days.

In America religion is served up with sauces to suit all palates. Independently of the Catholic religion, there are 189 different religious sects. England has only 185.

Every good preacher draws a full congregation, no matter to which sect he belongs. The church in itself is not the attraction, and the minister has no other influence over the people than that which he exercises by his oratorical talents. A religious or moral lecture is as popular as a literary lecture, a concert, or a play.

Put a bad preacher into the pulpit in America, and he will soon empty the church; replace him by a gifted orator, and soon there will be "standing room" only, and every seat will be at a premium.

The priesthood is not a vocation, it is a profession; no talent, no success. An American will go and listen to the minister of a sect differing from his own rather than sit and be bored by a tiresome preacher belonging to his own denomination. He will rather go to hear Dr. McGlynn, the excommunicated Roman Catholic priest, or Dr. Felix Adler, the eloquent Agnostic; religious as he is, he will sometimes regret that Colonel Ingersoll does not appear in public on Sundays any longer; Protestant as he is, he has no scruple about going to hear a musical mass in the Catholic cathedral; in fact, you can see him everywhere, except in the churches where dulness prevails, and the mind waits in vain for fresh nourishment.

The churches advertise a preacher in the newspapers as the theaters advertise a "star." In default of a good preacher, other attractions are put forward to draw the public. How resist the two following appeals, posted at the doors of a New York and a Chicago church? I copied them word for word with great care:

Musical Evangilists.
Solos;
Short sermons;
The place to be happy and saved.
Walk in, ladies and gentlemen, walk in.

The other, more seductiv still, was worded thus:

No reason for not coming!
Free seats;
Cheerful services!
Books supplied to the congregation.

The public are requested to leave the books in the seats after use.

. . . . . .

Religious sects multiply every day. No doctrin is too absurd to make proselytes.

The latest religious invention in America is Esoterism, which promises immortality to its followers—immortality, that's all! The doctrin of the Esoterists teaches that, if man were really pure and followed the precepts of the gospel to the letter, he would become immortal, not in paradise, but here below. As it is probable that no Christian ever yet succeeded in following minutely the precepts of the gospel, the Esoterists may be right. To liv forever, say they, you hav only to remain virtuous, even in the married state. Celibacy must be embraced. Celibacy pure and simple, however, is not sufficient, for where there is no struggle there is no victory. Devotees must therefore marry, but in all honor remain celibates. If you succeed in mastering your passions, no malady will attack you, and you will become immortal.

"But," you will probably say, "do the Esoterists never die?"

Yes, they die—once; but, according to them, this does not prove the fallacy of their belief. If they die, this simply proves that they hav failed to attain the necessary degree of perfection.

Now, the Esoterists are safe to continue with us, for either they will arrive at perfection and become immortal, or they will fall away from grace and will hav children to swell their ranks. The head of this sect, which is as yet only about two years old, claims that when the Esoterists attain perfection. not only will they be immortal, but they will hav a clear insight into the future, a gift which will enable them to amass great riches. And, indeed, the utility of such an accomplishment on the Stock Exchange, for instance, must be apparent at a glance.

Another sect pretends to be able to cure all diseases by faith. The faith of these fanatics is not shaken by the death of their patients. "If they had had more faith they would hav recovered." Doctor Sangrado cured all illnesses by bleedings and hot water. When a patient died, it was because bleeding had been too copious or not copious enough, and the water administered too hot or not hot enough. The theory remained excellent.

Most of these new sects are commercial enterprises, some of them established on the plan of limited liability companies. A room is hired and supplied with a table and chairs, and a few novelty-hunters are soon attracted to the embryo temple. These in turn draw others, and by and by a more imposing meeting-place is secured, and the pockets of the proselytes are appealed to for funds to found what is called "the Lord's treasury." Many poor, simple folk hav been persuaded into giving all they possessed to "the Lord's treasury."

No need to put by a reserve fund; human credulity is an inexhaustible mine.

Fortune-tellers are punished with some six months' or two years' imprisonment. How is it the law allows schemers to found a "Lord's treasury" by promising immortality to the geese who bring their money to it? It looks as if in America, as in England, swindling may be practiced with impunity in the name of religion. One meets with just as many cases of the adroit blending of the worship of God and mammon.

. . . . . .

A publisher, who is not above making money by the sale of books stolen from English and French authors, is yet godly enough to build a church with part of the proceeds.

An immense quantity of literary piracies issue from another firm whose warehouse rejoices in the appellation of "Bible House."

A popular preacher sells his church sittings by auction.

Another furnishes to a syndicate advance sheets of the sermons he preaches on Sunday, so that the principal papers throughout the United States are able to furnish their readers, on Monday morning, with the full discourse delivered the day before in Brooklyn.

. . . . . .

Sabbatarian hypocrisy is as flourishing in the Eastern states of America as in England and Scotland.

I was visiting the Sub-Tropical Exhibition at Jacksonville one Sunday, and at a certain stall I chose a few little natural curiosities.

"I cannot sell them to you to-day," said the stall-keeper to me, after well puffing his wares.

"No? Why?"

"Because it is Sunday—I can put them aside for you—but you must buy them to-morrow."

This is the kind of thing one is supposed to admire.

A truly edifying sight is that of the noisy, dirty, blaspheming crowd collected on a Sunday evening outside Madison Square Garden, New York, on the eve of a "six days go-as-you-please walking-match." From 6 or 7 in the evening there is a betting-swearing-match outside the gates. But the walking only begins at one minute past midnight."

. . . . . .

Not to take the name of God in vain, the English hav invented many euphemisms; some men, imagining, I suppose, that the deity takes no cognizance of any language but English, venture so far as to say Mon Dieu or Mein Gott.

At this kind of thing the Americans are as clever as the English. They hav invented Great Scott!

. . . . . .

The New England descendants of the Puritans hav inherited a more than British prudery.

Charles Dickens speaks, in his "American Notes," of people who covered the nakedness of their pianolegs with little ornamental frills.

There still exist worthy creatures who would think it indecent to speak of such and such a star as being visible to the naked eye.

The word "leg" is improper; you must say "lower limb." Trousers hav become "lower garments." Instead of going to bed, people "retire," so that the bedroom becomes the "retiring-room."

A lady having said not long ago, in a Philadelphia drawing-room, that she felt cold in her back, created a veritable panic among the hostess's guests.

I read the following piece of information in a New York paper among the news from a New England city:

The authorities hav begun a crusade against the nude in art. One of the wealthiest gentlemen of the city will be proceeded against for keeping in his house copies of the Venus of Milo, the Venus de Medici, Canova's Venus, Powers's Greek Slave, the Laocoon, and other works.

During my stay in New York I was constantly hearing of a certain Mr. Anthony Comstock, who had attained celebrity by a campaign he had undertaken against nudities. Mr. Comstock visited the museums, galleries, exhibitions, and shops, and whenever he found a bit of flesh portrayed in paint or marble, he went before the magistrates and had a grand field-day. I must say, for the credit of New Yorkers, that Mr. Comstock had earned for himself a reputation as grotesque as it was noisy. To take up such a line of censorship is, it seems to me, to publish one's own perversity, and the individual whose mind is so ill formed that he cannot look at an artistic counterfeit presentment of the human form divine without thinking evil thoughts is to be pitied, if not despised.

But I suppose there will always be quack doctors with the cant of virtue on their lips and filthy imaginations in their hearts.

Be that as it may, the nude in art has been having a hard time of it lately.

Meanwhile, the American newspapers seemed to look upon Mr. Comstock as a legitimate target for their jokes and satire.

The New England ladies hav the reputation of being the most easily shocked women in the world. An American gentleman told me that a Philadelphia lady, at whose side he was seated one day at table, grew red to her very ears at his asking her which part of a chicken she preferred, the wing or the leg.

Are the New England women Saintes-Nitouches?

The following information is from a correspondent:

There exists in a certain New England city (he names it) a fashionable man-milliner who has a room reserved, ostensibly for fitting, but really for ladies who do not disdain to imbibe privately, through a straw, certain American drinks which they would not dare touch in public. In this dissimulated bar, under cover of silks and satins, they delight to chat on fashion and frivolities, while absorbing pretty tipples invented for their lords.

The prettiest part of the affair is that the husbands pay for the beverages without knowing it.

On the bills the milliner has added so much for trimmings (read: iced champagne), so much for lace (read: sherry cobbler)—and the duped husbands hav nothing to complain of except that the new fashions demand a great deal of trimming.

Swedish Prisoners for Blasphemy.

From the London Freethinker.

Christian bigotry in Sweden has added two more names to the long and glorious roll of the noble army who hav suffered on behalf of Freethought—those of Viktor Lennstrand and Alfred Lindkvist. The first-named is still undergoing his sentence of three months' imprisonment for denying the Christian religion, and the latter has but recently accomplished his milder term of one month's imprisonment.

Both the prisoners, it will be seen from the portraits we are able to place before our readers, are young. This is as it should be. Positions of danger among those who work for the future must be taken up by those upon whom the future will mainly depend. Both hav received a university education, and hav by their studies independently emancipated themselvs from the creeds of their childhood. Both, it may be seen in their portraits, are highly intelligent, and of that firm, resolute independence which refuses to prostrate honest thought before authority and power. Both are of unblemished character, and are, in short, emphatically made of the right stuff for the arduous fight in which they are engaged.

Viktor E. Lennstrand, the younger of the two, is, as the founder and president of the Freethought Utilitarian Society in Sweden, the greater culprit. He was born in Gefle on the 30th of January, 1861. His parents were extremely pious, belonging to a fanatical Methodist sect founded by one Lector P. Waldenstrom, under whom he was at first educated. In his youth Lennstrand ardently desired to become a missionary. He matriculated at the university of Upsala, where his studies of Channing and other theological works, with a view of becoming a clergyman, unsettled his faith, and he advanced by gradual stages from being a Unitarian to confirmed Freethought, and is at present in the very front rank of the small but energetic Freethought party in Sweden.

In 1887 Lennstrand lectured for the first time in Upsala, against the Christian religion. This we believe was the first occasion upon which uncompromising Freethought was promulgated in conservativ Sweden, although it has obtained footing in Radical Norway, where most of the ablest writers, such as Ibsen, Bjornsterne, and Kielland, are Freethinkers. After several lectures in Stockholm, Mr. Lennstrand established there on March 27, 1888, a Freethought body, the Utilistiska Samfundet, or Utilitarian Society, their principles being almost identical with those of the National Secular Society. This attracted much attention, and it was not long before proceedings were instituted for "blasphemy and denial of the Christian religion." In May last, Lennstrand was sentenced to a fine of two hundred and fifty crowns. Owing to his continuing to propagate his views this sentence was increased by the supreme court to three months' imprisonment. He appealed to the king, but without result. Meantime he continued lecturing and establishing new branches of the Utilitarian Society, of which there are at present two branches in Stockholm, and one each in the towns Gothenburg, Orebro, Eskiltuna, Söderhamn, Södertelje, Norrköping, Helsingburg, and Malmo. The last one he established two days before being arrested (Nov. 29, 1888) and incarcerated at Malmo to undergo his sentence. Another prosecution was then instituted at Malmo, and it is expected that this will terminate in an additional three months' imprisonment.

Lennstrand is as undaunted as ever, and his one vexation is being unable to write to the press while in prison. He has written several pamphlets showing the stages of his mental growth. The last one, occasioned by his prosecution, bears the title, "What I Hav Said and What I Hav Not Said." Captain Otto Thompson, to whose kindness I am indebted for these particulars, says that as a lecturer Lennstrand carries everyone along with him by his oratorical powers and pleasing, unpretentious appearance. Fanatics who hav never heard him are his worst enemies, but they hav been unable to detect a single blemish in his private life.

Alfred Lindkvist, in an interesting sketch of his career, which he wrote at my request while in the Crown prison, Langholmer, Stockholm, but which he could not forward until his term expired, says that he was born (also at Gefle) in 1860. His parents were intensely pious, and inculcated upon his mind from early childhood the necessity of becoming a child of God in order to escape the flames of eternal hell. His first and only book with pictures was an old illustrated family Bible, in which the barbarities of the Jewish warriors were depicted. He was brought up most rigorously, denied all sports and companionships, and kept strictly to religious duties. His father sternly exhorted him to conversion. "Many a morning when I awoke," he says, "I found my mother kneeling by my bedside, and in fanatical despair praying to God that he might pluck her son as a brand from the fire, else he would be burning in hell forever." The youth's mind revolted from this barbarous deity, and sought in the masterpieces of literature a livelier world than that around him. It was not, however, without much anguish of mind that he emancipated himself from those beliefs in God and immortality which he had been brought up to regard as indisputable truths. At the university of Upsala he studied European literature, and became acquainted with the works of Mill, Darwin, and Spencer. He has published two volumes of poems, "Snow Drops," and "April Days," and lost a stipend at the university by translating from the Danish a Rationalistic life of Jesus entitled, "The Reformer from Galilee." Mr. Lindkvist has visited Paris, and collaborated on a daily journal at Stockholm. Last year he joined his friend Lennstrand in propagating Freethought, and was apprehended on November 21st for having translated and published a pamphlet on Christianity by our friend Joseph Symes. This circumstance was not wanted to call out our deepest sympathy with our brave young Swedish comrades, but it lends additional interest to their case.

J. M. WHEELER.

Spiritualism Not Superstition.

He who calls Spiritualism "a humbug" and "the sum of all superstition" is indeed unworthy of the name of Liberal. "Education," said Wendell Phillips, "consists in getting rid of prejudice." Many Freethinkers are not half educated, and some hav had only a rudimentary schooling.

A DISCUSSION BETWEEN

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL,
HON. FREDERIC R. COUDERT, and
GOV. STEWART L. WOODFORD,

BEFORE

The Nineteenth Century Club of New York.

Stenographically reported for The Truth Seeker by I. N. Baker.

The publication of this discussion has been delayed from various causes, but will now be of more interest than ever because of the other mighty men Colonel Ingersoll has since met and overthrown. F. R. Coudert is a Roman Catholic, and one of the best orators of New York. Gov. Stewart L. Woodford is a Protestant, and a splendid speaker. The discussion is the only oral public debate ever engaged in by Colonel Ingersoll. He had the opening and the closing of the argument, and made two of his most forcible and eloquent speeches. President Palmer's introductions of the orators will also be given.

This will be a great issue for our friends to send to Christian acquaintances, or to use to procure us some new subscribers.

Facts.

Facts are better than theory. That is, in forming judgments, observed facts are more trustworthy than are theories. The proverbial expression is in everyone's mouth. Why protract theoretical argumentation without end in a case where it is totally unnecessary to hav recourse to theory at all—where abundance of facts in proof or disproof are lying heaped up everywhere about under our eyes? How can a Christian hav the hardihood to maunder on hour after hour about the capability of his religion to promote civilization and morality—general well-being—in the face of the glaring evidence on the matter presented by the nations around him? Theory does well enough when we cannot refer to the facts. When we can, why bother with theory at all? When the facts are so convenient, so simple, so obvious, why on earth not turn to them? From papers read within merely the last few days we hav collected clippings about the most Christian nations:

"In Moscow the number of shrines is so great and the sanctity of the people so overpowering that it is difficult for the orthodox to get across the street for the continual crossing of their breasts. In St. Petersburg the number of shrines is much less, but it is still sufficient to keep your isvostchik's arms in tolerably activ exercise. Officers and gentlemen were not so particular as the isvostchiks and workmen, but it was no uncommon sight to see them making the sign of the cross. I traveled with General Ignatieff from St. Petersburg to Moscow. The moment the train started the general crossed himself twice, remarking that although you should always pray, it was especially incumbent upon you to do so when starting on a journey. The number of shrines in Russia where candles are burning before holy pictures is very great, and much greater importance is attached to the science of genuflexion than is easily credible to the non-ritualistic Englishman."

What kind of a country is Russia? What is the well-being of its people?

"Crime appears now to be very prevalent in Poland, and from accounts recently received the Poles are of an unusually disagreeable character. Numerous murders hav occurred simply for purposes of robbery, in which the most wanton cruelty has been displayed. An old man butchered in a little village proved to hav but one rouble, and the disgusted murderer left upon his victim a card on which was written: 'I regret to say that this undertaking has not realized my expectations.'"

The Poles are one of the most devoutly Christian peoples in the world.

"The peninsula which in the sixteenth century was a terror to all Europe, has been subsiding ever since. Spanish civilization reminds us more of the far past than any other in Europe. Bull-fights alone are an indication of the antique tastes of Spaniards, and are suggestiv of the gladiatorial shows of eighteen hundred years ago. There seems to be no inherent life. The people are largely uneducated, and there are still brigands in considerable quantities in her mountains. Such a people adheres largely to devices already in common use, as were in vogue centuries before. It is not surprising that American manufacturers do not ook to Spain as a good market for the ntroduction of new things."

How does Spain compare in point of prevalence and intensity of religious feeling with the more advanced countries? Are Freethinkers numerous there? Are science and Freethought well spread and influential? What influence gained strength in Spain when it began to lose that position which in the sixteenth century made it "a terror to all Europe?"

"The Greeks hav earned a name synonymous with cheat. 'A very Greek' is a mode of expression the justice of which is supported by travelers and voyagers; brigandage, fraud, lying, and cheating are qualities exercised by so many of that nation as to giv it a character."

These are the descendants of the pagans of ancient Greece. Those pagans were as eminent above their neighbors for nobleness as the present Christians are sunk below them for despicableness. These very brigands and fraudulent dealers spoken of are probably the last persons on earth who would neglect or giv up their religion. They hav a strong belief in its superiority over that of their neighbors the Turks. Yet the integrity and honesty of the Turk are as proverbial as the reverse qualities are in the Greek. In a Turkish bazar it is common to see the goods exposed, the price marked, and the owner away; a purchaser leaves the price and takes the goods. The word of a Turk can be relied on; it is a characteristic. Yet he is a Mohammedan; the Greek, a Christian; and they are neighbors.

"The Roman Catholic is the dominant church of Mexico. . . . The administration of justice is inefficient, and the courts corrupt. Brigandage and violence endanger personal security, and damage commerce and prosperity. Notwithstanding the enormous advantages presented by her natural productions, and the important geographical position which she occupies between the Atlantic and the Pacific, Mexico has not been able to develop commerce."

The superstition of Mexico is so great that miracles are continually supposed to be performed there, and are earnestly believed, much as was the case in Europe during the Middle Ages.

"The inhabitants of Abyssinia are fierce and turbulent in character, and addicted to cruelty. . . . In manners they are rude and barbarous. Engaged as they are in continual wars, and accustomed to bloodshed, human life is little regarded among them. . . . Each chief is entire master of all sources of revenue within his territory, and has practically full power of life and death. 'If at any time,' says Dr. Beke, 'a chief has found himself strong enough to march upon the capital, he has done so, placed upon the throne another puppet emperor, and been by him appointed ras or vizier, till a rival stronger than himself could turn him out and take his place.' The trade and manufactures are insignificant. 'The Abyssinians are, I think,' says Mr. Markham, 'capable of civilization.'"

If Christianity is capable of producing good effects Abyssinia is of all countries perhaps the one where those effects should be most shown. Christianity was introduced in 330. Since then Abyssinia has been thoroughly isolated from all other countries. She has remained unpenetrated by modern influences and the elements of material civilization. She has had Christianity and nothing else. If that religion can do anything for a nation, here it has had its chance to do it. No better case could be got for a judgment upon the matter. All other factors are eliminated; the one whose effect we wish to observe alone remains. How strongly in force it remains is well known too. Feasts and fast days are very frequent. The children are circumcised, and the Mosaic commandments with respect to food and purification are observed. The eating of animals which do not chew the cud and which hav not cloven hoofs is prohibited. The ecclesiastical body is very numerous, consisting of priests of various kinds, with monks and nuns, and is looked upon with great awe and reverence. The people hav innumerable saints. Legends of saints and works of religious controversy form almost their entire literature. This is their degree of Christian excellence; their degree of human excellence we hav seen.

Shall we hunt up testimony as to the mental, moral, and physical condition of the Italians, the descendants of the great pagans of antiquity? Does anyone need citations in regard to the religious fervor of the Irish and their civil condition and intellectual and moral character?

How do these nations compare with those in which Christianity is, comparativly, far declined—France, Germany, England, and the United States? Is it possible for facts to make any impression at all on the head of one reared obediently and subserviently under the care of Mother Church? Let us hope that is is possible, however slow the process, and patiently persist in endeavors to show Christians the unhappy effects of their belief.

France and the Roman Church.

Episcopal bishop Coxe, of western New York, was sent over to France last spring to assist Père Hyacinthe in his work of bringing France "to Christ." Within the past week he has been telling a Herald correspondent about the matter.

It does not appear from Bishop Coxe's statement that Père Hyacinthe is making very great headway, or that the result of the bishop's visit is any very great transformation of the existing state of religious affairs in France. But it does appear from the bishop's statement that France is rapidly becoming lost to Rome and equally as fast going over to Infidelity. According to the bishop there are three parties in France, the church party, the Freethought party, and a handful of half-and-halfs, or moderates. Of these the Freethought party—which Coxe calls Atheists—has two wings, the radicals and the opportunists. The opportunists are now in power, and the present legislativ body is opposed to extreme or ultramontane measures, but the moderates (or middle votes) are relied upon by the government not to infuriate the "priest party" by defying their known wishes, for which the government does not feel itself sufficiently strong. Over and over again, reports Bishop Coxe, hav they received warning that when the moderates choose to transfer their votes to the radicals the embassy to the Vatican will be discontinued, or even the dominant church will be disestablished. The dominant church, so far as religion is dominant at all, is ultramontane Romanism, but it is powerless except through political intrigue. The French radicals believe, queerly enough, in keeping a state church, for the reason that by its support of the institution the state has the right to control it. So France subsidizes a church from which her government is yearly taking away more and more of its power and privileges.

Aside from its fight with the state, the church is weakening in other ways, mainly through unbelief of the people, and their disinclination to train their sons for the priesthood. Ten years ago the vicar-general of the diocese of Orleans published a book giving the official figures of the parishes without priests. There were 481 such vacant parishes in seven dioceses, besides 144 vacant curacies. In all France there were, in 1877, 2,568 parishes without priests, and since then the prospect of the church has not mended. In Gambetta's time, Bishop Coxe heard a debate in the National Assembly in which one of the speakers, turning to the ultramontane benches, said, "You claim all France for your church. Not a million of them, all told, believe your dogmas, or go to church." And this statement was not denied. The Paris Gallican recently said: "Out of 36,000,000 of the French people the total number of those who make their Easter communion does not reach one million. It must be remembered that this million includes all ecclesiastics, nuns, and officials of the church, and thousands of children who neglect this duty on reaching adult years." By the Roman Catholic law those who fail to confess and receive the sacrament at Easter are excommunicated. Abbé Bongaud, author of the book quoted, says that "even the poor are losing their faith, and peasants who were proud of making priests of their sons now refuse their children to the altar." This he attributes to the Materialistic tendency of the times, and consequent growth of Atheism.

From this it can be seen that the despotic Roman church is rapidly going to pieces in France. Of course Bishop Coxe and Père Hyacinthe are trying to save something from the wreck, as they regard, or profess to regard, a nation without Christianity, no matter how virtuous, prosperous, and honest the people are, as worse than one deeply dyed in crime if it be only religious. They are trying to revive the ancient Gallican church, which limited the power of the Vatican over the French national church. The difference is one of administration only, not of dogmas and beliefs. The liberty desired by the Gallican church did not contemplate the establishment of an independent church, but simply a limitation of the papal power in favor of the episcopal. But such a change from one master to another is of course no settlement of the war between Rome and the French government, and Hyacinthe's movement is not likely to hav much influence outside his own circle of friends. For all practical purposes France is a nation of Freethinkers, and when the government feels that the time is auspicious it will disestablish the church, and make the government and education purely secular.

The Cardinal and the Premier.

We confess to having had a good deal of sympathy with the scheme to annex Canada to the United States. It is a cold country, and cold countries usually possess a hardy, temperate, industrious population, who make things hum, and are of some use to the world. Annexation, too, would settle the fishery fight, abolish the bigoted custom houses, and do away with the necessity of the retaliation bill. Then Alastor and C. Watts would be countrymen of ours, and Secular Thought would be an able American journal—for be it known that nothing on this continent is American unless it is also United States. There are other advantages, also, too numerous to enumerate, as the writers of auction posters say.

But this sentiment has entirely changed. We do not want Canada. So far as our pen can reach we shall write against the annexation scheme, and if our subscription list were larger the pen should reach farther. We would as soon see Africa annexed, with its monkey men and naked, flat-nosed Hottentots, or Patagonia, with its painted savages and barbaric religion, as the Province of Quebec. Read this: At the opening of parliament Friday (Jan. 11, 1889), Cardinal Taschereau and his clergy were assigned seats on the floor. The cardinal was very indignant and demanded a seat on the throne, claiming precedence over the lieutenant-governor, the queen's representativ. Speaker Brûere and Premier Mercier sent a hasty apology to his eminence, and a throne was speedily constructed beside the queen's throne and directly under the royal arms, and this was occupied by Cardinal Taschereau and his bodyguard of prelates when parliament opened. Much indignation was expressed by the Protestant members of the legislature, and there is a movement looking toward sending a remonstrance to the imperial government against what the English-speaking population call "the dangerous influence being exerted in public affairs by the Catholic church in this province." Only a short time ago a law was passed by parliament giving the Jesuits $400,000, subject to the approval of the pope before it could become a law. The church exacts tithes from the Catholic inhabitants of the province, and there are statutes on the books having marginal references such as "decree by our holy father, the pope, to take precedence," etc.

That is not romance, nor an account of the opening of a conclave of feudal nobility in the year of our Lord 1200, but a plain statement of something that occurred in Canada last month, in this year of the same Lord, 1889. The cardinal, who is a representativ of a representativ of a ghost, was slighted. He was indignant. Ghosts should take precedence of men. Therefore as the representativ of a representativ of a ghost, he should precede human authority. He protested. The speaker of the House and the representativ of the queen who is supposed to rule Canada because the people like to suppose that way, got down on their knees. They apologized. Instead of assuring the representativ of a representativ of a ghost that if he was not satisfied with his seat he could sit on the floor with pendulous feet, or outside where the cool breezes picked their way through rheumatic corridors, they build him a throne alongside the queen's and right under the royal arms! The throne, of course, was hastily constructed, perhaps of a barrel stood on end with a chair on top and draped with velvet—but nevertheless it was symbolically, at least, a throne, and the cardinal mounted thereon was a ghostly ruler, equal if not superior to the representativ of the human ruler. And then parliament passes laws "subject to the approval of the pope." And on the statute books are other laws with "decrees by our holy father the pope to take precedence." Out upon such a country! The United States don't want it. It should go to Patagonia with its two gods, or to the South Africans with their idols and their cave-houses and their rum.

The Province of Quebec should be set apart for the museum of nations. It is a freak, a monstrosity, a survival of utter barbarism, as anomalous as absurd. When the pope leaves Rome he should ship his lares and penates to Montreal, where, unlike the Italians, all that the people do when he jumps on them, robs them, holds their faces in the dirt, is to remonstrate. And most of them do not even do that. It is safe to say that no French Catholic's name will be found on that remonstrance "against the dangerous influence being exerted in public affairs by the Catholic church" in the Province of Quebec. A race of people like the French "Canucks," who will pass laws to sell their own farms to build churches or church institutions; who allow a priest to rob them of their property at his own will; who cannot be born or marry or die without asking the church's permission; who are abject slaves of Rome; who treat their wives like beasts and their children like dogs—such a race will never sign even a remonstrance against the arrogance of their masters. And it is these Canucks who enable the church to control Quebec.

No; the United States don't want to annex Quebec. New England has enough of Canadian Catholics within her borders to-day. They hav driven the New Englander out of his woods, the shoemaker from his shop, the Massachusetts girl from her loom, and the honest Yankee laborer from the farm. They are given over to religion and rum, to horse-trading and wife-beating. They hav none of the virtues of the French Frenchman, but all his vices. The men are thoroughly bad; the women worse, and the boys and girls are a little smarter in evil-doing than their parents, readily assimilating the cuter wickedness of the Yankee. We hav seen these Canucks in all their glory in New England towns, and it is this race in Quebec who make it possible for Cardinal Taschereau with his "bodyguard of prelates" to insult by his preposterous claims every decent man in the neighborhood. The politicians are afraid of the priests because the latter own the majority of voters body and soul.

There are a few Freethinkers in Montreal, and the Pioneer Freethought Club, comprising most of the intellect of the city, has done some good work. The members of this club would make splendid step-children if Uncle Sam should wed Widow Canada, but with the present officials in power, truckling to the woman with the name on her forehead, the words most applicable to them are those of the voice, "Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues."

A Scheme of the Fanatics.

The Women's Christian Temperance Union contemplates having a million-dollar building in Chicago. The central union of that city has procured incorporation papers so that it might hold the property, which it will present by a legal hocus-pocus to the national union. The money is now being collected, and the plans are completed. The structure will be situated on Dearborn street, and will front the post-office and custom house. It will be one of the most handsome buildings in a city remarkable for handsome structures. It was found impossible, however, to purchase the lot upon which the building will stand, so a perpetual lease has been taken at a rental of $35,000 a year. It will cost $800,000 to put the building up, and the style of architecture will be the late Gothic of France. Much of the building will be rented, and it will contain room enough to bring in an annual income of $191,500. Ten years hence it is believed that the rental will be $250,000 at least.

Here is something for the Secular Union to look after. Illinois exempts church and religious corporation property from taxation, and the Women's Christian Temperance Union will endeavor to come in under that or the law exempting benevolent institutions. Here in this state, the Young Men's Christian Association of Brooklyn obtained exemption because they maintain a library, open, however, only to members. They had to resort to a special bill, which was opposed in the legislature by the Constitution Club. The same association of this city is exempt on religious grounds, though it rents a large share of its building for stores and offices. The Freethinkers sought to pass a bill taxing this and other church property, but were defeated, though not for all time, by a good deal. The Women's Union will find some way to abstain from paying taxes, and so enjoy their enormous rental, with municipal protection of their property, without returning any equivalent to the state.

About the most dishonest folks in the world are the religious corporations which hold and manage the churches and their institutions.

Editorial Notes.

Since Charles A. Dana went to Europe to hobnob with the pope and the pope's biographer, Dr. O'Reilly, the Sun has been catering to the pope's Irish in this country. The latest is an interview with an Italian prelate, who canvassed the chances of the various cardinals to become pope when Mr. Pecci dies, which he must do soon, and found that owing to European jealousies in the college of cardinals, Mr. Gibbons, of Baltimore, Maryland, U. S. A., is a very available man. The Sun seems to think that such a choice would be a great thing for America, but how or why it fails to explain. The opinion is fast gaining ground around here that the more America has to do with Rome, the worse off America is.

Down in Springfield, Ill., the faith-cure craze is booming. A Mrs. Woodworth is the high priestess, and her method is to work on the nerves of the audience by an address, and then to "pray for power," in which prayer all join, each auditor praying aloud with frantic gestures and expressions. She sends little girls into trances, wherein they say they see heaven—which they describe as having the traditional streets of gold—and hell, in which are people tormented by serpents in flames. Miracles of the regular sort are also performed in the meetings—the lame walk, the blind see, etc. It is the same pitiful tale of superstitious ignorance led and gulled by greedy fanaticism, that the world has had since men could talk. Investigation will show the leaders to be knaves or lunatics, the dupes poor credulous fools. The "cured" are usually liars; the trances are induced by nervous derangements, and if persisted in will land the subjects in the insane asylums. It is criminal to allow children to be operated on by such religious fakirs.

Writing from Washington county, Ark., a correspondent of the Kansas Blade sums up the result of the hot weather in his section last summer. He is writing of his neighbors. "It got so hot," he says, "that they started a protracted meeting, and ran it five weeks before it rained a drop. They are the Southern Methodists, and beat anything I ever saw. We attended two evenings and that was enough. Such shouting I never heard. One good old sister weighing about two hundred and fifty pounds got to going it big, broke out of the ring, ran over seats, out of doors, and my God, didn't she 'holler!' They kept it up all night, and it was the best show I ever attended. During the meeting there was one preacher hanged and another shot. You see, they tried to make some of the young sisters believe there was 'no hell to speak of.' The members said 'they had no use for a religion without no hell in it.'" The Southern Methodists seem to be a little hard upon their preachers, but perhaps they know best what is good for them.

A gentleman who "has been through all the various stages of what is called charity work," assures the Church man that "there is no fraction of any percentage of meritorious mendicancy in New York." In other words, there are no beggars who deserve help. Yet, adds the Sun, "the charitable societies are competing with each other in the creation and encouragement of pauperism, while in many cases the really deserving and self-respecting poor endure distress in silence, so that charity must search to find them out. There is something radically wrong about this whole business, and it has its origin in the multiplication of the professional philanthropists. They are the men and women who make a living out of dispensing other people's alms, and who seek to magnify their office by collecting and distributing as much money as possible." These private societies of professional ecclesiastical reformers ought all to be done away. Let the state take care of those who cannot or will not work, and not turn them over to men whose interest lies in making paupers who are to be used as levers to pry cash out of the pockets of goodhearted people. The state might find a way to make those who will not work reconsider their determination, but the incentivs of the charitable societies are all in the other direction. Honest destitution should be aided tenderly; willful wretchedness should be treated as a crime. It is undoubtedly true that professional philanthropy encourages pauperism more than it relieves actual distress.

Letters from Friends.

DANSVILLE, MICH., Dec. 31, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find post-office money order, which please credit me on your valuable paper. Please keep that Catholic ball rolling. I hav been looking for the last thirty years for a revolution on account of Roman Catholic interference in political matters, and a determination to control our public school system. We hav plenty of people in this country that are not Catholics in any sense of the word, and yet it seems to be impossible for them to realize any danger on account of Roman Catholic interference.

Yours for liberty, E. J. SMITH.

ST. PAUL, MINN., Dec. 31, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $1, for which please forward to my address as above, THE TRUTH SEEKER, beginning with the first number in the year 1889. I hav been a reader of the paper for a year or more, having ordered it for my brother early last spring, but I think it best for me to hav a copy of my own.

I wish to congratulate Mr. Macdonald on the masterly manner in which he conducted his case against the registrars, in forcing them to register his name without the flapdoodle business of taking an oath. I consider myself under great obligation to him for what he has done for a liberty-loving people, and I do truly wish that there was at least one Macdonald in each and every state. JOHN MONROE.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., Dec. 31, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed twenty-five cents, for which please send me the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1889. This will be the first copy I hav ever seen of the ALMANAC I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER now for about a year, and will doubtless become a life subscriber. It is the grandest paper I hav ever seen. In this city the church is making great headway. There seem to be more churches here than in any other city in the United States according to its size. I think there is great need of some of our Liberal lecturers coming to this part of the country. Had it not been for Dr. J. L. York and Mr. S. P. Putnam lecturing here two years ago I would be a church-member yet, but fortunately I see things in a better light. I know of no better way to reform the Christian people than by getting them to hear an able lecturer on Liberalism. They will then see that they hav been off and the Holy Queer is mistaken. J. C. HAGUE.

MOUND CITY, KAN., Dec. 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I do not waut THE TRUTH SEEKER discontinued, for it is an old companion of mine, as I hav been one of its readers since its birth, and I am in hopes of continuing so while I liv and can pay for it. Our Freethinkers here are many, but do not seem to be doing anything for the cause. Like many I read about, I cannot do much, as I liv on a farm and do most of my own work, and am well up in years, but those in town could do much good if they would. They seldom hav a lecture there. They need some one to arouse them. It troubles me to read so much about the Roman Catholics, as I dread them so much. I know enough of them; there are very few in this part of the country, and I am glad of it.

Anyone wanting to find a Jesus nowadays should go to Mexico, where at least one-fourth of the males hav that name, and the females the name of Mary. JAMES ADAMS.

STEUBENVILLE, O., Dec. 24, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: A new idea as to reformatory societies has just come to light. An officer of the Humane Society of Pittsburgh, Pa., being requested to look into the fact of children being overworked in certain factories, said that the greatest violators of the law against child-labor were the most liberal contributors to the Humane Society's support. To prosecute them would deprive the society of a considerable portion of its revenue. Is not this a strange feature of Christianity, professing to be anxious to remove a great evil, and joining a society for the avowed purpose of removing an evil of which they themselvs are the perpetrators? Can hypocrisy go farther? The Pittsburgh Times well says that one cannot at any time see on what an evil thrives before taking a look beneath the surface. In this instance such a look discloses the fact that it is not impossible for sin to liv on its own wages paid to a society ostensibly engaged in eradicating it. JNO. DOWNES.

UPPER MATTOLE, CAL., Dec. 29, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In reply to the letter written by Marcus George, I must say that I am surprised to think that any Liberal could allow himself to be so presumptuous as to say that he knows more about foreign affairs than the United States consuls, especially those of the present administration. What I said about the "necessaries of life" was taken from the Consular Report of 1887, and what Marcus George said was the product of his imagination (observation). Marcus George may be right about what he says, but we must look to the two sources, and then decide for ourselvs which is the best authority. For my part, I will take the Consular Report.

In my former letter, I said that the laboring man was better off in this country than in any other country in the world, "with wages higher on the average, with the price of living lower on the average," and I still maintain it; but I will own that wages are high in protected Australia.

I am against Anarchy, not through prejudice, but from observation. Nowhere it has ever existed has it been of any good, but, on the contrary, it has always been the true source of misery. If to further the cause of Anarchy is the object of Liberalism, let me be anything but a Liberal. I said, "Hang the agitators," and I reaffirm it; but when I say this, I hav reference to those who preach strikes, destruction of property, and the murder of innocent people. With ignorant people I think that the accessory is always worse than the real criminal. I am in favor of anything that will do the people any good, and for this reason I am down on Anarchy and the Anarchist. W. T. S. H.

DETROIT, MICH., Dec. 29, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to call your attention to C. B. Reynolds's article in the Ironclad Age of Nov. 17, 1888, in reference to the Girard College case. He makes a quotation from the will and conveys the idea that his quotation is the only point in the will that bears on the religious question. On page 75 of the published will, by Henry W. Arey, 1872, secretary of the college, but a few lines above C. B. Reynolds's quotation, is a much stronger clause than the one he took. I don't think Mr. C. B. Reynolds has acted in good faith in this case by trying to convey the idea that Girard made but little objection to religious teachings. In justice to the testator, I would like your say-so if C. B. Reynolds hasn't let himself a little loose. E. CHOPE.

[Our view of this matter was expressed in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 8, 1888. We advise investigators of the subject to read "Girard's Will and Girard College Theology," by Dr. Westbrook. The whole subject is there plainly set forth.—ED. T. S.]

S. W. OSWEGO, N. Y., Jan. 5, 239.

MR. EDITOR: I write to thank you for your noble effort to establish the rights of American citizens in regard to the judicial oath. Every reform has had its martyrs; and when I write the history of this country I shall number you with its "sages, thinkers, and reformers." Say! you should hav seen the justice squirm yesterday, when he tried to administer to me the judicial oath. He acted like "Pat"—tickled all over to hav "a job"—and hardly knew whether it should be his "profanity" or mine, and began (raising his hand): "You solemnly swear before almighty God"—— I said, "No, sir, I do nothing of the kind. I choose to affirm." "Oh! all right! You do solemnly affirm in the presence of the ever living God"—— "No, I don't." "Well, what do you do then?" "I solemnly affirm, by my manhood, under the pains and penalties of perjury, to tell the truth." "Well, that'll do," and soon the séance ended.

Moral.—You hav bumped the funny-bone in more than one elbow. A. H. WALKER.

LIBERAL, MO, Dec. 19, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The Freethinkers of this place were much gratified on Sunday, the 16th, to receive a call from W. S. Bell, the well-known lecturer. In the evening Mr. Bell gave a short address before the Liberal Lyceum to a good-sized audience. Mr. Bell contemplates writing up the facts concerning this place and publishing the names of the hundreds of people who hav been driven away from the only "Liberal" town on earth. The truth about this place should be known by the Liberal public, for it is a true saying that to be forewarned is to be forearmed, and I think it high time that the truth should be put in motion to overtake, and if possible, counteract, the lying advertisments that hav been sent out puffing up this place. If Mr. Bell gets a complete list of all the men and women who hav been driven away from here he will hav nearly one thousand. Talk about Bald Knobbers and the Ku-Klux-Klan! These are but novices in the art of bulldozing when compared with a gang of persecutors who hav infested this town from the beginning some eight years ago. ELI.

LONGSTREET, GA., Dec. 26, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me two ANNUALS for 1889, three copies of "The Logic of Death," the "Agnostic Annual," the "Field-Ingersoll Discussion," and "Answers to Christian Questions."

I am the only subscriber to your paper in this section, but I am not the only reader of it, for it has many strong admirers, and it goes wherever wanted and appreciated. I had hoped to gain for you more subscribers, but for want of means and for other causes I hav not succeeded. What is most needed in the South is an organization of Secularists, Agnostics, Freethinkers, Liberals, or Infidels (so-called—if you please—no matter). There are thousands of them all over this land, in the churches and out, and my opinion is that a few lectures from some one of our ablest, delivered in the principal cities in the South, would "put the ball in motion." Excite discussion, and cause Liberals to organize and work for the good of humanity, as in organization there is strength.

The people need to be educated up to a correct idea of mental liberty, of true morality, correct ideas of right living and right doing, as consistent with common sense and human reason, and without regard to any belief whatever.

Man should be held responsible for what he does, not for what he believes or disbelieves. If reason is man's highest faculty, then it should be our guide in our search for truth, and reason should dominate us in our every act of life. So long as reason dominates, the man is safe. Whenever belief dominates, the reason is ignored and the man is adrift, subject to be tantalized with doubts and fears and superstitious nonsense.

It will not do to say, "There is much that we must believe which human reason and the highest human intelligence can not prove." Truth that is beyond the possible grasp of human reason and human intelligence at present—and there is much—must wait until the time comes for science to say her say, for by belief you can never settle the question of absolute truth.

If I say, "I am I," "I am myself," I hav made a statement, I hav stated an absolute fact, truth, that needs no proof. But if some one tells me there is a personal god, a personal devil, a local heaven, a local hell; that there is such a thing possible as the absolute pardon of sin; that a law in nature was suspended for a time or set aside in order to work a miracle; that the miraculous—i.e., the impossible—is the true, then I deny, and call for proof. The reason of mankind does not harmonize on the personal god idea, for really there are as many ideal gods as there are believers in God, and there are no two alike, so that every man makes his god. He is in the mind and imagination of man, and nowhere else that we know of; and so with all the rest that we say we believe, but really do not know.

Yours for truth, T. M. MASON.

SIOUX FALLS, DAK. TERR., Dec. 31, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: At the same time I renew my subscription, I must mention that about ten days ago Brother C. B. Reynolds gave us three lectures, and for the benefit of mental-liberty-loving truth seekers that may desire a Liberal lecturer to visit their neighborhood, I must say that Brother Reynolds is a little giant. Still, I must confess, in spite of his brilliant handling of the subjects, the audience was small every night. Sioux Falls is the busiest young city imaginable, and just before Christmas everybody acts as if it depended on him whether the universe would continue in its course or not. Numerous business men and mechanics of every grade expressed regret that they could not under any circumstances find time to be present. And another reason was, every night some large club or society had to meet for some business. And for young folks there were several entertainments, dances, concerts, and sociables of some kind. They had greater attractions to them. Besides all of these, there are a great number of fanatics that would rather see everybody go to sheol than to hear a Liberal lecture, as well may be supposed in a city of ten or eleven thousand inhabitants with fourteen churches and a Comstock society. So a stranger would naturally suppose Sioux Falls an orthodox hotbed. Yet it is not so. The people in general are indifferent in regard to churches and their creeds. You can believe what you hav a mind to. At the same time, they assist in building churches for the purpose of advertisment and increasing the value of their own property. I believe if a lecturer of Reynolds's capacity would reside here and giv a lecture every Sunday afternoon, he would soon take the starch out of the goody-goodies. Inclosed find $3.25—$3 for my subscription, and twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL.

CHILLICOTHE, MO., Dec. 29, R.M. 288.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find the requisit amount of filthy lucre for the renewal of my subscription, and for the entering upon your subscription list of a quartet of new subscribers, who hav resolved "in their hearts" to dine upon the wholesome mental viands served up at the festal board of your banqueting-house. The autobiographical signatures of said Hon. in-dwellers of the city named in my date-line, will be found elaborately inscribed within the folds of this ungodly effusion, as follows: Messrs. Wm. McIlwrath, F. H. Hoppe, T. C. Hogan, and J. Mohrs. Thus you will perceive that your humble servant has been enabled to verify his proposition to present the Truth Seeker Company, including the devil—not his satanic majesty, however, nor Peck's bad boy, but a utilitarian printer's devil—with a magnanimous holiday greeting in the form of the almighty dollar,

With "In God we trust" engraved upon it.
So you uns won't bust, is why we done it.

Now, to casual observers the consummation of the marvelous feat of the enlistment into the Liberal ranks of the above-named intelligent members of the genus homo may not seem to be a herculean task, but they would judge differently if they could take into consideration the fact that this community is cussedly blessed, and vice versa, blessedly cussed, with a Salvation Army barracks,

And numerous hallelujah institutions,
Where drowsy mugwumps snore root-to-tute,
Whilst their efficient Bible-thumpers—
Like Sam Jones, great shekel hunters—
Do cry aloud, for Jesus's sake,
Just telling sinners they must take
Some stock in Joss—be a spookite—
Or they'll get left, by a big sight!

Be that as it may, however, we are sanguinly hopeful that by a judicious bombardment of the rickety ramparts of Zion and posting our Liberal sharpshooters, picket lines, and skirmishers round about the gloomy spook-jungle of orthodoxy, we can capture in the near future another squad of skeptics, heretics, and Agnostics to annex to the above list, as the woods are full of 'em. Selah!

Now, by the grace of the all-mighty Bob, we subscribe ourself, Fraternally yours, L CHUTE.

MR. EDITOR: I am perusing with great satisfaction one of the many millions of semi-weekly leaflets sent forth by Christian bigots to enlighten this nineteenth century anent the salvation of its precious souls. Here is one of their divine delusions. It strikes the cringing fanatic with a sort of grim delight to learn that by this process he can shift his crimes on another and thus escape just punishment: "This is a faithful saying, worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief," said Paul (1 Tim. i, 15). No rational man or woman who has ever read the villainous career of this Paul, as recorded by himself, will doubt for a moment that he was not only the chief of sinners, but the most diabolical cut-throat, murderer, liar, and impudent, brazen scoundrel that ever aided in the slaughter of human beings for holding honest opinions. Lies and deception governed all his actions. Boasting publicly of his craftiness and guile, and justifying falsehood with the lamest of sophistry, constituted some of the milder offenses of his vicious life. Hear him: "For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory, why yet am I judged a sinner?" (Rom. iii, 7). This is a fair specimen of sacred logic—this self-confessed liar and chief of sinners asking the people of Rome, "Why yet am I judged a sinner?" This may pass for the quintessence of godly impudence. O ye pulpit savants, maulers of God's holy word! deep-read oracles of the Moody wisdom of ancient lore! peers of Sam Jones and the Salvation Army! deign to enlighten a seeker after honest, undefiled truth. Was St. Paul what he has written himself to be, the chief of sinners and the vender of lies, or did he simply lie when he acknowledged both these saintly qualifications? And does he still retain his sainthood in good standing and in accord with your multiplicity of clannish creeds, which for centuries resisted science, philosophy, and civilization? Now, when these sanctimonious spouters condescend to answer these few reasonable questions about their lying saint, I will circulate their Sunday-school mythology per request—but not among the innocent, unoffending children. GRANTFORK, ILL., Dec. 27, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. George H. Dawes arrived here in our burg on Tuesday, the 4th day of December, 1888, and gave his first lecture at Highland, Ill., December the 9th, Sunday evening, the subject being "The Mission of Liberalism." He spoke to a fair and intelligent audience. I dare say, the cream of Highland and vicinity was there to hear him. The Turners' Hall being very large, it left an echo, so that some of the audience did not hear all, sitting off so far from the speaker, but it was a success and did good work. The audience was very attentiv, and it also panned out lively for Mr. G. H. Dawes. There are a great many Liberals at Highland, although some need bracing up on account of business. But we expect to organize a local Union in the near future there, and I think when once started it will work like wildfire.

December the 17th to 19th Mr. George H. Dawes lectured at Alhambra to a fair audience. December 13th and 14th he lectured at Pocahontas, Ill., and had very good audiences. He invited any gentleman or lady to ask any question or make a reply if they wished. On the night of the 14th one Congregational minister, a Rev. Mr. Vulliet, accompanied by one of his members, of Highland, took notes as Mr. Dawes was speaking, and got up to make a reply, which was granted him. He made a perfect failure of it, and Mr. Dawes overthrew him unmercifully and disordered him badly, when he and his member left the hall in a hurry, and the audience applauded Mr. Dawes immensely.

A lecture was to be given in the same place on the 15th of December, but on account of steady rainy weather it was postponed until Saturday, the 22d of December, 1888, when the last lecture was to be given at Pocahontas, when I received letters from friends warning me and Mr. G. H. Dawes not to come, as there would be some unpleasantness. But, not being so easily scared out, we went, prepared to face the music. Everything went on peaceably at first, and Mr. Dawes gave his lecture, but during his lecture a rock was thrown through the window, and, passing Mr. Dawes's head by a foot, struck on the opposit side on the wall and made a great dent. The audience all jumped up to leave the hall, expecting a riot or mob, but I at the door did not let any out, and Mr. Dawes gently and coolly told them to keep their seats, as it was nothing new in a priest-ridden town like Pocahontas; that where there are so many ill-mannered ignoramuses (which accounts for so many churches being there) we could not expect anything else. But as the stone was thrown three or four men went downstairs to see who did the throwing. There was nobody around, which shows a dirty, cowardly act; no one but a coward would hav done it. But it was a point for Mr. Dawes all the same, for Pocahontas is thereby shaken up, and a good many got their eyes open.

And now for Mr. Dawes, I must say that his whole pride and mind are for our cause. He is a brave, fearless little fellow, and is well qualified to cope with any minister, deacon, and, I should say, bishop or cardinal, and he will down them every time. He is well versed in the Bible and in ancient history. He knows he has the arguments and truth in his favor, and deems it his duty to fight superstition and delusions, which hav kept our people in ignorance and poverty and slavery for two thousand years or more. And further, Mr. Dawes is a man such that the more you are around him the better you like him—a perfect gentleman in every way. And I do hereby recommend Mr. G. H. Dawes as a No. 1 lecturer, who thoroughly understands his business, to all Liberals and communities wishing a lecturer.

ATTLEBORO, MASS., Dec. 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I will send you a communication on the subject of the wonderful ride of Jesus into Jerusalem. As today is the anniversary of the birth of our Lord and savior Jesus Christ, and as all business has stopped, and I hav nothing else to do, I was led to contemplate some of the incidents that happened in the career of the son of God while he was here on this earth trying his level best to work out our salvation for us, and appease the wrath of his father, our creator, who had condemned us to everlasting fire because Eve had eaten an apple that did not belong to her. Now, Jesus, knowing that we were not at all to blame for that lunch of Eve's, concluded to try and make it up with his father and get a few of us out of a scrape which we were in no wise to blame for getting into. So he came down and spent a few years among the Jews, leading a roving life, living on what people gave him and never refusing an invitation to dinner from anyone who would giv him a good square meal or a drink. And if any offended him they got a piece of his mind then and there, for he could not bear any opposition from anyone, high or low. But he always took good care to make himself scarce when his words stirred up the people beyond endurance, which was often the case. But many people hav wondered why Jesus, after preaching and practicing nonresistance all his life, at last, just as he was about to be arrested, ordered his followers to sell even their clothes to buy swords. Now, in looking over his life and times, as recorded by Matthew, we find that he was acquainted with the sacred writings of the Jews, and we find in the ninth chapter of Zechariah and the ninth verse this prophecy: "Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Jerusalem! behold, thy king cometh unto thee. He is just and having salvation; lowly and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass." Now, Jesus knew of that prophecy, and thought he could fill the bill if he could ride two animals at once. Now turn to the twenty-first chapter of Matthew and read the first seven verses and you will see that he filled the whole bill. There we read that he actually rode two asses at once, thus fulfilling the prophecy, and at the same time performing one of the most wonderful feats of horsemanship, or assmanship, that the world had ever seen up to that time, more especially as one of the asses was not broken to ride at all. Now, when the people saw him in this (what showmen would call) great two-ass act, they were filled with wonder, but knowing that one of the asses wasn't broken to ride, they made all haste to strip off their clothes, while some cut off branches or brush from the trees and spread them on the pavement lest he should tumble off and break his precious neck, there being no sawdust laid down. But Jesus was fully equal to the occasion, and performed the difficult and dangerous feat in gallant style, winning golden opinions and extravagant praise from the mob who had assembled there to see the performance. Jesus was probably the inventor or originator of that style of riding. I hav never read any account of anyone previous to that wonderful ride attempting to ride more than one animal at the same time. Since then some daring riders hav ridden two and even more at a time, but mark this difference. They ride around a ring and lean toward the center, thus making it comparativly easy. But the hero of this great two-ass act rode straight ahead on a pavement without any sawdust; nothing to break a fall but some brush and clothes hastily thrown down by some humane people who saw the danger he was in. Now, kind reader, pause; consider a moment what Jesus accomplished by this great ride. He fulfilled a prophecy. He established and proved his claim to be the son of God. And he broke a colt. All in less than an hour. Now I would respectfully ask any skeptic, Infidel, or Spiritualist, or any other who denies the godship of Jesus, to explain if he can how any mere man could hav taken such a fearful ride without harm to himself. But this exploit, performed at such fearful risk, seems to hav elated him beyond measure; for the very next thing he did after this famous ride was to go into the temple and drive out the men who transacted business there, and who up to that time supposed they had a right there, as they had probably paid a fair rent for the stalls they occupied. He also kicked over the tables where people were making change, scattering their money in every direction, at the same time giving them such a blowing-up as they did not forget for many a day. For this was the first intimation they had that he was the owner of the building. But these successes seem to hav turned his head, and the idea of empire filled his brain. So the next time he was attacked, instead of running away and hiding, as he had always done before, he ordered his followers to sell even their clothes to buy weapons to fight his enemies with. But the odds against him were too great. When the fight came on his men only cut off one ear, which Jesus kindly put back again, and the lion became a lamb again. He was soon after put to death. He died complaining that his God had forsaken him. After he was dead a soldier stuck a spear in his side and let out a lot of blood and water, which seems to hav been caught and saved in some mysterious manner, as according to Christian theology people whose souls are washed in that flood are entirely cleansed from all sin and made holy and fit to be companions of the pure and virtuous and good. I notice almost all murderers about to be hanged take advantage of this offer and get their souls washed and are happy forever, while their victims, although often honest, honorable, pure, merciful, and just, but who hav neglected to hav their souls properly washed in this blood, are punished and tormented in fire and brimstone forever and ever. Great is the mystery of godliness.

DETROIT, MICH., Dec. 24, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I feel impelled to write an answer to Brother C. H. Greene, who livs so near me and yet so far, who asks, dramatically, What, art mad? Well, I should remark. How much time and space and trouble would be saved and spared if the readers of the letters would first try and understand what they read! Will my brother now please read the short article above his own letter in the last TRUTH SEEKER, C. L. James's, and then read the letter to Colonel Ingersoll by J. H. Cook on the following page, and then please read over carefully my last letter and try and understand what they all mean? and I also ask in the name of liberty and humanity that every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER will do the same. I am trying to giv to the Liberals and the world the greatest and most important truth that was ever given to humanity, and I only desire that all may try to understand what I write before they criticise what they hav never heard or dreamed of. Mr. Greene just lightly skips over my letter without any thought of the stupendous consequences that must follow the taking off from the people of the burthen of about eight hundred millions a year by, as he surmises, stopping all taxation. But I wish to get the attention of all of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and hope that all will try and become interested in the great welfare of all. To do this I therefore make some very astonishing statements. First, I declare that the almost universal belief in the claim that this is a free country has no foundation in truth. It is not a free country, never was a free country; it never was intended by those who labored for four months in the convention that created the Constitution, under which we hav been slaves for one hundred and ten years, that the people should be free. For that Constitution strikes down every vestige, every shadow, of every one of the rights which the Declaration of Independence claimed were the inalienable and universal possession of every person born. The people of the colonies revolted against the one only possible slavery that ever existed on earth, taxation. I challenge any person on earth to show how any one or number of persons could ever be made slaves by any other process. (I expect to see plenty do it right away.) The war of the Revolution, which fully demonstrated how ignorant the people were of the true liberty for which they were fighting, had hardly closed when Captain Shays in Massachusetts raised a rebellion against the very self-same slavery that had caused the Revolution, and the same men in the government who had engineered the war of seven years in the interest of the real slaveowners, the money-lenders, sent a portion of the same army that were said to hav fought so bravely for liberty to put down this first, this early, protest and rebellion against slavery. I am nearly sixty years old, a mechanic. I hav very little sympathy with any form of patchwork to put patches that are not new upon the old garment of slavery. And, now, why was not the Constitution made to conform to the rights claimed in the Declaration of Independence? The reason is very simple and plain. In all past history every government has been formed and put in motion by and for the money-lenders, and has been the abject tool of the said money-lenders to rob the people and enslave them for the said slaveowners' sake. And what has puzzled and astonished me for some years past is, that all of the great minds of this and other nations hav been so miserably befooled by the clatter about this land of liberty, and hav even talked about and eulogized this condition of slavery and called it liberty. They hav even believed the monstrous impossibility that slavery did really exist for over seventy years in a free country under a free government among a free people—a miserable, impossible absurdity. And now to answer Brother Greene's question, How will I hav this government overhauled so as to obviate the necessity of taxation? First, there is not and never was the least necessity for taxation. There is one only reason that can be given for taxation—it compels the people to buy, beg, borrow, pay usury for bankers' debts to pay taxes with, and so puts them in circulation and keeps them there. I challenge any person to giv any other valid reason for taxation. And it proves beyond a doubt that our government is and always has been the base tool of the money-lenders to enslave the people. "And would he hav it pay its expenses with money, say greenbacks, of its own furnishing?" Ay, my brother, with money, say greenbacks, of its own, its very own furnishing, and no other. It shall neither authorize nor recognize anything else as money in any sense.

And about the land distribution and non-usury of Brother Hacker. I hav not a featherweight to lay against Brother Hacker. He has done what he could according to the light he had. But his causes were all effects that cannot be removed until their causes are first removed. The secretary of the treasury in his report for 1884 says there hav been taken in taxes in the past ninety-seven years for the support of government twenty thousand millions. Ex-Senator Jones says that taxation of states amounts to about the same. Only think of it, that about forty billions hav been robbed from the poor laborers of this so-called free country in less than the first century of its life by a so-called free government as the tool of the money-lenders. And just so long as taxation and debt exist I defy all the powers of the people to stop paying interest to those who hold the debts. It is utterly impossible; as are also the theories of land ownership, therefore I waste no thought upon them.

Brother Greene also criticises my history, but does not alter it in the least. I was the son of a devoted Democrat, who, when I was a child, loved to study the situation and argue politics with any Whig he met, and from my tenth year I hav read and studied the same subject as earnestly as any other person I hav met. I hav never wasted my time in saloons or injured my brain with whisky or tobacco, and therefore feel that I am as liable to see the truth as any other person. The very fact that the Republican party to-day and for twenty-five years past hav claimed to hav liberated the colored people, and also the claim of the Christians that they liberated the slaves, and that there has been no Abolition party since the war, are enough. I take no consideration of the outside appearance of the parties during the great excitement at the beginning of the war. It is sufficient to quote from Goodrich's Common School History of 1857. The Democratic party gained almost unopposed control in the Southern states, while in the free states the organization opposed to the extension of slavery became powerful under the name of the Republican party. The Whig party ceased to exist as a national organization. That is enough. The whole South looked upon the Republican party as Abolitionists at that time, and that was the ground of their secession upon the election of Lincoln.

Now I hav given to the truth seekers a few of the most important truths that were ever given to the world. They are simple and plain. They are the germ of all liberty, and I ask every reader to study them and also to read some previous letters of November 24th and February and April. And I challenge any and all to giv me just one reason for taxation, except that it compels the people to use bankers' debts to pay taxes with and so keeps them in circulation. My idea means liberty not only for this country but for the world, and it needs all of the patriotism that can be brought to it.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Rhyme of Little Girls.

Prithee tell me, don't you think
Little gir's are dearest,
With their cheeks of tempting pink,
And their eyes the clearest?
Don't you know that they are best
And of all the loveliest?

Of all girls with roguish ways,
They are surely truest,
Sunshine gleams through all their days,
They see skies the bluest,
And they wear a diadem
Summer has bestowed on them.

Lydia does not care a cent
For the newest dances,
She is not on flirting bent,
Has no killing glances,
But without the slightest art
She has captured many a heart.

Older sisters cut you dead,
Little sisters never;
They don't giggle when they've said
Something very clever.
They just get behind a chair,
Frowning, smiling at you there.

Florence, Lydia, Margaret,
Or a gentle Mary,
They form friendships that, once set,
Never more can vary—
Stanch young friends they are and true,
Always clinging close to you.

Buds must into blossoms blow.
(Morn so early leaves us!)
Maids must into women grow.
(There's the thing that grieves us!)
Psyche knots of flying curls,
That's good-bye to little girls.

Allegory.

[Miss Carrie Sweet's (a piece of candy) journey through the human body on Nov. 3, 1887.]

In starting on the interesting journey of my life, I was taken from my quiet home by a happy-looking school-boy to a depot called Mouth, on the D. A., or Digestiv Appa ratus, road.

It was a dark place, except where the light came in from the door when it was open, for the door reached half-way around the room.

There were twenty-eight bony-looking fellows sitting in the depot when I entered. They had little white caps on their heads, which looked as if they had recently been in bed, and on rising had forgotten to take them off, as they were in a hurry to meet some of their friends belonging to the Wisdom family who were coming on the train. It seemed by the way they were talking and acting that they belonged to a different family of Incisors, the Cuspids, Bicuspids, and Molars.

All at once they rushed at me, and before I could get out of the way they commenced tossing me about terribly, when a long fellow, with red clothes on and a very red face, kept tossing me at them, and as I was constantly bumping against them, they thought I wanted to hav another tussle. But if that long, red fellow called Tongue had minded his own business, I would hav been all right. But now I thought my last day had come. Just as my poor bones were almost made into powder, my friend Will made his appearance. I thought he could stop all the trouble I was in, for I was nearly pulverized, and I thought it was time somebody was coming to save what little there was left of me. As my friend Will entered the depot Mr. Long Tongue pulled a cord, and six shower-bath sprinkles came down upon me until I was nearly drowned. Just as I came up the second time, I noticed that the wall was covered with a velvety paper of a pink shade, and that a curtain hung in the back end of the room. I did not know what was behind the curtain, but I thought I would rather be anywhere than where I was, so when I came up the third and last time I gave one big jump and landed somewhere behind the curtain. I thought I had jumped from the frying-pan into the fire. I landed on a trap-door called Epiglottis, and I came near falling into a deep hole called Trachea, from which I am sure I should never hav escaped. This place was not much better than the first place I was in. I stepped into an elevator room, and saw that the elevator was labeled Esophagus. I stepped into the elevator. It went down so fast that when it stopped I was too dizzy to walk, so the elevator-boy by the name of Muscle pushed me into a room, the door of which was labeled Cardiac Orifice.

I found that the train I was to go on was to be delayed two or three hours, so I thought I would take a stroll about this town called Stomach. I had some very new and curious experiences here. There was a shower that poured down about fifteen minutes after my arrival. It did not seem like a rain storm, so I asked the conductor what it meant. He told me that every time there was a nice passenger on the train they were put into a regular deluge of gastric. After this came a kneading of some girls called Misses Muscle.

I was so churned and battered my own mother would not hav known me.

I soon found out the reason of this confusion, for when I glanced down at my dress I found it to be changed for a gray one, the goods of which was called chyme.

I was looking at a car when the Muscle girls came up and carried me into it without asking whether I wanted to go in or not.

The door of this car was labeled Pyloric Orifice.

After being seated in the car a few minutes a card from Dr. Liver was handed me, accompanied with a bottle of wine called bile. It was very bitter stuff, but tasted very sweet in my mouth.

I had just finished drinking the wine from Dr. Liver, when in came a new friend, Mrs. Pancreas. She came to me and gave me some very excellent juice. I began to think I had taken the right route to travel, as the greatest attention had been paid me ever since I had left my home, with the exception of two or three frights I received at first.

I omitted to say that the custom house officers went and searched my satchel, and took out all the goods that were in the shape of sugar and albumen that they could carry, and took them to Dr. Liver.

After Mrs. Pancreas left me my old friend Will came to the car door and told me he could not accompany me any farther on my journey. I told him I was sorry, because he was such good company, and it would be very lonesome without him.

I soon found I must change my gray dress for a white one called chyle goods, and send my old dress on the Intestinal canal, which was broad-gage. I looked and felt so tall that Mr. Digestion sent some servants by the name of Lacteal to carry me into the car of the Small Intestins. They took me in their arms and I rested as sweetly as a tired baby, but they were taking me to an L of grandmother's house, whose name was Mesenteric Gland. As long as I stayed there I was petted and fed until I was carried out into the Thoracic duct. I had a most delightful trip down the Rhyne river of the body.

I passed out through a stream called the Sub-Clavian Vein. It was a regular Mammoth Cave stream, and if I were asked to name it I should call it the river Styx.

The water was a dark-red color and very muddy. It did not look very inviting to take a bath in, but that did not matter, as it was the custom of every traveler. I was put into a plunge-bath, and then went into the Superior Vena Cava. I then went over a dam called Mitral Valve into Right Auricle Basin. The water went over another dam, and I went into Right Ventrical. There was an arrangement that had three points on the top. We passed this and sailed through an archway shaped like a half-moon, called Semi Luna Valve, into a new river called Pulmonary Artery.

From here I was taken into a county which looked like a Dutch bleachery. This was Lung county.

Some pretty little fellows called Capillaries, seeing the tired look on my face, offered their assistance by picking me up in their arms, when instantly I was changed into a healthy, rosy-looking damsel, and was carried into the prettiest little room, called Left Auricle. There was a handsome crimson curtain hanging between the room called Bicuspid Valve and the room I was in. I went past it into the Left Ventricle. From there I went into a moon-shaped door, and I found I was on a large river called Aorta.

I told the captain I had some food for a friend of mine living on a farm owned by one Foot.

The custom house officers had not meddled with my satchel, containing this jewel of gypsum formation, so I had no trouble about obtaining it.

I gave this expensiv stone to Miss Corn, feeling quite certain that she would most probably wear it for memory of me as long as she lived.

You will probably hear of my death by means of a sharp razor or knife, and I will spend the rest of my noble life in preparation.

San Jacinto, Jan. 12, 1889.

Dear Miss Wixon: This is Sunday and it has been raining almost all day. I read The Truth Seeker instead of the Bible. I am glad to say that churches don't thrive out here in our valley. We are free to do as we choose. Some of our pious friends of the next valley started a Sunday-school here, but it soon went down. Farmers are busy putting grain crops in; prospect of a good season. There are twenty scholars in our school now. Inclosed find ten cents toward the cow for Mr. Casey. I will close. I remain as ever, Your Freethinking friend,

Martha Deming.

Georgetown, Col., Jan. 15, 1889.

My Dear Miss Wixon: I see in The Truth Seeker of December 15th, and other issues, a good deal about the hen-and-egg question, and I thought I would figure on it a little. One way I make it forty-two, and another fifty-two and one-half eggs. I gave the puzzle in school to-day. No one seemed to know the correct answer, not even the teacher. She is a very pleasant teacher. I like the Children's Corner very much. If any little Freethinker would write to me I would gladly answer such letters. I hav a magpie that runs after the cat, and pulls her fur and whiskers.

I wish you a very happy new year. From your little Freethinker friend,

Willie Wescott Old.

Georgetown, Col., Jan. 16, 1889.

Miss Wixon, Dear Madam: As Willie is visiting, I inclose a few lines to you. We enjoy the Children's Corner in The Truth Seeker. You are doing a grand work in educating the young in Freethought principles—no superstition in your teaching. May you be spared many years to continue your good work, is our sincere desire.

Yours for Freethought, Mrs. T. S. Old.

P.S.—We hav taken The Truth Seeker from the start, nearly fifteen years ago.

[Such kind words as the above, which frequently come to us, giv us courage to go on with our work. There shall be no superstition in our teaching if we know it, only truth, knowledge, common sense, the virtues, and right principles.—Ed. C. C.]

Austin, Ill., Jan. 12, 1889.

Miss Susan H. Wixon: I hav at last prepared the Allegory I promised to send to you so long ago, and I hope it will appear in the Corner. It has been quite a long time since I hav written to the Corner, but I will try and write often hereafter.

We hav moved from Chicago to a suburban town six miles from the court house, and are building us a home.

I thank you very much for your kind regards forwarded to me by Mr. Hoffman, and hope you will be able to come and visit us some time. Wishing you a long life, I remain,

Your Liberal friend, Alma Wineman.

Notice.—Any of the young folks that corresponded with me and received no answer to their letters, please send their address to Austin, Ill., and the letters will be answered.

A. W.

Lake City, Fla., Jan. 12, 1889.

Dear Miss Wixon: I am a little girl eleven years old. I liv with my brother Hugh, about a mile from town, and our friend W. H. H. Pearson, from Parkersburg, W. Va., is living with us now. My mother is living fifteen miles from here, on a farm, and comes to see me nearly every Saturday. I hav been going to the Peabody school, but had to stay out during Christmas to help my brother in the store, but my friend helps me learn my lessons evenings. We hav a real nice teacher, Miss Julia Thweatt, from Georgia. My brother and I go to the Presbyterian Sunday-school every Sabbath, except when we go to see mother. I hav a beautiful pigeon. Her name is Daisy. I got a large doll for one of my Christmas presents. I named her Violet, because she has such bright blue eyes.

We hav no snow in this summer land, and seldom any ice, but we hav many chilly days. The orange-trees look green and beautiful. My brother has some Le Conte pear-trees, which do well here.

Miss Wixon, if you should ever come down to spend a winter in Florida, please come and see me.

With kind wishes for you and all the little girls of the Children's Corner, I am,

Your little friend, Annie Wilson.

[We hav long promised ourself a winter trip to Florida. Should we ever go there, we will surely call on our bright little friend Annie.—Ed. C. C.]

[It is a great pleasure to receive so many letters from children. It is a matter of special pride and interest that the first letters of many children are written for the Children's Corner. There is great power in first principles. And we trust the little trembling germs of thought, sometimes very feebly expressed, will grow to great strength and far-reaching influence. Now, we want all the children who write the beautiful letters that appear from week to week in the Corner to try their hands at essays. We offer this subject for the first—"Why is Freethought the Best Thought?" Write brief essays on this topic and send them to the editor of the Corner, and they shall all be printed. Can you ask your papas and mammas to help? Yes, if you wish; but the ideas must be put in your own language, and you must think out the reasons yourselvs as far as you are able to. This suggestion is made in order to develop thought and the reasoning faculties.—Ed. C. C.]

Her Own Messenger.

A rain storm is really no excuse for keeping a healthy, strong child from school; at least, teachers assert this is so. Some time ago a teacher, on answering a knock at the school door, found one of her pupils well wrapped up to protect her from the rain. "Teacher, mother says I needn't come to school to-day, 'cause it rains;" and downstairs the little maid flew like a frightened deer.

Sing a song of sixpence, you fellow full of rye,
With not a cent to bury you to-morrow should you die.
The keeper's in the barroom counting out his money;
His wife is in the parlor with well-dressed sis and sonny;
Your wife has gone out working and washing people's clothes,
To pay for old rye whisky to color up your nose.

Perhaps those who are fond of tongue-twisting sentences may like to repeat the following couplet correctly and rapidly:

The swan swam over the river; swim, swan, swim;
The swan swam back again; well swam, swan!

THOUGHTS ON SCIENCE, THEOLOGY, AND ETHICS.

BY JOHN WILSON, M.A.

The object of the book, as expressed in the preface, is to giv a correct sketch of the main lines of modern thought in small compass, and in language simple enough to be easily understood. In other words, it is a condensation of more voluminous writers, and classification of their definitions of science, theology, and ethics, and a statement of what belongs to each. As a text-book to clear thinking and logical reasoning, and a guide in forming scientific conclusions, this book is invaluable. The Literary Guide ranks it as "one of the foremost works of the present century;" while the Freethinker, in "heartily recommending it" as "simple and lucid in style, correct in thought, and ample in information," declares that it "is just the thing to put in the hands of a plain man who desires the best ideas on evolution in relation to science and ethics in a moderate compass."

The Bishop and the Ballet-Girls.

Every reader of the daily papers has heard of the great debate in the Pan-Anglican synod on that momentous topic, "The attitude of the church toward the stage." The bishop of Sadlers Wells it was who, on that occasion, took up his parable on behalf not only of the drama as a fine art, but on behalf of actors and actresses as human beings. His lordship even went the length of saying a word in defense of the ballet-girl, being nobly seconded in this respect by the bishop of Fiji, who stated that in his own diocese saltatory exercises, not dissimilar from those of the ballet, were considered to possess a deep religious significance. One or two other liberal-minded prelates took the same side; but, on the whole, the feeling of the meeting ran high the other way. Indeed, so warm became some of their lordships that if the conference had not had to rise early in order to attend the banquet given in their honor by the Poulterers' Company there is no knowing what the difference might hav grown to.

Now, among the anti-theatrical party there was none more violent or dogmatic than Dr. Septimus Grundy, lord bishop of Malta. If raving and thumping could hav destroyed the British drama, the bishop of Malta's speech would, undoubtedly, hav had that effect. He ridiculed actors, he denounced actresses; but it was against the ballet and all who took part in or abetted it that he directed the brunt of his attack. "He was pained and grieved beyond expression," he said, in a fine peroration, "by the words which had fallen from their brother of Fiji. For the poor cannibals of heathen climes there might be some excuse. But what condemnation could be too strong for those who would encourage their white sisters in this Christian isle to exhibit themselvs in a condition which put the naked savages of the South sea to the blush?"

Several other prelates spoke to the same effect, if less eloquently, including the bishops of Coventry, Laputa, California, Botany Bay, as well as one of the most conspicuous figures in the conference—the black bishop of Ulundi. They all went home together in an omnibus, comforting themselvs with a further interchange of virtuous indignation, and their speeches were subsequently published in pamphlet form by the Anti-Theatrical League and distributed gratis at the doors of Exeter Hall.

The day after the discussion, when the bishop of Malta came down to breakfast (which he did rather late, having overslept himself, owing to the exhausting effects of the Poulterers' banquet), he found the following note among his letters:

MY DEAR GRUNDY: I am asking the few members of the conference whom I know personally to honor me for an hour or two after dinner to-morrow. Will you make one of them? We shall hope to see Mrs. Grundy on a future occasion, but I am planning this evening specially for the bishops.

Yours very truly, STANLEY HAWTHORNE.

Now, although the bishop had formerly known the Rev. Stanley Hawthorne rather well, he did not much like him, and he resented being addressed as "My Dear Grundy." Moreover, Mr. Hawthorne was a clergyman of notoriously heterodox views, especially on the subject of the theater.

"I don't think I shall go," said the bishop to his wife; "let me see; what is arranged for to-morrow night?"

"Dinner of the Home and Foreign Prayer-Book Society, 7:30," replied Mrs. Grundy, referring to a list of her husband's Pan-Anglican engagements. "I myself hav arranged to dine with Mary Anne, but I shall be home at 10 o'clock, and I should not advise you to go to Mr. Hawthorne's. After your speech yesterday, he ought to know that you and he hav nothing in common."

"Just so, my dear," said the bishop; "but I do not wish to offend the man. I wish you would drop him a line for me, and say that I will come if I can, but hav another engagement for that evening."

Mrs. Grundy did so accordingly.

The next evening, however, at the Home and Foreign Prayer-Book Society's dinner, the bishop discovered that his brethren of Coventry and Laputa, who were sitting near him, were both going to Mr. Hawthorne's. They pressed him strongly to accompany them, and, as the dinner was over at 9.30, Dr. Grundy thought that he might as well look in at Mr. Hawthorne's for half an hour and see what was going on.

There was quite a string of broughams and hansom cabs at the door when they arrived, and as they went up-stairs the bishops heard the sounds of a piano and female voices in the drawing-room.

"Dear me," said Bishop Grundy to Mr. Hawthorne, who was awaiting them on the landing, "I was hardly prepared for this." His lordship was a little shy by nature, and was accustomed to rely on the support of Mrs. Grundy in female society.

"There are only one or two lady friends of my wife's here, who hav come to giv us a little music," said Mr. Hawthorne; "pray do not mind them. You will find it is quite a bishops' party." And with that he ushered the three new arrivals in and presented them to Mrs. Hawthorne.

The bishop of Malta looked around him rather nervously when he had paid his compliments to his hostess. He did not feel more comfortable when he discovered that, besides the two ladies at the piano, several others were scattered about the room, while the back drawing-room was quite full of young ladies, with the bishop of Sadlers Wells gadding about among them like an episcopal butterfly. After this sight it was a relief to Dr. Grundy to find some of his own friends among the dozen or so of prelates who were standing about talking to the ladies. There was the bishop of California and the bishop of Botany Bay, and presently, in a distant corner, his lordship detected the ebony complexion and flashing teeth of the bishop of Ulundi, who appeared to be very much tête-à-tête with a decidedly attractiv lady in black lace and diamonds.

"Let me introduce your lordship to my friend, Miss Tottie Simpson," said the voice of Mrs. Hawthorne.

The bishop submitted mechanically. In another moment he found himself seated in a bay-window beside a siren with a bewitching little smile and a pair of eyes which at first made the bishop blush each time they looked at him. Miss Simpson, however, proved to be one of the most agreeable, as well as the most beautiful, ladies the bishop had ever met. She asked him innumerable questions about his diocese and the work of the synod, and presently the good man was telling her all about Malta and the Maltese, and the Carthaginian Mission, and chatting as confidentially as though they had been friends for years.

There was more music, vocal and instrumental. The young ladies in the back drawing-room—Dr. Grundy was quite surprised on a closer inspection to see how young they were, and how comely—came out in a body and sang a lively little chorus, in which Miss Tottie took a part. Some one told the bishop it was out of "Ali Baba," which did not enlighten him much. Then the black-lace lady left the bishop of Ulundi, and sang a song in Italian, in a style which even Dr. Grundy dimly perceived to be magnificent. Our good bishop was introduced to the black-lace lady, and to several other young ladies, and found them all very chatty and pleasant and deeply interested in church affairs and the work of bishops. Altogether his lordship was having a very agreeable time of it, when he suddenly looked at his watch and found it was ten minutes to 12. A Cinderella in apron and gaiters could not hav got down Mrs. Hawthorne's staircase more expeditiously than did Dr. Grundy on making this discovery.

"Oh, but you mustn't go yet, Grundy," said Mr. Hawthorne, encountering his guest in the hall; "I hav got several things to say to you; in fact, I want to hav a word with the members of the synod collectivly."

"I really can't stop a moment, thank you. Should like to very much, but my wife expected me at 10 o'clock."

"Well, I hope you hav had a pleasant evening. Did you like that Miss Simpson?"

"A most charming girl," replied the bishop, struggling into his overcoat; "perfectly charming. Who is she?"

"Well, she's a professional dancer. I fancy she is now engaged in the ballet at the opera. My wife could tell you. I am so glad you ——"

"You don't mean to tell me, Hawthorne," gasped the bishop. Then a light broke in upon him. "Who were the other women?" he asked, in a very different tone.

"All theatrical people. They belong to our Gospel Players' Guild, you know. Most of the younger ones were chorus or ballet-girls, but there were one or two actresses of higher standing in the room. Miss Kitchen—the one in black lace, who sung last—is the new prima donna, Mme. Schicini, who has just made such a hit at the opera. The truth is, I planned this as a little surprise, Grundy, in the hope of dissipating prejudices which ——"

"Upon my word, Hawthorne, I cannot compliment you upon the good taste of your joke." (The bishop drew himself up as he spoke and frowned portentously.) "Under your roof, I can hardly say more, nor hav I time to discuss the matter. I wish you a very good-evening."

With that his lordship stalked majestically off to the cab which had been called for him.

"What on earth makes you so late, Septimus?" asked Mrs Grundy, as her spouse came in, and there was something in her voice which the good man did not at all like; "where hav you been to?"

"To Hawthorne's, my dear."

"Indeed; and what was going on there?"

"Oh, tea and small talk," returned the bishop, evasivly.

"And who was there, pray?"

"About twenty members of the synod, I should think." His lordship had a feeling that he would rather defer any allusion to Miss Tottie and the other ladies at present.

"But what hav you been doing all this time, Septimus?" persisted the lady.

"Hawthorne wouldn't let us go. He wanted to get up a church and stage discussion, I think; but I left before it came to anything. Excuse me, my dear," added the misguided man, conscious that he was not showing well under cross-examination, "but I hav a bad headache and should like to go to bed." And to bed his lordship went, where he dreamed all night that he and Miss Simpson were playing harlequin and columbine, with the bishop of Ulundi as clown, in a private pantomime at Lambeth Palace.

Some few days after this incident, Mrs. Grundy received one of the most severe shocks she had ever experienced.

"My dear," said the bishop one afternoon, on returning from his Pan-Anglican labors, "a Mr. Oldrury, whom I understand to be a theatrical manager of some eminence, has sent, through the honorary secretaries, an invitation to the entire synod to witness a performance of Italian opera at his theater."

"Was ever such impudence!" exclaimed Mrs. Grundy.

"No doubt," replied the bishop; and then, after a little hesitation, he added: "The matter was talked over at the rising of the conference, and it was agreed that, as a refusal in the name of the synod might expose the church to obloquy, no joint action should be taken, but the individual bishops should be left to accept or not, as they think fit."

"Indeed!" said Mrs. Grundy, pursing up her lips.

"Yes, my dear, and—h'm—taking various circumstances into consideration, I hav—h'm—purely on public grounds, you understand—h'm—in short, made up my mind to attend."

Mrs. Grundy literally jumped out of her seat.

"You, Septimus!" she shrieked, and the shriek was distinctly audible in the basement.

"Yes, Maria," said the bishop, with a deprecatory wave of the hand; "the position I hav taken up in relation to the stage makes it important that I should show myself perfectly unprejudiced. I shall let it be publicly known that my purpose in attending this performance is solely to inform my own mind. On the occurrence of any breach of propriety I shall at once leave the building. Those who supported me in the recent debate agree that this is the wisest course. They also intend to be present."

Mrs. Grundy was silenced. Apparently she was also convinced; for when a week later the bishop of Malta took his place in the front row of the stalls at the Opera House, strange to relate, Mrs. Grundy was by his side.

Looking around her as soon as her eyes grew accustomed to the unwonted glare, the good woman was much comforted to find in the seats immediately behind her the bishop of Laputa and his lady. Further down in the same row were to be seen their lordships of Coventry and Botany Bay, each accompanied by his wife, while in the very center of the house stood out the burly form and curly locks of the bishop of Ulundi, who was a single man. Of course there were many more bishops. The house seemed swarming with them—not to mention the lesser ecclesiastical lights which studded the firmament in all directions. The news of such an unusual audience had also drawn a very full attendance of the general public.

All went well till the end of the second act, and, happily, up to then no "breach of propriety" compelled the bishop of Malta to fulfill his threat of retiring from the scene. At that point, however, some evil spirit had prompted Mr. Oldrury to interpolate a ballet, as though that were the one thing wanting to adapt the opera to the taste of an episcopal audience. Not having studied his program very closely, the bishop of Malta was quite unaware of the treat in store, until at the end of the act troops of short-skirted damsels suddenly invaded the stage and commenced to pirouet and caper, apropos of nothing. His lordship hardly knew how to act in this terrible emergency. He had a constitutional aversion to creating a scene, and, besides, the movements of the dancers struck him as picturesque and interesting.

"Sit still for the present, Maria," he whispered, in answer to an inquiring glance from his wife; "we need not look."

So Mrs Grundy thought; but she noticed that the bishop did look all the same, and, an instant later, she saw him start and color crimson. Little did she know the cause. In the front row of the band of coryphees who tripped down to the footlights at that moment his lordship had recognized Miss Tottie Simpson.

"It surpasses the worst I could hav imagined, Septimus!" whispered Mrs. Grundy; "look at that dreadful creature in front—painted up to the eyes! Why, what is she doing? I declare the hussy is nodding and laughing at us!"

"Nonsense, Maria; it must be some one behind," said the poor bishop, with a jerk of his shoulder in the direction of his brother of Laputa.

"It is some one in this direction," continued the lady; "and I declare that there's another behind her doing it, too."

Mrs Grundy was right. In the row behind Miss Tottie was another of Mr. Hawthorne's gospel players who had just recognized the bishop of Laputa, and bestowed a friendly nod on that young and good-looking prelate.

Bishop Grundy took out his handkerchief and mopped his brow. What would Tottie do next? That was the agonizing thought upon his mind. Would she kiss her hand? Heaven alone could tell what these girls were capable of. His lordship felt the eyes of the whole house (not to mention those of Mrs. Grundy) upon him and Tottie. It was the most awful moment of his life.

"I shall leave the theater for a moment, Maria," he whispered; "it is worse than I expected. I feel it is—h'm—necessary to make a protest. You had better remain here. I shall return for the last act." With that he arose and made his way out.

It seemed as if all his lordship's party in the synod were only waiting this signal, for simultaneously the bishops of Laputa, Coventry, Botany Bay, and California arose and left, followed by the ebony prelate of Ulundi, who created a profound impression by treading on the toes of every lady he passed on his way out. The withdrawal of their lordships was, of course, noticed all over the house, and its significance could not be mistaken.

The six dissentient prelates met in the corridor. While they were standing there up came a gentleman of affable bearing and courteous manners, and introduced himself as Mr. Oldrury. He expressed himself stricken with remorse and dismay that anything in the ballet should hav given offense to his guests, and besought their lordships to remain for the rest of the performance.

The bishops murmured that such was their intention.

"I confess I think it a pity that you introduced this dancing business," said the bishop of Malta, with a mixture of hauteur and condescension; "still, we must not look a gift-horse in the mouth, Mr. Oldrury. On the whole, we are indebted to you for a very agreeable entertainment."

"Delighted to hear it, I am sure," said Mr. Oldrury in a much more cheerful tone; "now, might I ask if any of your lordships would honor me by taking a peep at our stage and scenic arrangements. I take the liberty of hoping that a moment's personal inspection would correct many misconceptions. Thank you, my lord. This way, please. Mind the steps, gentlemen."

Mr. Oldrury had moved off as he delivered his invitation, and was followed instantly by the bishop of Ulundi. The example of the black bishop led the others to follow one by one, until Dr. Grundy found himself bringing up the rear of the procession.

. . . . . .

The curtain had been down some time, and the orchestra were taking their places again for the next act. Mrs. Grundy was looking rather anxiously at the door by which her husband had disappeared, when simultaneously exclamations from several parts of the house called her attention to the stage.

"Look, look," she heard; "the curtain's going up! Something's wrong!"

Something certainly was. The curtain was going up, and—good heavens!—what was it revealing? Left center—two bishops with two ladies of the ballet. Right center—two more bishops with two more ladies of the ballet. Up the stage, center, one bishop (my lord of Malta) in conversation with one lady of the ballet (Miss Tottie Simpson). In the extreme distance a negro bishop tête à tête with Cherubino (Mme. Schicini). It was all over in a quarter the time it takes to tell. There was a wild shriek on the stage. In an instant fleshings and gaiters scuttled wildly away in different directions. Then down came the curtain again amid one of the most spontaneous roars of laughter ever heard in a theater, and Mrs. Grundy was seen to rise from her seat and rush wildly out of the auditorium.

There were six empty chairs at the Lambeth conference next morning. Within a few hours six ladies, each attended by a bishop, might hav been observed leaving London en route for various portions of the globe.—London Truth.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury: statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

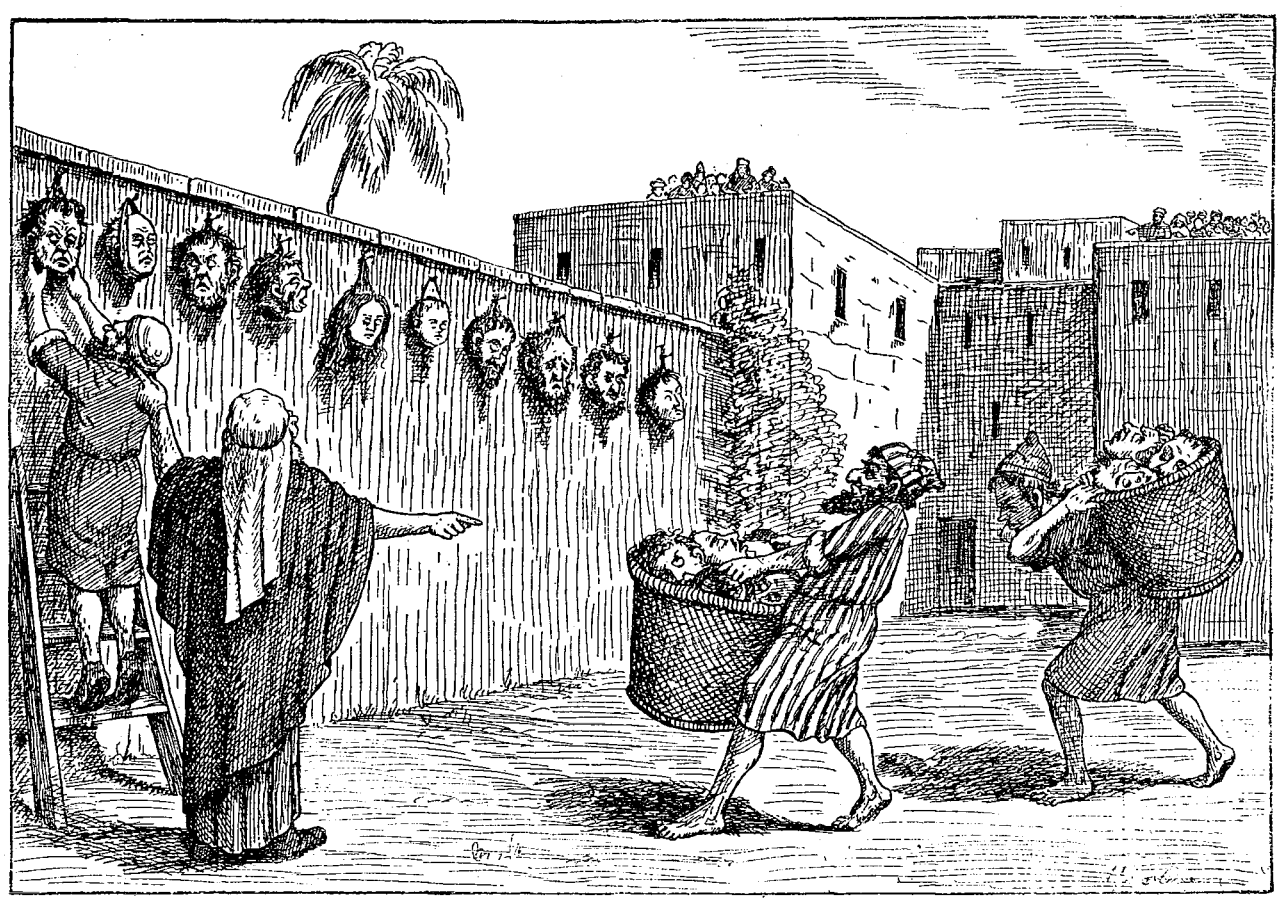
Gems of Thought.



ABRAHAM, Jacob, and David, the three greatest favorits of their God, and to whom were given the largest favors, showed by their conduct a most depraved disposition. Apparently they had but one good quality—viz., willingness to obey and flatter God. But, from the theological point of view, this is the sum and substance of morality. No one except a person of the most degraded character could act as Abraham is said to hav acted to his wife, his concubine, and his son. Yet he is held up as an example of goodness. Jacob was the most contemptible deceiver. Yet not only in spite of his deceit, but by means of it, he secures a blessing from his God. His brother Esau, who seems to hav been an honorable and generous man, is forsaken. David appears to hav been born a natural criminal. Having formed a band of all the desperadoes in the country, he began life as a brigand chief. During life he committed the greatest crimes, and on his deathbed requested his son to murder a man whom he was in honor bound to protect. Yet this criminal was "the man after God's own heart." Blessings were showered upon him. When he offended his God he was not punished personally, but his innocent subjects were slaughtered.—John Wilson, M.A., in Science, Theology, and Ethics.

SOLOMON was the wisest of kings. God himself endowed him with the gift of wisdom. He was accordingly a much greater rake than his heavenly papa, which is saying a great deal. From the midst of his five hundred wives this saint proclaimed that all is vanity.—Voltaire.

HAS any race of men ever fairly tried even the humblest experiment of freedom and found it fail? Hav not the human faculties grown in every field just as freedom has been given to them? Hav men ever clung to protection and restraint and officialism without entangling themselvs deeper and deeper into evils from which there was no outlet?—Auberon Herbert.

FOR books are not absolutely dead things, but do contain a progeny of life in them to be as activ as that soul was whose progeny they are; nay, they do preserve as in a vial the purest efficacy and extraction of that living intellect that bred them. . . . And yet, on the other hand, unless wariness be used, as good almost kill a man as kill a good book; who kills a man kills a reasonable creature, God's image; but he who destroys a good book, kills reason itself, kills the image of God, as it were, in the eye. Many a man lives a burden to the earth; but a good book is the precious life-blood of a master-spirit, embalmed and treasured up on purpose to a life beyond life. It is true, no age can restore a life, whereof, perhaps, there is no great loss; and revolutions of ages do not oft recover the loss of a rejected truth, for the want of which whole nations fare the worse. We should be wary, therefore, what persecution we raise against the living labors of public men, how we spill that seasoned life of man, preserved and stored up in books; since we see a kind of homicide may be thus committed, sometimes a martyrdom; and if it extend to the whole impression, a kind of massacre, whereof the execution ends not in the slaying of an elemental life, but strikes at the ethereal and fifth essence, the breath of reason itself; slays an immortality rather than a life.—Milton.

"ALL scripture is God-inspired" (2 Tim. iii, 16). This is awkward for such theologians as would like to claim that only their own favorit texts are inspired and the passages that lend support to their little isms, but that texts that are repugnant to them, and passages which conflict with their ism, are not God-inspired. This contention, of course, implies that the Holy Ghost produced some writings and shook them up in a sack with the writings of mere mortals, and set mankind to a desperate effort of eclecticism, the determining which are the writings of God and which are the writings of patristic forgers. Man cannot hav been made so much lower than the angels after all, if he can write so alarmingly like God that even the learned hav not been able to agree as to how much of the holy scriptures hav been written by Jehovah of heaven, and how much by John Smith of earth. If this half-and-half inspiration theory be not particularly complimentary to El Shaddai, "the almighty," it is certainly a feather in the cap of John Smith, a poor "worm of the dust." We are to "search the scriptures" in order to obtain "eternal life;" and some of us, who would really like "eternal life," would not mind the trouble of searching the scriptures if we could only find out what the scriptures really are. Not one man in fifty thousand has had the leisure and the learning to con over the ancient MSS. and codices, and to determin for himself which writings are divine and which human. Even if God did giv man a written revelation, one thing is certain—we hav either never seen that revelation, or, when we do see it, we fail to clearly distinguish it from the mass of ancient writings of a similar character with which it has got inextricably mixed.—Saladin's God and His Book.

THE church and the stage should be more friendly than they are. The average actress can furnish a larger harvest of marriage fees than five ordinary women.

THE minister who, sixty years ago, preached the first sermon in Chicago still livs; and he is still of the opinion that the Chicago of to-day is good missionary ground.

BERTHA: "You seem very happy, Dora." Dora: "Ah, yes; I hav every reason to be. We hav a beautiful home, two lovely children, a snug sum in the bank, my husband's life is insured for $20,000, and his health is very far from robust."

THE craze for whistling among girls is seriously troubling the humorous editor of the Boston Transcript. He says it is almost impossible to tell whether a girl is soliciting a kiss, or is only preparing to pucker. He ought to giv the girl the benefit of the doubt.

REV. HEBER NEWTON thinks the world needs a new religion. If he refers to a brand of theology that will permit a young man to attend a church fair without being seduced into paying $5 for a ten-cent pincushion, he will find many persons to agree with him in his belief.

A WESTERN paper recently offered a prize for the best story to be written by a pupil of the public school. Here are a few passages from the contributions: "Cora Brown was fortunately the possessor of a birthday, for she was the daughter of rich friends." "But all this time a cloud was gathering over Mrs. Delaney, which grew large as years went by, and that cloud was full of grasshoppers." "My father desired me to marry a bank president, a handsome, reckless man, fond of naught save the gaming-table." "'Vat I dell you, vat I dell you,' shouted the Irishman." WE hav heard, with the deepest regret, certain disrespectful comments upon Bishop Potter's appearing in knee-breeches and silk stockings. There were ever groveling natures who scoff at everything. Even a bishop's legs inspire them with little reverence. How are we to know the motivs that prompted him to this step? It is not for individual members of the laity to pass judgment upon ecclesiastical affairs; for a bishop's legs ought certainly to come under that head. It is also manifestly unfair to accuse him of personal vanity, a quality unknown to a model bishop. Equally unfair would it be to assert that he did it because "it's English, you know." Rather let us believe Bishop Potter possesses a deeper insight than ourselvs into the subtle influence exercised upon the morals of the community by a reasonable display of the contours of those useful members.

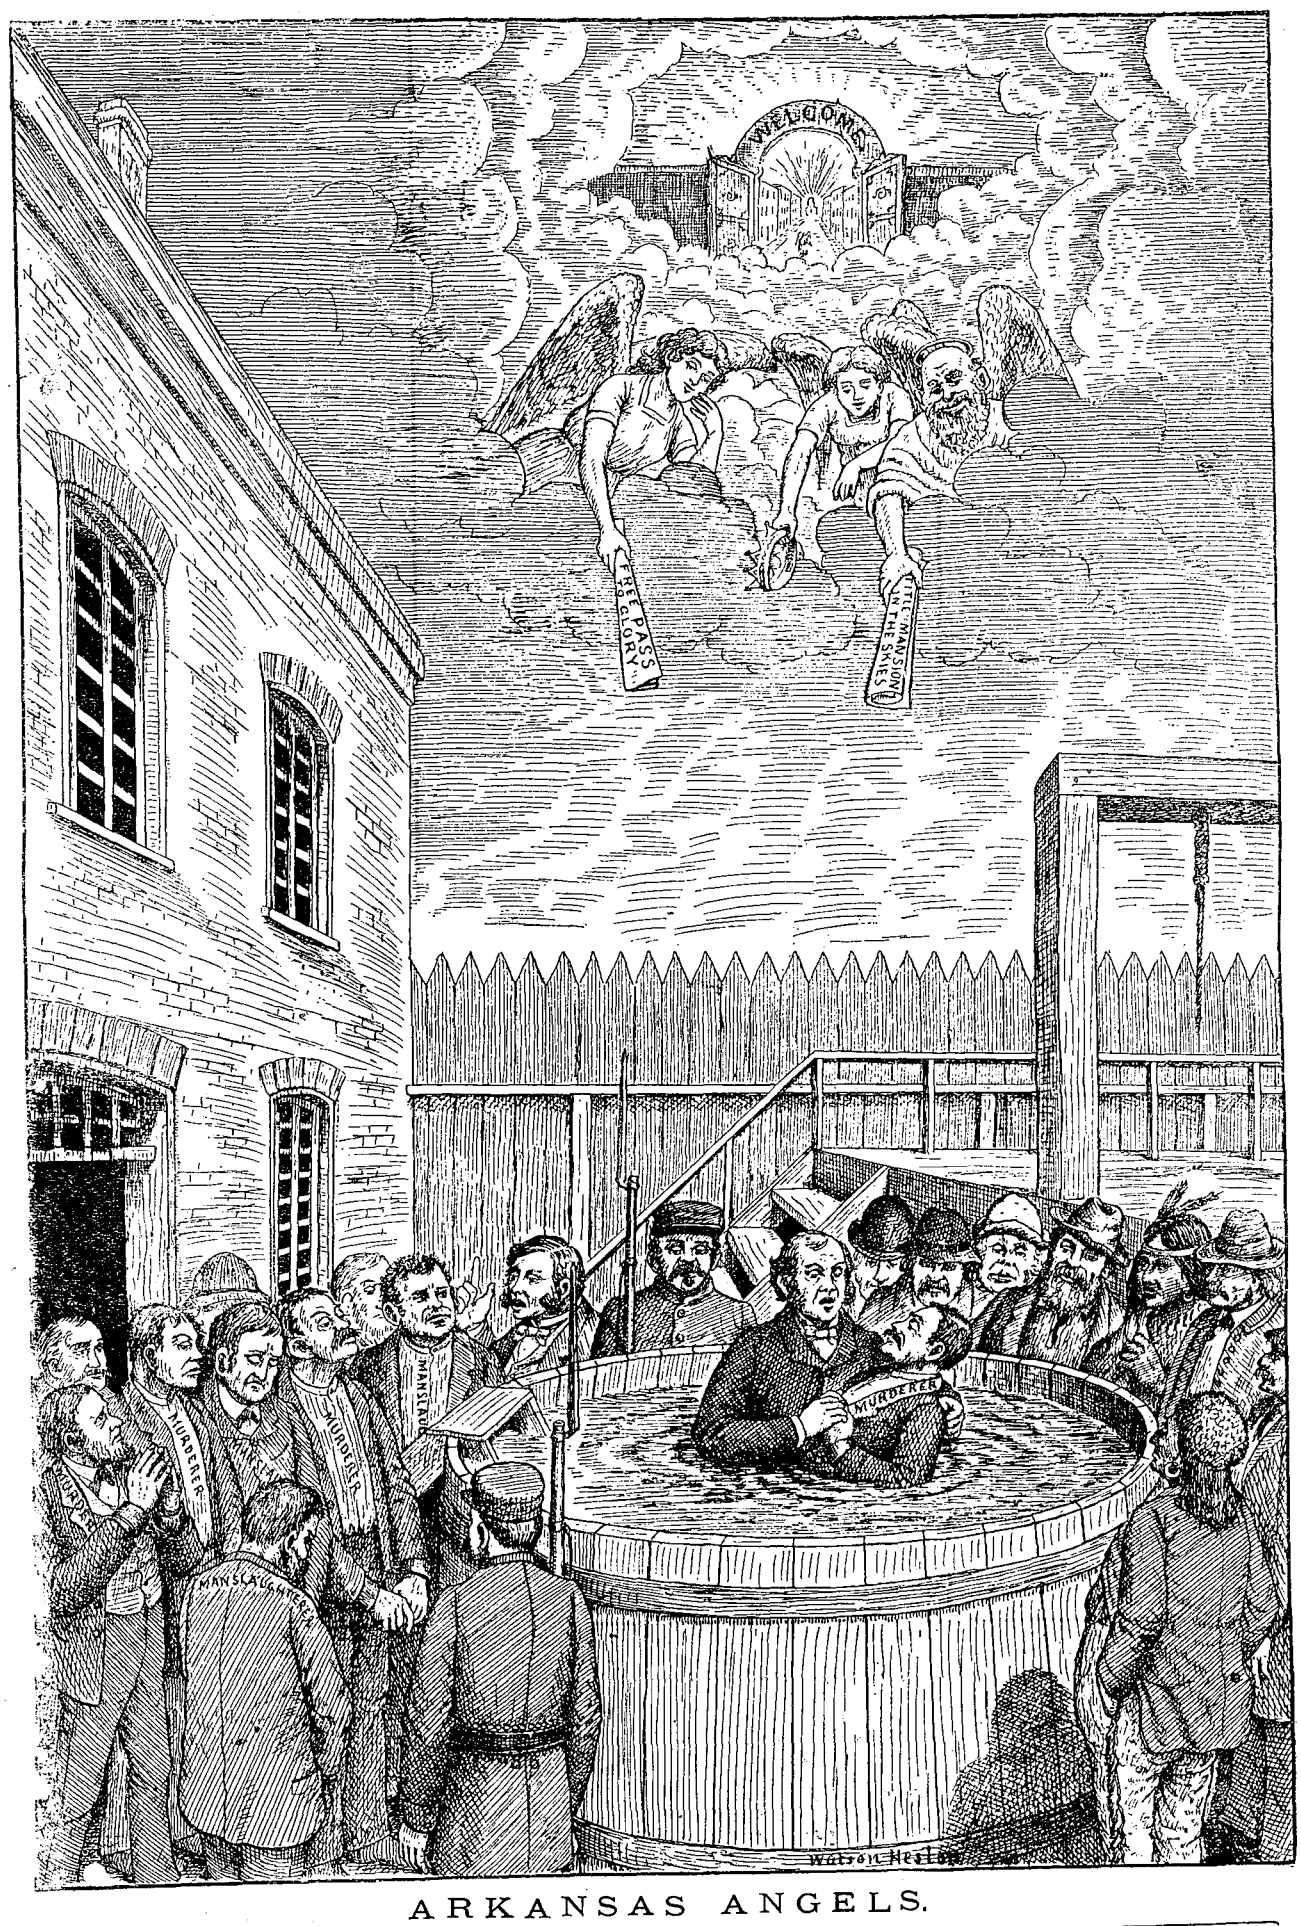
Notes and Clippings.



A RATHER strange affliction happened to a Minnesota couple who were sleigh-riding. The young man's right ear and the lady's left were frosted, while the other two were not cold at all. Why all four ears were not frosted is a problem which has been submitted to the high school class in physiology.

A BILL providing that women shall hav the right to vote in this state "at any municipal election or any election for supervisors or excise officers" has been introduced in the assembly by Mr. Ainsworth.

THE way Colonel Ingersoll settled a lawsuit: Mr. E. S. Stokes said to a reporter: "There seems to hav been an extraordinary misconception about the compromise over the suit of that man in Brooklyn. I had a row with him one day last summer and pulled his nose, and then he sued me for $10,000. Now the papers say that I hav compromised the suit, and that it has been withdrawn. The word compromise is a large one to use in connection with this suit. Colonel Ingersoll had been called over to Brooklyn two or three times to attend to the matter for me, and the last time he was over there he had a few spirited words with the counsel of the man who was suing me. The colonel said it was an infernal nuisance and not worth bothering with, and he did not intend to go over to Brooklyn again. Thereupon the other lawyer said he did not think there was much in it himself, and that he would pull out if he could get his own fee. The colonel asked him what his fee would be, and the opposition attorney said he would be well satisfied with $100. The colonel pulled out a $100 bill and tossed it over to him, and came back to New York. That is the end of the whole suit as far as we are concerned. Ingersoll did not think it was of enough importance to tell me about it even until I saw it in the papers and questioned him."

THE fact that the elementary substances now number, according to chemists, full seventy, shows an increase within the last fifty years of nearly one-fourth in the number known. The size of an atom of oxygen or nitrogen is said to hav a diameter of one-ten-millionth part of a centimeter; the atoms are supposed to be in a state of constant motion, at the rate of seventy miles a minute, and to make them visible, the present highest known magnifying power of the miscroscope would hav to be increased nearly a thousand fold.

FOR many years the Russian church has been doing missionary work in Alaska, chiefly among the Thlinkets of southeastern Alaska. Sixty thousand dollars has been appropriated annually for this work from the imperial treasury at St. Petersburg, but in spite of the labors of a large band of priests and deacons, the success of the movement has been small, and it is reported that "the strength of the Russian church seems to be waning before the incoming of American influences," whatever that may mean.

ARKANSAS ANGELS.

ACCORDING to a German scientific journal they are using electricity in India to prevent snakes going into dwellings. Before all the doors and around the house two wires are laid, isolated from one another and connected with an induction apparatus. When the snake attempts to enter the house or go under it, he completes the circuit as he crawls over the two wires, and if the shock he gets doesn't kill him, it is likely to frighten him so that he goes away from there as soon as he can.

THE prayers delivered in the House by the blind chaplain, Milburn, as reported in the Congressional Record, giv daily proof of the report that he has the papers read to him every morning, so that he may be kept informed on all the events of the day that can be brought into his supplications. Many of his prayers are of the nature of orations rather than orisons, and the rhetoric he employs in them is often too gaudy for the news that they contain.

A DISTINGUISHED Boston clergyman, the Rev. Dr. Bliss, is the leader of an organization which is striving to establish a new "Society of Christian Socialists," founded upon faith in the "fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man." Beautiful indeed is the program of the Rev. Dr. W. D. P. Bliss, sneers the Sun. It reminds us of a beautiful sunrise, or a beautiful work of painting, sculpture, or architecture, or a beautiful poem, or a beautiful piece of mechanism, or a beautiful dream. If it were only in harmony with human nature, or adapted to human society, or capable of being put in practical operation by mankind, it would be interesting indeed, though lacking in novelty or originality. The Rev. Dr. Bliss does not seem to be aware that he can easily procure a library of books, ancient, middle-aged, and modern, in which his notions shine with beauty unsurpassed even by his imagination.

THERE was a time, says the Sun, when the devout Protestants of this city would hav been astounded at the notion of giving a "dramatic entertainment" for the benefit of a church fund. But there hav been changes of opinion on the subject, and incidents of that kind are now frequently reported. There was one of them here lately, and an Episcopal church was the beneficiary. The patrons and patronesses of the entertainment were church people.

THERE is a theory that the advance of population, building of railroads, etc., in the far West is attended by a gradual increase in the much-needed rainfall. Those interested in the truth of the proposition will be disappointed to learn that there are no scientific facts to sustain it. Prof. Cleveland Abbe, in the February Forum, asserts that the study of the known "phenomena has failed to establish that there has been any sensible change in the climate at any point of the earth's surface during the past two thousand years."

A CATECHISM prepared by the Rev. F. A. Gace, Anglican vicar of Great Barling, Eng., and widely circulated, contains the following: "In what light ought we to consider dissenters? As heretics. Is their worship a laudable service? No; their worship is idolatrous. Is dissent a great sin? Yes; it is in direct opposition to our duty to God. Why hav not dissenters been excommunicated? Because the law of the land does not allow the wholesome law of the church to be acted on. Is it wicked to enter a meeting-house? Most assuredly." The Rock says Mr. Gace is a "shining light among the ritualists."

Life in the Institute of Charity.

In the ANNUAL for 1888 I gave some account of my life in a Trappist monastery, and at the request of some friends promised to supplement it with a description of my career in a more modern order. Several months hav elapsed since then, and many circumstances hav combined to prevent my doing so. I hav not, however, forgotten my promis, and will now fulfill it by relating something of my experience among the Fathers of Charity.

In the April of 1855, I turned my back upon the Abbey of Mount St. Bernard, and drove seven miles through the treeless Forest of Charnwood to the old town of Loughborough. A French priest who was returning from a short visit to the monastery was my only companion. As we rode along, early on that spring morning, I remember hearing, for the first time in eight months, the cheerful voice of a young boy, exercising his natural-born right of free speech, flavored with a strong Leicestershire dialect. In my southern ears it sounded as a strange tongue. At Loughborough Station, I took my seat in a carriage for Rugby, and was somewhat amused by the interest my closely cropped hair evidently excited in two ladies who were my fellow-passengers. At that time in England the hair was worn long, except by the inmates of lunatic asylums and prisons.

At length we reached Rugby, and I made my way at once to St. Marie's College. It is rather a handsome building, in the center of a large and well-kept garden, which is divided by a low wall on one side from a cemetery in which stands a small but very pretty Gothic church. Beyond the garden, and also divided from it by a low wall, was the garden of the female members of the order, the sisters of the Institute of Charity. Their convent was in the center of their own garden, but very much smaller than the college. I suppose it was large enough, for there were but three usually there. We numbered about fifty or sixty, more or less, as some were sent to other colleges or missions, or brought from them to ours.

I was expected, of course, as my transfer from my late order to that I was about to join had previously been arranged between the superiors of both. I was conducted to the parlor, where I was shortly visited, first by the provincial (the superior of the entire order in the English province) and next by the rector (the superior of that particular house). Then dinner was served to me and I was left alone. After a little time the Father Socius (companion, next in rank to the rector) came to me and told me that I must go into retreat for a week. I thought I had been in retreat for the last eight months, and an additional week would not make any material difference. This Father Socius, whose name was Cardoza, was a Brazilian of Portuguese extraction, an extremely small man, and of such an extraordinarily juvenil appearance that, although he was my superior, spiritual adviser, and confessor for more than a year, I could never rid myself of the impression that he was a boy about fourteen years of age. This impression was afterward rather strengthened by my being appointed his instructor in the English language.

Speaking of language, it is rather ahead of the proper course of my narrativ, but something happened to me that night which I will relate here. I had a room in the upper part of the building, and was already secluded in it for the purpose of retreat. For the previous eight months I had been living in perfect silence, and the conversations I had taken part in that day had been with single individuals, and carried on in a subdued tone. True, I had heard some merry chat during the hour of recreation after dinner, but that was out of doors in the garden, and the voices floated to me from the distance. But when supper in the refectory was over, I having finished my lonely repast in the parlor and retired to my own apartment a few moments before, suddenly within the Gothic cloisters, up the broad staircase, along the narrow corridors, waking up, as it seemed, in every corner a hundred echoes, rolled a mighty volume of sound. It issued from some fifty or sixty throats and took its multiplicity of shapes from as many tongues. Tongues from all parts of England and Ireland, each with more or less of the accent of its nativ country. London tongues, Warwickshire tongues, Northumberland tongues, Lancashire tongues, Dublin tongues, Kerry tongues, Galway tongues. Scotland was represented by only one tongue, but it wagged its best. French tongues from Paris and from Marseilles, Austrian tongues and Italian tongues which disowned all relationship with each other. Some with Florentine-like purity from Milan, some mixed with barbarous French from Piedmont, and some with the indescribable patois known only in Genoa. Even far-off South America made itself heard. I thought of the tower of Babel. But it was only the recreation of the religious brethren at the close of the day.

I passed my week of retreat in pious meditation. Twice each day the monotony of this occupation was broken by a visit from Father Socius, who treated me on each occasion to an hour's explanation of the sinfulness of sin, of my own innate propensity for it, and of its various punishments in hell, which last, however, I might perhaps finally escape, if I persevered to the end in religious life, thereby avoiding the seductiv pleasures of the outside world. One hour in the day I was allowed to walk in the garden. It was the time of the novices' recreation, but as I was in retreat I could not speak to them nor they to me. At the end of the week I had to make a general confession. For the benefit of the uninitiated I will explain that a general confession is a declaration of the sins of an entire lifetime, as distinguished from a particular confession, which covers the period from the last confession only.

This duty performed, and having received forgivness for all the sins which had been forgiven before, as well as for those which had not, I was admitted into the community. For a few weeks I continued to wear my own clothes, and then I received the cassock, beretta, stock, and Roman collar. As these did not differ from those usually worn by priests, they need no particular description. There was no ceremony connected with the clothing. The articles were simply handed to me by the Father Socius in his own room, and I substituted them for the coat and necktie I had previously worn.

Before describing the daily life in my new order, I will explain some points of difference between it and that which I had just quitted.

That which I had left was in the twelfth century of its existence; that which I joined was still in its infancy. Its founder, the author of its rule, was still presiding over it as general. He died during my novitiate. Those old orders are all socialistic republics. These of modern origin are absolute monarchies. The general appoints provincials, and the provincials appoint the rectors of the colleges within their respectiv provinces. The only elected officer is the general, and he is chosen by the votes of superiors only. The order being young in my time, the Institute of Charity consisted of but two provinces. The one provincial resided in England, the other in Italy. Both provincials, however, as well as the rector of our college, in fact, nearly all the superiors of the order, were of Italian birth. The provincial of the English province was the Very Rev. Father Pagani, D.D., author of many well known theological and devotional works. He was elected general after the decease of the founder, and appointed another Italian priest to succeed to the office thus rendered vacant.

In dress and manner of living it is the rule of the Institute to follow the custom of the secular clergy of the place. Mass and office are said according to the Roman ritual. That is, the order not having been in existence long enough to produce saints of its own, whom it might celebrate on special festivals, its members observe the same calendar as the secular priests of the diocese. I suppose it is scarcely necessary for me to explain that secular priests are those who are not members of any religious order.

The one feature which distinguishes the Institute of Charity from all other societies bound by religious vows is the obligation of indifference. Not only must the religious be ever ready to obey his superior in all things, but he must never show nor feel any preference of his own in anything. If he is told to receive ordination, to take charge of a home parish, to teach a country school, to preach on foreign missions, to go out begging for alms, to do anything possible for man to do, he must obey without hesitation, and without having any preference in the matter. He must thoroughly sink his own individuality, and force his will, his intellect, and even his senses, into entire submission to the man who is set over him.

Instead of living by rule every day alike, as the members of the older orders do, the religious of the Institute of Charity are subject to constant changes, without having any choice in the matter themselvs. A man may pass years studying for the priesthood, and the remainder of his existence in teaching an infant class the alphabet. Or he might be taken from the latter occupation and sent to preach in some foreign country, among people of whose language he was utterly ignorant. And when after a few years of patient study he had qualified himself for his duties there, he might, and certainly would if his indifference were considered at all doubtful, be transferred to some other part of the world.

Now for the regular life in the college. We rose at 5. From 5:30 to 6:30 was spent in meditation, the first and last fifteen minutes on our knees. From 6:30 to 7:30 was spent in study. At 7:30 we attended mass in the oratory, a room within the college fitted up as a chapel. From 8 till 8:30 study of the rule, and at 8:30 breakfast. After this we made up our beds, and then studied alone, or attended the schools of our several professors, recited the little hours, as they are called, prime, tierce, sext, and now all run into one in the oratory, and so passed the time until the hour of dinner, which was 1 o'clock. Dinner consisted of soup, roast meat, vegetables, pies, puddings, bread, cheese, salads, and beer. After dinner one hour's recreation, walking in the garden if the weather permitted, if not, in the cloisters, general conversation, and ball-playing. After this we recited vespers and compline in the oratory. Then three days in the week we returned to our studies for the remainder of the afternoon, and on the other days walked in the surrounding country two or three together. Of course, we did not choose our own companions, but had them selected for us by superiors. The same couples were not sent together more frequently than could be avoided, in order to prevent the forming of special friendships. After this, matins and lauds for the next morning were said by anticipation. Then more study or school. Supper at 7:30, and afterward recreation, of which I hav already spoken, until 9:30; then to the oratory for rosary, night prayers, sprinkling with holy water, and to bed at 10 or shortly after. Some slept in separate rooms, others five or six in a dormitory, their respectiv cells being divided by curtains from each other.

During all meals an appointed reader read aloud to the rest, who ate in silence, but on Easter Sunday, and on days when a newly ordained priest said his first mass, we had no reading at dinner, but general conversation was indulged in. Wine on such occasions was added to our banquet, and singing songs and telling stories kept us at table till late in the afternoon. Every year in the early summer we had a week's retreat, during which strict silence was observed, and the time entirely given to the contemplation of the four last things, death, judgment, heaven, and hell. This week wound up with a general confession. It was followed by four weeks' vacation. We did not rise till 6 o'clock in that month. We had no schools, no study, unlimited freedom of speech, and two country walks daily.

There does not appear to be anything in this life injurious to the physical condition, and yet it is certain that while the Trappist monks, with all their severe penances, dirty habits, and generally unhealthy surroundings, seemed to be remarkably free from sickness, and were in most instances strong, vigorous men, the reverse was true of the inmates of St. Marie's College. The only explanation I hav ever heard of this was that the water was conveyed to the building in leaden pipes. Some time after my leaving the community I was informed that they had been removed, and pipes of some other material substituted.

I will now say a few words regarding our course of studies, and then conclude. The first was the classical course. Many who joined the order had already completed their classical studies in other colleges. If so, they were placed at once in the school of philosophy, which might more appropriately hav been called metaphysics. Their stay there was very short, for they had to master only a single treatis, written by the founder of the order. Essentially it was very much thus. Locke taught that there are no innate ideas in the human mind. Locke was wrong. Rosmini teaches that every man is born with an innate idea of the reality of a personal God. Rosmini is right.

The final study was theology. The professor of that branch in my time was Rev. Father Carlo Caccia (please pronounce Catch'er, and you will be about right), once a canon of Milan cathedral. I cannot compress the theological teaching within the limits of an article, or within the limits of five hundred TRUTH SEEKERS, but I can tell you something of much more importance that I learned in St. Marie's College. I learned to doubt Christianity altogether. It was not, indeed, till many years after that I finally burst the chains that bound me to the dead thought of past ages, but the first little seed was sown there that in time grew up to a very large tree of disbelief, and the article I am now writing is a specimen of its fruit.

This is where I ought to finish, but if I do, I suppose I shall be charged with another sin of omission. I had enjoyed the best of health among the Trappists, but at the college, like everybody else, I fell sick. I hope I shall be forgiven for that, for I never did it before or since, to anything like so serious an extent. I suppose I was really suffering from lead-poisoning, although I had no suspicion of it there. It was judged advisable that I should leave the community for a while, mingle with the world again, and if I recovered my health, return. I left the community, I mingled with the world, I recovered my health, and—well! I was no longer seventeen, but twenty-one, and I did not return. E. J. BOWTELL.

Is It Right to Smuggle?

A Christian has a great advantage over a Rationalist in deciding questions of morality. His short and easy method is to consult the Bible upon the question raised, and if the directions are not explicit, as is sometimes the case with "God's own word," he asks the opinion of priest or parson and their decision makes his path plain. This saves a great deal of perplexity, which befalls him who tries to settle a question on its merits and weigh all the pros and cons before deciding the issue. A devoted evangelist received a telegram urging him to take the next express train and come to a certain town to preach. He prayerfully opened the Word, to learn the mind of the Lord, and his eye fell upon the passage (Isa. xxviii, 16), "He that believeth shall not make haste." So he wrote to the "dear brother" who had summoned him that it was not the Lord's will that he should go hurry-skurry by express trains upon telegraphic orders, but when the Master wanted him deliberate notice would be given. The same man had boarded a steamer in New York to go to England. A friend came to him with an urgent request that he should giv up his trip and remain in America. "Come to my state-room, brother, and we will ask the Lord about it," was the response. They prayed in turn for guidance, and the evangelist opened the Bible for the answer. In Acts xvi, 36, he saw the words, "Now therefore depart, and go in peace." This settled the matter in favor of the continuance of the voyage. As in olden time the "priest with Urim and Thummim" could answer hard questions, so now the minister with the Bible settles all vexed discussions as to the whole duty of man.

It is a great comfort to be saved the wear and tear of brain caused by the exercise of the mind upon doubtful points, and this is one great reason for the hold of the church upon the unthinking masses. It givs some warrant for the otherwise dubious anecdote of a man who received a severe injury to his head, affecting the brain. The surgeon removed a portion of the brain in order to put it to rights, but when he turned around again to replace the repaired organ, he found that his patient had disappeared. Some months after, he met him upon the street, and accosting him he said, "My man, do you know that you left your brains in my office? How do you get along without them?" "Oh, first rate," was the reply; "I've joined the church and don't hav any use for them now."

But the man of reason has to weigh the evidence, and on many points where the Christian has a sure guide he must beat about in uncertainty till a preponderance of arguments decides his course. The ethics of smuggling is one of the subjects upon which the Christian can hav no doubt. "Keep the king's commandment." "Render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's." "Be subject unto the higher powers." "Whosoever resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God; and they that resist shall receive to themselvs damnation." "Submit yourselvs to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake." It is clearly a Christian duty to obey the laws; and the many church-members, who, like the statesman of Maine, get their well-filled trunks passed from the English steamer onto American soil free of duty, whether by fraud or favor, are guilty of sin and abide under sentence of damnation.

The Rationalist does not admit the divinity of law. Great consternation was caused among the clergy when the Freethinking Abolitionists proclaimed allegiance to a higher law than the edict of government and refused to return the fugitiv slave; but at the South, Christian obedience made many adhere to secession, by the maxim, "My country, right or wrong." That loftiest of moralists, Emerson, said, "Good men should not keep the law too well." It is usually expedient to keep the law, and if its infraction is detected the offender must submit to the penalty; but as a question of ethics it is right to violate any enactment of government that infringes upon justice.

If tariffs violate natural rights, smuggling is a virtue and not a crime. Waiving the plea of the Anarchist that all government violates natural rights, let us look at things as they are. Men almost unanimously hav subjected themselvs to government for mutual protection and aid. To defray the expenses of this arrangement, it has been deemed the simplest method to enact a revenue tariff and levy duties on imports that enter into general use. Thus tea is an article that is consumed in nearly every house, and a tax upon it secures a contribution from almost every man in the country. If anyone, therefore, smuggles the tea that his family uses, he is shirking his share of the support of the system of society to which he has given his adhesion either directly or tacitly. From this illustration we may assume that when a revenue tariff is fairly constructed its evasion is to be condemned and it is wrong to smuggle. For the good of all, man should submit to what society at large considers the least onerous method of securing the expenses of administration.

But it is one thing to submit to taxation for the general good, and another to be fined for the benefit of an individual or a class. This is the action of a protectiv tariff. Let examples illustrate. In the United States, petroleum of good quality was discovered, and the skill of refiners has finally produced an admirable, odorless burning oil. In Ontario an inferior article was found from which no skill available has yet made satisfactory kerosene. The Canadians naturally bought the best oil and the Ontario product was unsalable. The owners of the oil wells therefore went to the dominion government in a fever of patriotism, and showed that the welfare of the country demanded the development of the oil industry. The Canadian oil was so bad that the unpatriotic people would not use it even if they had to pay considerably more for good oil raised under a foreign flag, so a duty of seven and one-fifth cents per gallon was imposed, and while the citizen of the United States gets his oil for fifteen cents the Canadian has to pay thirty-five cents for it. His nativ oil has to be sold at twenty-five cents to secure custom, and even then few well-to-do people use it; but the poor are forced to buy it and its foul odors render their homes noxious. Now, a tariff of this character outrages natural morality, and anyone who has the opportunity to smuggle oil for his own use is perfectly justified in evading the tariff, which in this case perpetrates an iniquitous robbery. To smuggle for trade profit is another matter and under any tariff is to be condemned as wrong, because it takes an unfair advantage of other traders. Another example of the cases in which it is right to smuggle may be mentioned as showing a somewhat different phase of the question. Two young ladies, one a gifted poetess and the other a minister's daughter, stood upon the steamer wharf after a visit to Europe. The searcher approached the well-filled trunks. The minister's daughter declared that hers contained only personal effects; but the tender conscience of the poetess caused her to say, "I hav a dozen silver teaspoons for my mother." "Fifteen dollars' duty, miss," said the searcher, and with great consternation the fine was paid out of a slender purse. "I declare you are too good to liv!" exclaimed the spirited daughter of theology. "I wouldn't hav told about it!" Nor should she hav done so. They were as fairly to be classed with personal effects as many other articles in her trunk. They would never hav been purchased if it had been known that duty was to be paid, nor would similar goods of home manufacture hav been bought if these had not been procured. No one would hav been wronged had she smuggled.

To evade the demands of a protectiv tariff by all moral means (not by lying) is the right of every freeman; for this legislation is merely the most civilized method and latest refinement of the tyrannical robbery which formerly was practiced in the various degrees of barbarism, under the power of clubs, spears, knives, and pistols, but has now disguised its operation under the shadow of laws, ostensibly patriotic and sophistically beneficial to their victims.

People are prone enough to smuggle and do not need any incitement thereto. The real purport of this article (apart from a spiteful slap at the tariff) is to call attention to the distinction between Christian morality and Rationalistic ethics and to point out the true method for determining right conduct. The standard of rectitude for the Christian is "the will of God" as expressed in the Bible and interpreted by the church and clergy; but this means merely the opinions of Jewish and Hebrew writers in dark and distant ages—men who were profoundly ignorant of the order of nature and of the facts upon which morality rests. But the Rationalist is freed from bondage to ancient prejudice and barbarian fancies. His maxim is: "Do no harm," and whatever conduct is useful and injures no one, that is right, no matter how many gods or bibles or priests may hav forbidden it. This simple rule remôves the burden of slavery to old customs and speeds the willing feet on the path of progress.

Christianity forbids recreation on Sunday, the worker's only day of leisure, because in an old scrapbook of Hebrew literature it says that a superstitious autocrat named Moses, three thousand years ago, forbade man to work on Saturday. It denies the right of unhappy married couples to separate, because in the first century of this era an unmarried Jewish peasant, named Jesus, said that to do so was sinful. It prohibits women from public speaking, because an old bachelor, named Paul, told the ladies of Jerusalem he would not suffer them to teach. It has taught that slaves must submit to oppression, because a fisherman, named Peter, said: "Servants, be subject to your masters with all fear—not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward." It has denounced revolt against tyrants, because the tent-maker Paul said: "The powers that be are ordained of God." It has threatened eternal damnation upon men and given them all the foretaste of it that was possible, if they denied that the orderly methods of nature had ever been interrupted by miracles, because in old times ignorant and credulous men, who accepted all the fables about ghosts, devils, witches, incarnations, and resurrections, taught: "He that believeth not shall be damned." Reason comes as the true savior of men to deliver them from this mental subjugation and moral debasement, and to the advancing hosts of freedom it issues its marching orders:

Follow what is good and pleasant,
Linger not among the dead;
Act—act in the living present,
Be sure you're right, then go ahead.

ROBERT C. ADAMS.

Mrs. Colman's Views.

I think it is a long time since my name has found its way into THE TRUTH SEEKER as a correspondent, but I assure you I never miss anything that another writes. The last issue, January 26th, makes me very anxious as well as very glad. Glad that our secretary, Mr. Stevens, is so faithfully doing the work for which he was reëlected at the annual meeting of the Union in Pittsburgh. Anxious, because so few people realize how specially needful it is just now that every Liberal, either by voice, pen, purse, or by the three combined, come up to the work for Universal Mental Liberty. It seems to me that never were the church and state so activ in using all the powers of their organizations to stamp out freedom. The woman suffrage societies will hav to use great diligence to keep themselvs from being entirely controled by the church.

What a howl the entire Protestant church is making about the encroachment of the Catholic church in its attempt to decide upon the use in the schools of histories which reveal to the thinking student the true inwardness of that church! At the same time the Protestant church declares that its Bible shall be read, and its ministry shall pray not only in the public schools, but in all the public places in which people assemble to do the government's work.

The church demands the shutting up of saloons one day in seven, and Prohibition on all days, and weak men and ignorant women do not see that that is an entering wedge by which the church hopes to, and will, if it is successful, decide upon what we shall eat, drink, and wear; what we shall read and print, and what works of art, or attempted art, shall be upon our shelves and tables. Our people who really believe with us in liberty hav been frightened by the cry of obscenity, as they are now by the fear of encouraging dram-drinking and licentiousness. There seems as yet no other way but that the John the Baptists who go before declaring the way of freedom must bear the stigma of reproach, the suffering of imprisonment and death, for what must be said and done if civilization is to be a success.

I hav never said more radical things upon the question of woman's subjugation under the marriage laws than the Rev. Minot Savage said from his pulpit in Boston recently on that subject. Mona Caird's articles are published in popular reviews. And at last we hav a woman learned enough and popular enough (though she is not afraid to be known as belonging to the Secular Union) to administer a scathing rebuke to the Board of Missions that presumes to dictate, and succeeds in its dictations, to the large publishing house in Boston, Houghton, Mifflin & Co., what it shall publish, if it is not creditable to their doings. So really the world moves, and perhaps I am needlessly anxious. My letter is already long, and though I intended when I took my pen to say at least my thanks to the good friends at Pittsburgh whom I met for the first time at that place, and the others who were already my friends, I must wait for another time. Only this much let me say, that your kindness and loving manifestations are among the pleasantest reminiscences of my life. May all good attend you. In my next letter I will tell you of my visit, and of the people whom I met in old Massachusetts and some other states the last autumn.

The Calendar Alone Worth a Quarter.

From Dr. Foote's Health Monthly.

THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC for the year 1889 rivals in interest the previous numbers, which hav all been excellent. It is furnished at twenty-five cents from the office, 28 Lafayette place, New York. Its almanac department is full of interesting historical events recalling deeds of the world's eminent scientists and Liberals in the past. It also has several pages of matter, compiled from Shakspere and Ingersoll and other illustrious poets, showing how great thoughts run in the same channels, though differently expressed in original ways. There are full-page illustrations of the Lick Observatory and its great telescope, of the statue to Giordano Bruno, in Rome, and others of artistic merit.

The Truth Seeker Annual Much Appreciated by Mr. Walker.

From Fair Play.

This valuable ANNUAL contains a Freethought Calendar for 1889, a summary of the notable events of the Freethought propaganda in the United States in 1888, a Symposium upon Liberalism, participated in by twenty-four men and women more or less prominent in the Freethought work, the Nine Demands of Liberalism, and "Ingersoll and Shakspere"—the latter consisting of a "collocation of the most admired passages of Ingersoll and Shakspere," in which "a number of selections from the former, for which there could be found in the latter no counterpart, of identity or similarity of subject, and of the first order of merit, will be found accompanied by some of the beauties of other poets." Of this part of the ANNUAL there are twenty-nine pages and they are by no means the least entertaining.

In Memory of Thomas Paine.

The following notice is from the Chicago Inter-Ocean:

The one hundred and fifty-second anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine was celebrated last night at Princess Opera House, 558 West Madison street, by the Chicago Secular Union. The hall was handsomely decorated with American ags, and upon the walls a number of selections from Paine's writings were displayed in large letters. "The world is my country, to do good is my religion," "Do justice, love mercy, and endeavor to make our fellow-creatures happy," "Free-thought will giv us truth," were the most prominent. The program consisted of vocal and instrumental selections, with several brief speeches on the life and character of Thomas Paine. The president of the Secular Union, E. A. Stevens, said it was fitting that they should celebrate with joy and gladness the natal day of the truest friend the people ever had. Paine was a glorious patriot; a statesman whose principle was higher than diplomacy, and whose devotion to justice and freedom was above and beyond all chicanery and selfishness. Prof. George A. Vinton, of the Chicago Dramatic and Musical College, said Paine spoke like an oracle from heaven. He loved liberty, not only for himself, but for all mankind. He hated bigotry and oppression, both in church and state. Professor Vinton also gave as a recitation the well-known poem, "The Queen's Touch." Mrs. M. A. Freeman also spoke in eulogistic terms of Paine. "He did not believe in hell," she said. "He believed in a heaven here. He did not come to save a few sects or even a nation, but the whole world. He preached eternal salvation for all."

Musical selections were rendered by G. H. McNab, Frank Pearson, C. E. Thompson, Mrs. Anna Orvis, and Joseph Nay. Short addresses were also made by William Thompson, B. H. Marlett, and Judge F. C. Russell. Refreshments and dancing followed the formal program.

Among the musical performances those worthy of special mention were the charming soprano solo, "Vive l'America," by Mrs. Anna Orvis, who kindly volunteered her services; the splendid rendition of "The Skipper of St. Ives" by the leading bass of the Apollo Club, F. Pearson, Esq.; the creditable piano performance of young Master Thompson; and the acceptable style in which the quartet sang, "Tell Me, Flora." Of course Professor Vinton's recital was rendered faultlessly and effectivly.

Of the eulogies, the best were Mrs. Freeman's, Thompson's, and Marlett's. The two latter carried off about equal honors as to composition. Mr. Thompson's delivery was easy and unconstrained, and speaks well for Professor Vinton's tutelage. Judge Russell is not so much of an orator as a thinker, having more depth than dash, while Mrs. Freeman fortunately possesses both. Here is a portion of her oration:

In the old book it reads: "And I will put a lying spirit into the mouths of my prophets to deceive the people." In one of the editions of the sacred volume are given what purport to be the last words of eminent Freethinkers—their fear and repentance. Among these is a short sketch of Thomas Paine. The misrepresentations embodied in it, the untruthfulness, is evidence, according to the passage quoted from holy writ, that the compilers were true prophets of the Lord.

Among Paine's opponents there were none grand enough to grasp the meaning of his philosophy, to conceive even an outline of his life. "Doing justice, loving mercy, and endeavoring to make our fellow-creatures happy." That was the man. That was the life he lived. That was the simple faith he died in. Had he need of more? Should his deathbed hav been one of terror? What phantom wrong could hav been evoked at that last hour? Doing justice? Justice has no nemesis to torture him who does her will. Loving mercy? The dew from heaven falls not lighter than peace on the white soul of the compassionate man. Endeavoring to make our fellow-creatures happy? An ambition worthy of a god. He should hav died as Socrates died—calmly, sweetly, at peace with all the world. He should hav died as a Christ died—forgiving the hands that hurt him. He, too, came to save the world. He didn't believe in a hell. He believed in a heaven here. He wouldn't accept eternal torture for one poor, wretched human being.

Paine was a patriot, but the world was his constituency. He didn't come to save Ireland, Germany, Russia, or France. He didn't come to save a few sects—Methodists, Baptists, or Catholics. He came to save the world. He knew that eternal justice demanded that the world should be saved, and he refused to accept anything short of eternal salvation for all.

An Englishman by birth, yet the history of America could not be written without his name. He knew no nationality. He came to save the people—the whole people. To save them from poverty, from superstition; to lift from their bowed necks the cruel heels of tyrants, to take from their poor, patient hands the chains of oppression.

He hated the tyrant everywhere. He denounced injustice. He scorned the sycophant. With pitiless power he tore the mask from the face of royalty. Reason laughed at the exposure—the poor defense of "divinely anointed." The head of the king could nevermore be made to touch the clouds. His glory had departed. He lay prone in the dust, henceforth and forever a poor Baal, a priest-made thing at the people's feet. For Thomas Paine had written the "Rights of Man."

He never sacrificed principle for policy. He never stopped to ask: "Is it popular? Does it pay?" He did what was right, assured that the right must ever pay. He spoke what he thought—for he felt that truth only is eternal. And, because he did this, his name will endure so long as men love justice and honesty is more admired than hypocrisy.

He was never on the popular side. The republic glowed and burnt, an all-consuming fire, alone in that activ brain. His great heart held the grand ideal He bent all the energies of his wonderful will to impart to others a conception of his daring dream. Jefferson, Franklin, Washington, one by one caught the spirit of his inspiration and the Revolution was a reality. The people had been born. Washington is called the "father of his country." Paine was the incarnation of its liberty.

Amid the red glare of the downfall of Bourbon reign, the intrepid soldier and statesman is found again facing the fearful forces of despotism. The effete monarchies of Europe tremble. Through a thousand centuries Christian civilization has tortured the people, lashed them, robbed them, beat them with cruel blows into a white heat of fury. Now it looks on dismayed at the madness of the wretched canaille. Even the loving persuasion of Paine was powerless to arouse them to reason. The elements would not be stilled. The storm would not be hushed. When the sky cleared the scene was like fair fields laid waste by wind and hail; the grandest and best as well as the weakest had gone down. Nature is pitiless in her progress. To giv vent to a volcano, a continent must crumble to ruins.

The life of Paine is a lesson for all time. It illustrates how great a work can be accomplished by one individual. His dream, it is true, has fallen far short of realization, but it has left its impress upon the ages, for love of liberty must exist so long as the footfall of man is felt on the green earth. The work he began must go on. He did not, he could not accomplish all. A thousand battles are to be fought. Wrong is on every hand. There is not a noble deed of the past but that may be emulated to-day. Tyranny, superstition, monopoly, are advancing terrible forces over the rights of the people. No need to look back and sigh for glory. The Thermopylæ is here. See to it, O young American, that you as readily as a Trojan hero defend the pass to liberty. No need to long for the days of Valley Forge. A great army is marching now through the land, loyal, as yet, to the flag—men, women, and little children—their feet are bare and bleeding, their clothing tattered and torn. They cry for bread, and, stretching their hands toward the eternal hills, they beg for coal. This army grows larger year by year. It is becoming a terror. See to it, O young American, that you do something for this army of destitute fellows. Its existence is a danger. Sure destruction comes to the land whose people are too wretched to be trusted in its defense.

This is a Christian civilization, we are told. Let Christianity hav the glory of this wretchedness. The ideal of the Freethinker, the humanitarian, has no eternal misery here, nor in the hereafter. The greatest happiness to the greatest number. Christianity, the greatest misery to the greatest number. In that eternity whose limit is boundless only the few are to be saved—the vast, vast majority, forever damned. All Christian civilizations hav been modeled on that plan. And when a nation has been made thoroughly Christian the people hav been most thoroughly wretched.

To save them, the people, from this wretchedness, is the work of the American Secular Union—the separation of church and state. To do this is to eventually realize the glorious life-work of Thomas Paine.

Here are a few excerpts from Brother Thompson's tribute, which are a credit to a youth of twenty: "Paine needs no praise, but if justice were done him we should write one of the grandest epitaphs dedicated to man. . . . In the name of humanity, his fervid words in freedom's cause burnt deep into the tyrant's heart, and shook the foundation of the bastile of oppression. His 'Rights of Man,' 'Crisis,' and 'Age of Reason' will hold their kingly throne as long as reason lasts and justice reigns. . . . Few of the brilliant phrase-coiners liv up to them, but he who uttered one of the grandest of recorded sentences, 'The world is my country, to do good my religion,' lived up to it in its broadest sense. To him humanity had no narrow bounds, and no limitations of state, town, or country fettered him like a caged sweet warbler or a chained slave. . . . Nothing so inspires the soul as contemplation of a life spent in the interests of humanity; a life where chagrin and anguish hav been borne with fortitude, that a grand purpose may be achieved. . . . Liberty, justice, and equal rights are not yet respectable. mental freedom is an outcast, is spurned with contempt, and the minds of the majority are still bound and riveted by the shackles of superstition. Mental liberty is below par, and mental slavery is the passport of the day. . . . When Paine receives his just deserts, then truth will not be dressed in rags, nor liberty be hunted round the world.

"Then in reason's holy light,
Glowing in majestic might,
Will reign
Liberty, justice, equal right."

Perhaps the entertainment part of the program, owing to the unavoidable absence of some of the promised talent, was not quite up to our usual standard. During the intermission of the dance, the little Le Paige Sisters—Ella and Maud—gave their Highland Fling and Sailors' Hornpipe to the delight and astonishment of all present. They performed, by special invitation, at the Opera House in Minneapolis a few weeks ago for the Actors' Benefit Fund, when W. J. Florence made them the recipients of his special souvenir—his little hatchet—being emblematic of his relationship in the matter of veracity to a certain historical cherry-tree chopper. They hav become quite eminent in the professional field.

Mr. and Mrs. Semple (who never missed our anniversary yet) braved a cold two hours' ride to come from Englewood and lend their presence to honor Thomas Paine, as also did Mr. Parker Wineman and several members of his family from Austin, and Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Hunt from their suburban home.

The Chicago Union never held a ball before where everyone present seemed to so thoroughly enjoy themselvs, and where such happy, innocent abandon and good-fellowship prevailed.

REJOICE WITH HAPPY VOICE.

L. K. Washburn's "Cosmian Hymn Book" is, like all his conscientious work, a credit to the Liberal cause, and is an additional evidence of the versatility of his genius. As a book of song it is of great importance and worth. Music is as absolutely essential to the successful consolidation of the forces of Freethought as any other organization. If Liberal thought is not organized—either as a passiv educativ or a positiv political force—it will result only in a repetition of the failures of the past. The "Cosmian" comes to us at a critical period, and is capable of being made a most valuable aid to the much-to-be-desired organization. It is the most elaborate collection ever produced in the interest of Liberals, and its preparation must hav involved a very large outlay. That fact portends the trend of modern thought and givs us reason to rejoice at indications that "this old world is growing brighter." Good music givs life and vigor to all our aspirations—it is the poetry and mirror of human emotions—

The caressing, lingering touch that stilleth so.

As a practical illustration of appreciation, I referred a copy of the "Cosmian" to our musical director, Mr. Card, who is an authority, and his verdict was that it was a splendid production, both as to arrangement and selections, so that the next mail bore an order to Boston, and our Union has listened to its songs with pleasure.

E. A. STEVENS.

Why Believe?

"How often do we see those who" believe and even contend for the reality of things that hav not been demonstrated! Some seem to think that belief is the mother of wisdom. They ask us if there are "not some things beyond investigation that we are bound to admit as true even though they cannot be demonstrated or understood." It seems to be a great source of pleasure to some persons to believe a great deal that may not be true. They seem to like to parade themselvs as credulous Liberals, just as credulous as a real Christian ought to be. I fancy that they hav a weak back and dislike to stand the stigma of an out-and-out position; so they wish to sort of compromise. Doubt some, deny a little, and affirm less, but believe a good deal.

No, there is absolutely not one single thing that anyone should believe without evidence. We are warned that all we know comes from, or through, our five senses, and cautioned that if we had more senses we might be able to know more, etc. We are told that "we know of existing laws and forces that none of our five senses can explain." O man! did the five senses ever explain anything? Never! Reason, reason does. It takes brains to understand and explain things. We can believe in a fact because we know it is a fact. We do not need to understand attraction in order to believe there is such a thing. We may believe in one explanation, or a dozen, or none at all. If you know of no solution, do not suppose everyone is equally as ignorant as yourself. It is a favorit method of some to parade a lot of things that are mysteries to them, and endeavor to show that everybody is equally helpless; things, too, that any young philosopher ought to understand in these days as well as the addition-table.

It is asked, "What is instinct, but a sense of natural, unthinking knowledge given by nature? Why has not the same and all its benefits been given to man?" Then comes the crushing reply, "Because we are finite and not infinit." Oh! And the animals possess instinct, then, because they are infinit? What a fool I hav been all my life! If I only had a little more "unthinking knowledge," how easily I could believe in a God! But we are asked, "Why not deny the existence of attraction, as well as of God, when we can see the work done by one as well as the other?" If we could only see the work done by God, we would not deny his existence, but there's the rub. No man has ever seen one iota of work done by a God, and never will.

And as to the possibility of there being forces that we are not conscious of, think of this: Man has developed gradually from an atom up. As many forces as are in existence hav constantly been his environment, they hav constantly impinged themselvs on the tender forms till they hav made senses to perceive them. A force is that which is capable of producing an effect. That which is incapable of producing an effect is nothing. Every really existing force, then, must hav produced its effect in the shape of organs to sense it. Man is but a product of his surroundings, brought to his present perfection by variation, heredity, and the survival of the fittest. No argument is valid founded on what may be unknown, or on a supposition of an impossibility. The finite mind has discovered what it has named the infinit. Infinity, then, being purely a human conception, can be comprehended by humans. The reasoning of some is a great deal harder to understand than the infinit.

C. L. HASKELL.

Work for Washington Territory Liberals.

As there is a prospect of a constitutional convention being held this year, it is time for the Liberals of this territory to take action in regard to it.

An effort will be made to elect delegates who favor the measures of the National Reform Association. This should be checkmated by an organized effort on the part of men who believe in a secular government.

An effort will also be made to strengthen the power of corporations at the expense of the laboring classes. Questions of equal taxation, and equal political rights irrespectiv of sex, will also come before the people. The platform adopted at Cincinnati in 1879, by the Liberal League congress, is as pertinent in this territory to-day as it was then. It was embodied in the following:

"1. Total separation of church and state, to be secured under present laws and proper legislation, and finally to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

"2. National protection for national citizens in their equal political, civil, industrial, and religious rights, irrespectiv of race or sex, to be secured under present laws and proper legislation, and finally to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

"3. Universal Education the basis of Universal Suffrage in this Secular Republic; to be secured under present laws and proper legislation, and finally to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every state to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education."

The new constitution should be based on equal rights, irrespectiv of sex. There is an element which denies any political rights to women, falling back on the old ecclesiastical fiction of law that the husband and wife are one, and that one the husband. The legislation of this territory has been progressiv, and has recognized the political as well as civil equality of woman. Since the supreme court has annulled the election law which abolished sex as a qualification for suffrage, a tendency has been shown to take advantage of that fact to readjust the property rights of women upon the old so-called common law basis. This is the protection which is to be afforded those who by disfranchisment cannot protect themselvs.

If the ballot is necessary for the colored man of the South to protect his rights, it is equally necessary for woman to protect herself against the men who claim that she should hav no civil or political rights except what they choose to giv her. Condorcet held: "Either all human beings hav equal rights, or none hav any." Abraham Lincoln expressed the same idea in his statement: "No man is good enough to govern another man without that other man's consent."

The constitution for the state of Washington should be framed on those broad principles of civil liberty. There should be no disfranchisment on account of sex, race, or religion.

What Shall We Do?

To my mind, the Symposium of Liberalism in the United States, as given in the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, affords a quantity of food for thought, study, and reflection to Liberals in all parts. Out of the twenty writers whose ideas and opinions are set forth in this collection, "seventeen proclaim that the center of activity in the Liberal ranks is the West." Why is this? Should not Liberals of all shades and opinions that are to be found in the Eastern states rouse themselvs from that "apathetic" feeling which, cloud-like, has fallen over them. There seems to me to be a lack of that spirit of independence which has characterized the Freethinkers of the last twenty years. Apathy is the curse of our party, for it is evident that the efforts of leaders and lecturers cannot be productiv of much good unless they are supported by the Freethinkers throughout the country. Right here in New York city is a good and large field where valuable work might be done. We hav to do here with a deadly foe, who has vainly tried to consign the cause of Freethought to oblivion, and who now strives to crush it by an immeasurable superiority in numbers, in organization, and in wealth. I mean the Roman Catholic church. We must persevere steadily in the path before us, though at present it may appear a stormy one; we must not lose an inch of ground or relax a single effort; we must continue to fight, or we are forgotten; we must fight the priest on the platform until he is compelled to meet us upon equal ground; we must ruffle the smooth and stagnant waters of superstition with the sharp, healthy winds of free thought and free speech.

When I first came to this country a few months ago, I was surprised at the apparent disquietude of the Liberals in this city. I made all manner of inquiry as to the place of meeting either in or around New York of any branch of the American Secular Union, but all my inquiries were fruitless, for ninety-nine out of every hundred persons did not know of the existence of such an organization; therefore I had to resort to strategy to find them out. So I ordered THE TRUTH SEEKER of a news-agent in the city, and from it I got a part of the information I desired. The result was, I visited the Manhattan Liberal Club, and I can truly say, without any hesitation whatever, that, no matter how good their intentions may be, still, to my mind, they are far from being sufficient in a city like this. What we want is an organization that is fully prepared to carry out a bold, destructiv, and aggressiv policy. This is wanting in the Manhattan Liberal Club. Their chief fault appears to me to be a lack of energy, and in this they hav failed to make themselvs felt as a power in the city. The spirit of complacency seems to be carried on to an excess among them, which has brought on a general fear to over-excite the delicate feelings of too sensitiv opponents, a course which all honest thinkers should make it a rule to abandon; they exhibit to a great extent that amount of equivocation which the high priests of error glory in so much, for under it they are suffered to proceed on their way unmolested and without an obstacle.

Of late we hav had far too much advocacy of a diluted kind, and the result is obvious enough to casual observers. Are the Liberals in the East afraid of their task? Here and there some solitary individual makes use of the pruning-knife to the tree of superstition, but that is not enough. What we want, and what we must hav, is a united and courageous attempt to strike at its roots. At present it seems to me that the Liberals of the East are not only apathetic, but they seem satisfied with the work already accomplished. This should not be, for while ignorance, bigotry, and superstition are ever on the alert to meet fresh dangers we should exert ourselvs with redoubled vigor; then if any amount of success is obtained we should find that every honest man and woman would strive to increase it. It has been suggested to me that it is possible that we might form another society in New York city whose meetings should be held on Sunday, and one which is fully prepared to carry on such work as I hav described. I hav obtained the promis of several Freethinkers to render whatever assistance they can for the promotion of such an organization, and all that is required to insure the success of such a scheme is a united action of all parties concerned. Such a society would, I am sure, produce good results, for if a city like London can support about twenty branches, surely New York city can support two. Let us then unite and show what the Liberals of the East can do. Without union we are not worth a moment's consideration. Let us then unite and endeavor to form a society at the other end of the city to follow out a distinct and unmistakable course of propagandism. We could hav lectures constantly, followed by questions and discussions if you will. The purpose of these lectures should be to prove the truths of Secularism, and to overthrow every error of a superstitious character; to make man an intellectual being and to divest his mind of folly. We should endeavor to make our lectures free, and thus hold out greater inducements to an audience than those offered by the enemy.

But it may be said, Who will pay the expenses? I ask, Who pays the expenses of many of the religious sects? In the case of the churches, everyone pays as he or she can afford. Are you not able to do the same? If they can do so to support error and to debase mankind, surely you can do so in the cause of truth and the elevation of humanity. We hav Liberals of means in our ranks, and as our cause is far better, why not support it as you ought? We hav men of ability on our side who are fully prepared to fight the battle of Freethought, and hav come forward with that object in view. I am convinced that we hav the best men and the best side; we hav men of courage and daring; and let us hav but a judicious organization and our triumph is certain. Let us carry out more energetically the hereditary policy of our party; we hav vast numbers, great intelligence, disciplined scholars, eloquent advocates, in fact, all the materials to make a strong union, in the East, but they are—at present—deficient in cohesiv power.

The desire of Secularism is to see the people socially and morally regenerated, and enjoying their rights as citizens. But no such end can possibly be obtained while the Christian faith prevails; it is the source of nearly all the mischief that afflicts society; it is a state engin used to crush the liberty of the people; its influence is the stone of stumbling, and the rock of offense, which prevents a thorough, practical education among the people. I would, therefore, exhort all who wish well to the cause of Freethought to bestir themselvs with renewed vigor and energy, for there is yet a great work to be done, though at present the laborers are few. Then let those who are willing to work prepare themselvs for the combat, and those who cannot take an activ part assist and encourage those who can.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH.

THE London National Secular Society appeals for financial aid for the Swedish prisoners for blasphemy, an account of whose incarceration was last week transferred from the London Freethinker to these columns. The last issue of the same journal says: "Mr. Lennstrand is still in prison, and after his release he will hav to answer another indictment. He is allowed to hav his meals sent in from a tavern, the cost being about £2 5s. per month, so that his diet must be extremely simple. But the resources of himself and his Freethought friends are meager, and they are burdened with the expenses of the prosecution and fine. In the circumstances it was feared that the prisoner would hav to fall back on the jail fare, which we suspect is rough indeed in a country like Sweden. Over £2 was subscribed by members of the executiv and forwarded immediately. Further subscriptions are needed and can be sent to Mr. R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter street, London, E. C., or to ourselvs. Every sum received will be acknowledged in the National Reformer and the Freethinker. We trust there will be a generous response. Freethought knows no distinction of nationality. The battle of freedom is the same in whatever country it is fought. Should the subscription be in excess of the immediate requirements, the executiv will hold the balance for future contingencies."

One of the Best of Annuals.

From the London Freethinker.

The TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC. Good typography and excellent illustrations make this one of the best annuals in the Freethought service. The chief feature this year is a symposium on "Liberalism," as the Americans term Freethought, from the pens of twenty-four leading American Freethinkers, including Colonel Ingersoll. The Calendar is well compiled, and a photograph of the statue to Bruno in Rome forms a fitting frontispiece.

A Literary as Well as a Liberal Success.

From Watts's Literary Guide, London.

The TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1889, edited by E. M. Macdonald, the enterprising New York journalist, contains, as its principal attraction, a Symposium on Christianity and Freethought, to which Colonel Ingersoll, Miss Helen Gardener, Mr. Charles Watts, and all the leading American Freethinkers contribute. There are also other entertaining papers, the most noteworthy being that on "Shakspere and Ingersoll." The numerous illustrations are, as usual, admirably executed. We congratulate Mr. Macdonald on his successful literary achievement.

Missionary Terrorizing.

The statement by Helen Gardener in her review of a new book just issued called "Yone Santo," that the attempt of Houghton, Mifflin & Co. to suppress it "is the most dangerous and serious case of attempted suppression of the press and of free speech by the pulpit that I hav yet known to occur in America," was a trifle startling to the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and it occurred to him to find out what the Boston Puritans had been doing. With that object in view he visited the author of the book one day last week, and had a two hours' conversation on the matter.

Mr. House is an exceedingly interesting talker, as one might easily believe from reading his book. Years ago, when Horace Greeley was damning things around the Tribune office, he was engaged on that paper. Since then he has been about everywhere, especially in the Orient, and he knows a good deal about the humbug of the missions, though he doesn't put it quite as strongly as that. He brought a servant home with him from Japan, to whom he talks in the boy's own language, though the pleasant-mannered little fellow speaks English like an American. Mr. House thinks little of the Chinese, but of the Japanese he speaks highly, aside from the evident interest he takes in them from having made the career of one of their girls the basis of a most interesting work of fiction. They are, he says, a gentle, tender-hearted race, easily moved by gratitude for kindnesses, and it is this trait in their character, he says, that makes them an easy prey to the missionaries. They will do anything for their benefactors. "Yone Santo" is a book descriptiv of the trials of a little Japanese girl in getting an education, which the harsh customs of her race and the morbid puritanism and hypocrisy of the missionaries make exceedingly difficult. There is in the story a big-hearted doctor who helps her against her relativs and the missionaries, and explosivly abuses the old maids and hypocritical prudes who are kept in Japan by the Boston Board of Missions to convert the heathen to Christ. It was this trait of the doctor's, which Mr. House, in making the character, allowed considerable latitude, that aroused the anger of the Boston ministers, who compelled Mr. Houghton to suppress the story in book form, though the editor of the Atlantic Monthly published the serial entire, unemended. Not content with this frightening of Mr. Houghton, the ministers used their brethren in New York to deter other publishers from printing the book, and did everything in their power to suppress it.

Mr. House was quite willing to tell of the meanness of the ministers, and in response to the inquiry whether one of his objects in writing "Yone Santo" was to expose the shortcomings of the missionary system and the hypocrisy of the missionaries, he said:

"I intended to show how utterly disqualified the American missionaries in Japan are for the work they undertake, and the evil influence of their methods upon the youth of that country. As to 'hypocrisy' I meant to express no opinion. If they had all the sincerity of the blindest fanaticism, their teaching would be none the less injurious."

"Did the editor of the Atlantic Monthly know how the missionary question was treated when he accepted the story?"

"I particularly called his attention to it, and mentioned that I believed the missionaries would make trouble on that account."

"Did he require, at the time of acceptance, or previous to publication, any changes to be made in regard to the implied criticism of the missionaries?"

"None whatever."

"Did he afterward desire the alteration or suppression of any of the missionary passages?"

"After disturbances had been created by the missionary party, he suggested that it would be judicious to modify or omit these passages from that part of the story which had not been put in type—about one quarter of the whole; but I am not aware that he objected to them except on grounds of expediency."

"Do you understand, then, that he was in accord with your views, so far as expressed in the novel?"

"Entirely so."

"Then no part of the hostility to your book originated with him?"

"Certainly not; I am inclined to believe that he was, for a time, quite as much a victim as myself."

"You say that he suggested the modification or omission of certain missionary passages. Was this suggestion carried out?"

"It was not. I should like to say, if you will allow me, that the only alterations ever made, at his suggestion, were the omission of three or four lines in one place, and three or four words in another. These, however, had no connection with the missionary episodes; they related to wholly different subjects. But I must tell you that if he had proposed a hundred alterations, at the outset of affairs, I should hav endeavored to meet his wishes. I had such regard for his critical judgment, and such confidence in him personally, that I would hav distrusted my own opinions if they had conflicted with his. But when I found myself virtually subjected to the dictation of the missionary brotherhood and the head of a publishing house who was in sympathy with them, I was obliged to resist."

"Do you mean that the principal partner of Houghton, Mifflin & Co. was your only opponent in the firm?"

"I believe that he was individually responsible for all the difficulty, and for the final breaking of the contract to publish 'Yone Santo' in book form; and therefore what I say of Houghton, Mifflin & Co. is probably applicable to Mr. Houghton alone."

"Was his action voluntary, or was he instigated by the clerical domineering?"

"My conviction is that he would never hav taken an adverse step if he had not been driven to it by the missionaries. In March, 1888, when about one half of the story had been published, Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin & Co. signified their desire to issue the novel as a volume, upon its completion in the Atlantic Monthly. The proposal was theirs, not mine. They knew perfectly well what they were doing; and it was not until two and a half months after the contract had been signed that I heard a word of objection from them. But in May the missionaries massed their forces and instituted a hostil campaign, the result of which was that the eminent publishers surrendered with a lack of discretion seldom exhibited in honorable contests of any description. I believe that their decision to break the agreement was taken early in that month, but I was allowed to proceed with the work of preparation until the last page of copy had been delivered to the magazine, when I was advised of the changed aspect of affairs. The pitiful and ignominious pretexts upon which they then sought to evade their obligations were such as I could not hav imagined it possible for a respectable publishing house to employ; and in subsequent efforts to justify their conduct, they did not scruple to resort to gross fabrications. They had the singular effrontery to assert, for example, that six or eight months before the story began to appear in the Atlantic Monthly they definitly formulated their objections to the missionary episodes, and caused them to be communicated to me; that in compliance with their request I then made various changes in the text; that it was only in consequence of this deference to their wishes that they contracted to publish the completed volume; that the modifications made by me for the Atlantic Monthly proved, after all, insufficient to meet their views, so that the book, as printed in the magazine, was 'not what in good faith they had taken it to be,' but there was no doubt in their mind that I would alter it to any extent that they might demand. As to what may hav been 'in the mind' of the Boston publishers, I cannot pretend to speak; but in all that remains of their pronunciamento there is not a single word of truth. It is not true that I ever received a statement of objections from Houghton, Mifflin & Co. As I hav said, I heard nothing from them on the subject until the publication in the Atlantic was nearly at an end. It is not true that I made alterations, nor yet one solitary alteration, at their behest. Their declaration that they contracted to issue the volume only after I had acceded to their demands is a sheer fable; and the imputation that the book was 'not what in good faith they had taken it to be' is an outrage. The contract was signed in March, 1888. In April, the missionaries set their aggressiv machinery in operation, and apparently succeeded in frightening the publishers out of their integrity; but it was not until the end of May, after all the copy was in their hands, that I received the first direct intimation of their purpose. It is reasonable to infer, therefore, that their action, or, to be more precise, Mr. Houghton's action, was not voluntary, and was instigated by missionary influences."

"Did the Christian opponents of the story write to you expressing their condemnation?"

"Not directly. They wrote to Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin & Co. in language which I would not hav ventured to reproduce in my book, lest it should be taken as the wildest and most extravagant misuse of caricature. No letters with authentic signatures were sent to me; but I received dozens of anonymous epistles, filled with the absurdest threats and denunciations, consigning me to ingenious and unprecedented processes of damnation, and prophesying wholesale punishment of a more realistic description, in the pages of American religious newspapers."

"Were these threats of newspaper intimidation carried into effect?"

"They were, but to what extent I cannot say. I know some interesting instances, and one of a very peculiar significance, as showing what a leading religious editor's word is worth. The Independent published a paragraph, written, I hav grounds for believing, by the Rev. W. E. Griffis, of Boston, in which several accusations were brought against me, the most offensiv being that from the beginning of my residence in Japan I was 'bitterly opposed to the missionaries, and improved every opportunity, through the Japanese papers, to say sharp, bitter, and sarcastic things of them.' It did not please me to be charged with stabbing people in the dark, and habitually attacking individuals in a language which they could not read, and I sent a note to the editor of the Independent, offering to place at his disposal $1,000, to be devoted to any missionary enterprise he might select, if his informant could produce a single example of such contributions to the Japanese press as, according to his statement, I had promulgated 'on every opportunity.' The writer had professed to 'know pretty thoroughly Mr. House's career in Japan,' during the 'ten or twelve years' that I lived there, and, under these circumstances, I suggested that 'it should surely not be difficult for him to supply evidence of at least one of the assaults upon missionaries which he said I was continually making.' I repeated that I wanted to see only one—just one—of the alleged 'sharp, bitter, and sarcastic things,' and the money should instantly be handed over. After a delay of a fortnight—doubtless required for consultation with the 'robed and reverend backbiter'—a note came from the 'superintending editor' of the Independent, informing me that he could 'hardly giv room' to my 'whole article,' but would publish 'the substance' of it. The substance of my communication was what I hav just told you—the offer of $1,000 for the production of one solitary specimen of work which the Independent declared I had been doing 'on every opportunity,' for ten or twelve years. Very good. The next issue of that paper announced the receipt of a 'long letter from Mr. E. H. House'—(it occupied, in fact, less than two pages of note paper)—but made not the slightest allusion to my offer of a reward for a single fragment of testimony to the honesty of the original accusation. All that was carefully suppressed. A farcical misrepresentation of what I had really written was given in a few lines, and so the matter ended. In the secular press, a performance of this sort would be properly stigmatized as a piece of dirty trickery and evasion. My experience does not enable me to judge how it may be characterized by the branch of journalism to which the Independent belongs."

"All the way through, then, the attitude of the missionary party and its supporters has been that of persons angry at being detected in raising money to bolster up what we might call a fraudulent scheme—a sort of commerce in religion, which has a pecuniary value for themselvs?"

"They are certainly very angry at the illustrations of missionary methods given in my book, and it is likely enough that they especially object to revelations which may tend to diminish, in any degree, their pecuniary revenues. Undoubtedly they do gather enormous sums of money from multitudes who hav little knowledge of the uses to which it is applied. The published reports afford no satisfactory intelligence on that head. As to whether any of the funds are wasted, or not, Canon Taylor and other investigators of his class can supply trustworthy information."

"You hav been pretty flatly accused of being an enemy of the missionaries; and if you are, will you tell why? What do you think of the system and of its representativs, as you find them in Japan?"

"Toward the missionaries personally I hav no ill-feeling, and it is not my purpose to say a word against them individually. I would be glad to do the contrary, if I saw an opportunity. But the system of the American Protestant missionaries is, in my estimation, wholly false and injurious. They act upon a theory which is opposed to the moral and social principles most dearly cherished by the Japanese. Life among that people has no meaning or value if the family tie is weakened or broken, and there is nothing that they hold in greater reverence than the memory of their ancestors. These ideas are the very foundation of their most sacred convictions, and yet by ridiculing, uprooting, and destroying them, the missionaries expect to conquer. They are bound by contract with the managers of their organization to proclaim to every convert or neophyte that in adopting the religion of Christ he separates himself forever from those who hav died before him, and that his nearest relations can be nothing to him thenceforth, unless they follow the course he has chosen. That much chance they vouchsafe to the living, but for the dead there is no possible redemption. They are all damned in a heap, ruthlessly and unconditionally. I do not believe that, while they operate on this line, the American missionaries will make much impression upon the forty millions who regard such teaching with abhorrence. Apart from this open and avowed antagonism to Japanese principles, there is a great deal to repel nativ susceptibilities in the habits and demeanor of the Protestant missionaries. Their angry quarrels, in which they often invite publicity, instead of shunning it; their frequent fondness for gain, sometimes leading them to acquisitiv contests which require the peremptory interference of consular authority; their sharp dealings with the poorer class of tradesmen and laborers, which are notorious wherever they dwell; these and other unpleasant features of their life in Japan are by no means calculated to endear them to the populace. The contrast between their practices and those of the Roman and Greek priests exposes them to criticism which may not be highly intelligent, but is extremely incisiv. In their own households they generally set an example of commendable decorum, but there hav been instances of shameful domestic scandals, a single one of which is sufficient to throw discredit, justly or unjustly, upon their entire organization. The Protestant missionary who can influence a race like the Japanese, must be something very near an ideal of moral and intellectual perfection; and such men hav not thus far been found available by the American Boards. It is not, indeed, in the nature of things that they should be."

"What do you think of the Missionary Board and its representativs in and around Boston?"

"I hav no other means of forming a judgment concerning the Board than those which are accessible to the general public, and can be found in its pamphlets on 'probation' and kindred doctrins upon which its vitality is said to depend. Of course I hav an opinion with regard to the interdiction of my book; but that is a small matter, and I would rather leave others to express their views than giv my own. If you mean, however, by the representativs of the missionaries, those who appear in public as their supporters and vindicators, I may say that they might better serve their cause by exercising a little of the discretion which religious valor is frequently in need of. I recall the case of a reverend Bostonian, the same that I hav previously alluded to—who, in his eagerness to exalt the missionaries in Japan, is said to hav filled successiv columns of the Evening Post and the Nation of this city with mendacious aspersions upon the administration of that country, which is known by all who honestly investigate the question to be far more tolerant in matters of faith than the majority of Christian governments. The Japanese rulers were falsely charged with the vilest and most atrocious crimes, for no apparent purpose but to represent a little knot of political agitators in the light of martyrs to their belief. As a rule these fanatical demonstrations are contemptuously overlooked, but this piece of audacity was too much for the patience of those who believe in the integrity of Japan's position before the world, and the astonished calumniator found himself held to account with a sternness and a severity which compelled him to retract his libels, and left him with very little character as an authority on Japanese politics and public morals. But incidents like this are too common to be worth your consideration. I mention it only as an example of the expedients employed to glorify a cause which seems to require the aid of sensational inventions to maintain its hold upon popular attention."

The unsuppressed book is meeting with a large sale, and we trust that the Boston clergy, and Mr. Houghton, will derive from that fact whatever consolation is necessary to enable them to recover from the chagrin of defeat in an attempt to hide from the public all knowledge of the incapacity of the missionaries and the uselessness of their missionary system. But if the fact does not console them, we know of nothing that will except a season of prayer.

McArthur to J. K. P. Baker.

O wad some power the giftie gie us,
To see oursels as ithers see us!

I regret, sir, that you should hav deemed it necessary to misconstrue a jocular sentence, and by crediting it with so serious a motiv hav placed the lady in a position where she may be compelled to send you her acknowledgments for your gratuitous insult.

I hav heard it said that in order to hav a joke penetrate the brain of a Scotchman, a surgical operation was oft-times necessary, and I now learn from you that the services of a surgeon are needed in your section of Iowa.

Had you done me the honor of reading the entire series of letters, and restrained your impetuosity till their conclusion, mayhap you would not hav rushed so inconsiderately into print and found yourself in your present unpleasant position as a self-appointed critic upon a subject concerning which you hav admitted your ignorance.

Moreover, it might possibly hav suggested itself to you that your criticism and claim of omniscience were not in the strictest accord with each other.

Men who criticise even subjects with which they are familiar should be very careful; and well-known critics, fully aware that they themselvs are not above criticism, handle doubtful subjects very gingerly. So, as you assume the role of a critic, let me examin your criticism, if I may dignify it by that name.

You harp on the term I used, "small brain capacity." Well, what of it? Who has more brain than he needs? When a man admits his ignorance of any given proposition and pronounces it "impossible," because he cannot understand it, I insist that he is entitled to be considered of "small brain capacity." And I don't see that there is room for any argument on the subject. Moreover, it was not applied directly to you, but you chose to assume it. You were too quick, therefore, in your inferences, unless you had an inner feeling of "the eternal fitness." I fear you will make a poor logician.

We will agree, no doubt, sir, that a Christian is superstitious, and you object to my remark that a certain portion of the Materialistic fraternity are even more superstitious than the average Christian. Let us examin this.

A Materialist is supposed to be a Freethinker. He fears no jealous God, angry devil, or infallible pope.

The book of nature is open to him, and he can read the pages as far as his mentality will permit. But if his mentality be very limited, the moment the term "phenomenon" is mentioned his thoughts turn immediately to Spiritualism, and he seems to forget, if he ever knew, that every display of nature is a phenomenon little understood by the ordinary man, and eagerly studied by scientists. He imagins "phenomenon" to mean something unusual, and as he cannot penetrate the earth, or peer beyond a certain distance into the skies, he associates it with the terms "miraculous," "supernatural," and the like.

Now, as to the Spiritualist there is nothing supernatural. The laws governing the Spiritual phenomena, though little understood, are sufficiently well demonstrated to cause scientists, men at whose feet you and I could sit with advantage, to respectfully and assiduously investigate them.

Hence I claimed, and now repeat, that "we relegate superstition to the churches and that portion of the Materialistic community who refuse to credit anything outside of the commonest known physical laws."

But you say: "A fact is not a statement to be emphasized or believed." "A fact," according to Webster, is, "reality," "truth;" and "emphasize" is "to utter or pronounce with a particular stress of voice." So your criticism is that "the truth should not be uttered with a particular stress of voice." Shades of Solon!

You continue: "It is to be received into our conscious experiences, as a feeling, seeing, or hearing." This sounds like solid Catholic doctrin, and Pat Cronin will vouch that "a sacrament is an outward sign of inward grace."

But I suppose you intended saying that our material senses are the only ones to be depended on. Well, that may be so, but come with me into yonder laboratory presided over by a Materialist. He will inform us that everything is matter, and that matter is eternal. This you accept, as it is the very foundation of Materialism.

The chemist then takes a piece of paper, and on immersion in acid, it disappears from material eyesight. He then assures us that, though invisible to the eye and not to be cognized by any of the material senses, it still exists, and, strange to say, the acid which absorbed it has not increased in volume.

How does he know it still exists? Is his statement a fact or a theory? Can it be proved by "feeling, seeing, or hearing?" Is it a "conscious experience?"

Think the matter over calmly, sir, and I venture to predict you will decide that you owe an apology to yourself for having made this remark.

You say: "Genuinness of experiences is a McArthurism, and a literary curiosity." Are you correct?

Genuinness as defined by Webster is, "not altered or corrupted; not forged or substituted; purity; reality; sincerity."

Experience is defined as, "practical acquaintance with any matter by personal observation or trial of it, or by feeling its effects, by living through it, or the like; experimental knowledge; actual trial," etc.; and the conjunction of these two words you call "a literary curiosity."

Now, candidly, don't you think that some one should accept your offer of "braying a fool in a mortar?"

But let us proceed.

Possibly you may be aware that "phenomenon" is a singular noun, its plural being "phenomena." If you had carefully read the article which you attempted to criticise, you would hav discovered that I was dealing with the latter. Consequently had you supplied the ellipsis you would never hav attempted that very small piece of sarcasm.

Although five feet eleven inches in hight, and weighing over two hundred pounds, it is permissible, I suppose, for you to call me a long, lank, slabsided, long-haired, hysterical ghost-monger, and add to them any other choice epithet; but I draw the line there, so, when you attack my syntax, I rise and point out your ignorance.

I regret, sir, having coupled your name with that of Pat Cronin, since it seems to be so distasteful to you; and if Pat should ever be heard from on the subject and agree with you that "the insolence of this is only exceeded by its unfairness," then I stand prepared to make a public apology. But to which one?

I hav carefully examined your article, and beyond matters of like nature to those already noticed, I see nothing worthy of consideration. It is not "impossible" that I may hav come to this conclusion because I am unusually obtuse, and I hope you will excuse my saying that though the slinging together of words and harping on terms may be considered a criticism in some sections of this country, yet, in these parts, educated people in reading a criticism look for and demand anything other than abuse. For abuse shows that the so-called critic, being unequal to the task, is trying to cover his own discomfiture by covering his opponent with mud. So, admitting the correctness of these remarks, perhaps a reperusal of your article may satisfy you of the unproductivness of your effort.

It is generally admitted that gratuitous advice is seldom appreciated, but, at the risk of having mine ignored, I will advise you not to rush into a controversy carried on between others, unless you hav something to say and know how to say it. Learn to deal justly and honorably with the subject and the writer; do not assume a knowledge which you do not possess, and under no circumstances deny a proposition after having admitted your ignorance of it, for it is not impossible that

> There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio,
> Than are dreamed of in your philosophy.

Then remember that very few writers are adapted by nature to successfully play a funny part. A good story, well told and to the point, oft-times will make a mark when solid reasoning fails. But you seem to be particularly unfortunate when you attempt that role. Your picture of a dwarf "trying with one hand to tear from its pedestal a placid statue," is certainly a brilliant and classic idea, but it becomes ridiculous when you paint him with the other hand "tugging at his boot-straps." It reminds of an Irishman who described himself as writing a letter with a sword in one hand and a pistol in the other. But remember, particularly, that all your readers are ordinary mortals and shape your phrases accordingly, and follow the advice given by Daniel O'Connell to an Englishman desirous of literary distinction: "In promulgating your esoteric cogitations and articulating superficial sentimentalities and philosophical or psychological observations, beware of platitudinous ponderosity. Let your writings possess a clarified conciseness, compacted comprehensibleness, coalescent consistency, and a concatenated cogency. Eschew all conglomerations of flatulent garrulity, jejune babblement, and asinin affectations. Let your extemporaneous descantings and unpremeditated expatiations hav intelligibility and veracious vivacity without rodomontade or thrasonical bombast. Sedulously avoid all polysyllabical profundity, pompous prolixity, citatious vacuity, ventriloquous verbosity, and vaniloquent vapidity. Above all shun double entendres, prurient jocosity, and pestiferous profanity, obscure or apparent. In short, write plainly, sensibly, naturally, truthfully, and do not gasconade or use big words."

It has always seemed strange to me, sir, that the most violent opponents of any new movement are to be found among the so-called Liberals. And no sooner is an advanced thought advocated than it is attacked, often before its promulgators hav had an opportunity for its proper presentation. And then, if a man investigate the proposition, and becoming convinced that it possesses some merit, dares to hav the "courage of his convictions," his old-time friends are the very first to forsake and slur him. The greater his intellectual ability the greater the abuse.

I refer in particular to one of the most valued correspondents of THE TRUTH SEEKER. One whose communications hav attracted attention in every part of the civilized world, and hav been translated into almost every known language—for I hav met them in Spanish, French, German, and Italian papers.

Acknowledged as the peer of any writer in his line, his articles are read with eagerness by careful and studious men, and are placed in scrap-books for future reference.

While he was known as a Materialist, his school could not do him too much honor; but, when he investigates and then publishes his experiences with the Spiritual phenomena, every effort is made to belittle him.

I speak of W. H. Burr—"Antichrist"—and the ignorance which seeks his belittlement honors me with a place by his side.

But enough of this. I had intended confining myself entirely to Mrs. Slenker, and had it not been for your double entendre should hav remained silent.

This necessitated a reperusal of your letters, and I notice in them a sort of swagger suggestiv of a "chip on the shoulder" which you seem to be anxious some Spiritualist should try to knock off. Well, I am the man.

At present I am engaged in a discussion with Mrs. Slenker, but should the lady at any time show a disinclination to continue, I will notify and publicly challenge you to take it up.

And I hope, sir, that it is unnecessary to assure you that I will do so in unmistakable but gentlemanly terms.

Pending that, I hope it may be unnecessary to call your attention again to the fact that the discussion between Mrs. Slenker and myself not only should be, but is, shielded from unwarranted and personal attacks.

A DISCUSSION BETWEEN

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL,
HON. FREDERICK R. COUDERT, and
GOV. STEWART L. WOODFORD,

BEFORE

The Nineteenth Century Club of New York

Stenographically reported for The Truth Seeker by I. N. Baker.

The publication of this discussion has been delayed from various causes, but will now be of more interest than ever because of the other mighty men Colonel Ingersoll has since met and overthrown. F. R. Coudert is a Roman Catholic, and one of the best orators of New York. Gov. Stewart L. Woodford is a Protestant, and a splendid speaker. The discussion is the only oral public debate ever engaged in by Colonel Ingersoll. He had the opening and the closing of the argument, and made two of his most forcible and eloquent speeches. President Palmer's introductions of the orators will also be given.

This will be a great issue for our friends to send to Christian acquaintances, or to use to procure us some new subscribers.

The Schools to be Turned Over to Protestantism.

Besides his Sunday bill, the character of which has been fully exposed in these columns, Senator Blair of New Hampshire has another job in hand for the benefit of his church. It is an amendment to our national Constitution, which, if adopted, would giv endless trouble, because of its contradictory nature, and if the second clause were enforced, would simply hand our public schools over to the Protestants, with the power of Congress behind them to force every child to be inoculated with Christianity. This is his proposed amendment:

"Sec. 1. No state shall ever make or maintain any law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

"Sec. 2. Each state in this Union shall establish and maintain a system of free public schools adequate for the education of all the children living therein, between the ages of six and sixteen years inclusiv, in the common branches of knowledge, and in virtue, morality, and the principles of the Christian religion. But no money raised by taxation imposed by law, or any money or other property or credit belonging to any municipal organization, or to any state, or to the United States, shall ever be appropriated, applied, or given to the use or purposes of any school, institution, corporation, or person, whereby instruction or training shall be given in the doctrins, tenets, belief, ceremonials, or observances peculiar to any sect, denomination, organization, or society, being, or claiming to be, religious in its character; nor shall such peculiar doctrins, tenets, belief, ceremonials, or observances, be taught or inculcated in the free public schools.

"Sec. 3. To the end that each state, the United States, and all the people thereof, may hav and preserve governments republican in form and in substance, the United States shall guarantee to every state, and to the United States, the support and maintenance of such a system of free public schools as is herein provided.

"Sec. 4. That Congress shall enforce this article by legislation when necessary."

By the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, the amendments to the Constitution are binding alone upon Congress, hence the possibility at present for each state to establish a church. Most of the state constitutions, it is true, prohibit this, but state constitutions are easily amended, and the churches could put such an amendment through without the knowledge of the people. At our last election, for instance, the constitution of New York was amended simply because the politicians had bunched the ballot "Yes" to it with the other votes. Not one in a thousand of the people knew what it was for. We endeavor to keep well up in current affairs and watch the legislature with care, but when we found that ballot among the others procured at the different polling-places, it was put aside because the significance of that little "Yes" was too obscure. What the amendment was no one around the polls knew.

The first section of Mr. Blair's amendment is a good one.

The second section contradicts the first section, however. After prohibiting the states from establishing religion, it compels them to establish the principles of the Christian religion.

"No state shall ever make or maintain any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

But

"Each state in the Union shall establish and maintain a system of free public schools, adequate for the education of all the children living therein, between the ages of six and sixteen years inclusiv, in the common branches of knowledge, and in virtue, morality, and the principles of the Christian religion."

And further:

"The United States shall guarantee to every state, and to the people of every state and of the United States, the support and maintenance of such a system of free public schools as is herein provided."

Not only does this authorize each state to establish Christianity, but it sees to it that each state does it. The amendment therefore establishes Christianity as the national religion, violating the present amendment which prohibits its so doing, because as each state must teach the principles of the Christian religion, those principles must be declared and formulated, and this will necessitate a council held by order of the national government, which guarantees the teaching, to find out what the principles held in common by the churches are. When these are declared the government has established a religion, and is pledged to see that the states teach it. This givs us a national creed. The amendment is but another scheme to put God into the Constitution, along with the religion that the believers in God hav constructed.

Senator Blair ought to be kept at home and given the diaconate of some New Hampshire church which holds its meetings in a backwoods school-house. His talents make him specially fitted to ornament such a position.

Circulate the Remonstrance.

Theré remains but this month for effectiv work against the two Blair bills now pending in the United States Senate, either or both of which fanatic Blair may call up at any moment after their report back from the committees to which they were referred. Mr. Blair may try to rush them through in the last hours of the session, as the Comstock bill was passed, but we doubt if the Senate will allow their adoption without full discussion.

To strengthen the opposition to them, Senators should be asked not to vote for them, and perhaps the petition form is as good as any. On the last page of this paper will be found a convenient-sized form of prayer to be cut out, pasted on a foolscap sheet of paper, and circulated around the neighborhood. When all the names of all who will sign hav been obtained, the petition should be sent to one of the Senators from the state in which the petition is signed. The following are the names of the Senators. The R stands for Republican, D for Democrat. Their address is Senate chamber, Washington, D. C.:

Take your choice in politics, but write to at least one of your United States Senators, and send petition protesting against the passage of the Sunday bill or educational amendment.

The Seventh Day Adventists are doing splendid work against Blair and his fellow-fanatics. In all towns where they hav organizations petitions are in circulation. Their headquarters are at Battle Creek, Mich., and Oakland, Cal., and their presses are busy printing petitions and arguments against the bill. The Liberals must not be behind them in this effort to preserve our secular American government.

The German organizations, too, are awake to the subversiv intent of Blair's two bills, and the National Executiv Committee of the North American Turnerbund has just issued a circular letter to its subsidiary vereins, calling upon them promptly to forward an energetic remonstrance to their Senators, with the request that they oppose Senator Blair's measures by every means in their power. The same action was taken by the local vereins some time ago.

We earnestly ask all of our readers who hav not already circulated the petition printed in these columns two weeks ago, to circulate the present one promptly and widely, and send it to one of the United States Senators from their state.

A "Religious Tendency."

The picture on the title-page of this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER is inspired by a statement in the Fort Smith, Ark., Journal of January 10th. The military character of the revival is due to the fact that Fort Smith is a military station. The Journal says:

"The religious tendency that has set in among the prisoners at the United States jail resulted Wednesday in the baptism of seven prisoners, Rev. Dr. Riddle, of Muldrow, officiating. They were as follows: George Brashears and W. H. Miller, convicted of murder; Lafayette Teel, Jason Stilly, and John Massey, convicted of manslaughter; Joe Martin and J. M. Trout, charged with murder. They were immersed in a huge tank filled with water and placed in the jail yard. Col. J. C. Pettigrew assisted in the ministerial functions. Much of the religious activity operating within the jail has resulted from the work of Joseph White, a preacher confined therein, charged with murder."

It will be seen that Mr. Heston has not drawn upon his fertil imagination for any of his facts. The guards, the baptismal tank, the murderers, are all there—and, of course, the religion! And it is extremely fitting that these murderous convicts should hav been brought to Jesus by a preacher who is himself a prisoner, charged with murder.

We may, however, be allowed to doubt that any very substantial benefits will accrue to Christianity by this addition to the number of the saved. They may be, and no doubt are, as real and orthodox Christians as is Dr. John Hall or Talmage, but the world of sensible folks outside of jails will look askance at such representativs of a faith which already requires too great an amount of gullibility in those who would accept it.

Roman Catholicism in Canada.

The scene in the Quebec parliament, so humiliating to the government and disgraceful to any people, which we chronicled last week, has been the text for a good many newspaper articles. The Protestant religious journals hav commented extensivly upon it, and denounced the government of French Canada in ornate language. These papers are now making demands for a recognition of Protestantism in the government. While this, of course, would be but a change from one theocracy to another, it may be that the hatred of this set of Christians toward the older set will somewhat ameliorate the condition of the people by taking away some of the power of the Roman church.

The Rev. J. R. Black, writing from Barrie, Ont., to the Independent, discloses a little more of that church's doings. The population of Lower Canada is about a million and a half, of which all but two hundred thousand are slaves of the Roman church. The provincial parliament consists of a council of twenty-four, appointed for life, and an elected assembly of sixty-five. The executiv part of the provincial government is administered by a lieutenant-governor, with a cabinet of seven. With the exception of a small Protestant minority, all these officers are tools of Rome. Though Quebec is a British possession, its population is French, and these French are increasing their proportionate number so rapidly that they will soon entirely overwhelm the Protestants. These French are all Catholics, and their religious system is supreme, not only in religious affairs, but in political and social matters as well.

The wealth of the Roman church in this province, as given by the Rev. Mr. Black, is something astounding. No one knows the exact figures, for while the church is unsparing in her denunciation of all secret societies, she practices the utmost secrecy in conducting her own business. The historian looks in vain for published statements of revenue and expenditure, such as are had from all civil governments, loan companies, banking institutions, and Protestant denominations. But her wealth is estimated roundly at $80,000,000. This is made up of nine hundred churches, valued at $37,000,000; nine hundred parsonages, together with the palaces of the cardinal and the archbishops, whose value is $900,000; twelve seminaries worth $600,000; seventeen classical colleges, $850,000; two hundred and fifty-nine boarding-schools and academies, $6,000,000; eighty convents, $4,000,000; sixty-eight hospitals and asylums, $4,000,000, and two million one hundred and seventeen thousand acres of land, the gift of the state in 1857.

The yearly revenue is derived from tithes and assessments and fees, payment of which is made compulsory by laws framed by the church. The total amount, estimated by Mr. Black, is not less than $8,000,000, as follows: Two hundred thousand farms under cultivation giving a total yield of thirty-one million two hundred and eighty thousand bushels, whose value is $18,000,000, and upon which the church tithe is $700,000; taxes on families not possessing land, $300,000; pew rents, fees for marriages, baptisms, funerals, and masses, $2,000,000; voluntary gifts, legacies, income from land owned by the church, $3,000,000; taxes for the maintenance and construction of ecclesiastical edifices, $2,000,000. These items do not include the wealth of the numerous ecclesiastical orders, and it is known that some of these are very rich. The Sulpicians own some of the most valuable business property in Montreal, and their wealth exceeds that of any corporation on the continent.

The schools of the province are managed exclusivly in the interest of the churches, the Protestants being allowed their small proportion of the public money for that purpose. The educational council consists of fourteen Roman Catholics and seven Protestants. The school rates are fixed by law, and regularly collected, but, as may be imagined, the bulk of the cash finds its way to the Roman church. The schools are conducted by nuns and friars, and are not only very poor, but are taken advantage of by but few of the French Canadians anyway. Mr. Black asserts that twelve in thirteen of the French Catholics can neither read nor write.

Considering this question of Catholicism in Canada, Alastor, the pro tem editor of Toronto Secular Thought, says: "The truth [about the Roman church] is not half known. Its power in the upper as well as in the lower provinces is little short of supreme. The statesmen of all parties cringe before it like whipped curs. It controls the school systems of Quebec, and has a separate system of its own in Ontario. Thus thousands of schools are used to inculcate, not a useful education, but a knowledge of the Romish catechism sufficient to turn out annually hundreds of thousands of bigoted Roman Catholics whose supreme ruler is a foreign despot. What kind of a country shall we hav presently when these aliens obtain the upper hand? There is a very broad, deep, and perplexing side to this question. But unless the people of Canada wish to return to the Dark Ages it has got to be grappled with by brave and resolute statesmen now: it will be too late before many years are past. I am aware that in a country where there is party government, everything must sink before the exigencies of the party which carried the government to power; yet unless some way be devised right speedily to overcome the weight of Catholic numbers there will be a sort of party government which will not be specially relished by the Protestant majority in the upper province. How does the Roman Catholic church stand now in the dominion? It is the owner of five million acres of land—making it the biggest landed proprietor on the American continent—paying no taxes, making the laws, compelling the courts of the dominion to do its will—yea, standing as it does on the statute books above the law, blindly obeyed by more than three-fourths of the inhabitants of the province of Quebec—you can easily understand what a power for good or evil is this institution. It will infallibly destroy all vestige of liberty in this country unless wise legislation be speedily instituted to curtail its special privileges."

A writer in the New York Times, in describing the low French race—which he calls the habitant—whose blind and slavish subserviency enables the church to keep her grip on Canada, says: "The Roman Catholic church rules the dominion to-day, and its rule is as grasping as if this were the seventeenth instead of the nineteenth century. This rule of the church has proved profitable for it and for it alone. The habitant who was to be elevated by the concessions granted to the church is, in thousands of cases, where his ancestors were a century ago. He can be found to-day, within twenty-four or forty-eight hours' journey of the United States, living as he lived one hundred years ago, working as he worked one hundred years ago, entertaining the same beliefs as held one hundred years ago, and possessed of the same characteristics that marked him in the days of Count de Frontenac, saving the spirit of adventure that daring leaders were then able to evoke. The Quebec of to-day is the Quebec of ancient story. All the rest of the world may move, Quebec clings to the past. The farmer tills his fields according to the most approved methods of the days of the grand monarch. Famin and pestilence are warded off by offerings to saints, whose ability in that direction has been forgotten beyond the boundaries of New France. The appearance of the potato bug is quickly followed by the erection of numerous wooden crosses, and if the crosses do not prevent the bug from entering the fields and there filling their bellies, no blame is attached to the crosses; the habitant simply invokes a curse upon the bug, crosses himself, and fills the pipe which he has made himself with tobacco grown on his own patch of ground, and puffs his cares away. If he would only puff the smoke of that tobacco at the potato bugs the latter would either die or quit the province never to return. This the habitant will not do, because he never knew his father to do so. Of the government the habitant knows no more than he cares. He pays no taxes, because he cannot. His wants are few and they are supplied by himself and family. He has no money, for all that he can rake together, generally speaking, is absorbed by the tithes which he must pay to the church. He may be able to read; generally he is not. A little learning is considered even more dangerous in Quebec than elsewhere, so that the amount possessed by the habitant is very little indeed. So long as he confines himself to the country districts he is very easily managed. There the sway of the priest is absolute. In affairs of the church as well as of affairs in which the church should hav no part, the priest is judge and jury. It is well to get on the right side of the priest. If this be impossible, there is nothing for the habitant to do, unless he be an extraordinary specimen and with a strong liking for solitude, except to emigrate or die, taking care, if he decide to die and hav any thought for his soul, to will his property to the church, that the requisit number of masses to get his intangible part out of trouble may be provided for, even if they be not said."

This is a fine country to talk about taking into our Union of states. It is a section of Italy in the Dark Ages. Nowhere else on earth is the pope so potent as in the province of Quebec, and he seems to be perfectly willing that his slaves should continue to liv in squalor and ignorance. Yet Quebec is only a sample of all countries that submit unreservedly to religious rule. As she is now, so was all Europe when Christianity guided the affairs of part of the world.

Editorial Notes.

A FREETHOUGHT society has been formed at Tampa, Florida, and the daily News of that town reports it to be flourishing. Meetings are held on Sundays, with large audiences. Christians are welcomed in the discussions of the society, and all sorts of views are listened to with respect. The editor of the daily News is in sympathy with the organization, opening his columns to communications on religious subjects, and reporting the meetings fully, so that Freethought is getting quite a boom in that far-off Southern town.

C. B. REYNOLDS has been having a hurly-burly sort of a time in Yankton, as we learn from the Dakota Herald. Not for many a day, says that paper, has Yankton been so stirred up. Mr. Reynolds's first lecture was on Sunday night, when the preachers were busy with their own affairs, and his audience was large. Monday night the Episcopalian preacher was on hand, and at the conclusion of the lecture he climbed upon the platform, so excited, says the Herald, that he could hardly speak. He criticised Mr. Reynolds very harshly, and Mr. Reynolds replied in equally forcible language. The meeting broke up in excitement. The next day Mr. Reynolds received this letter:

"Yankton, Dakota.

"You had better leve town to once. I am after you. I will fix you, O yes. JACK THE RIPPER"

Mr. Reynolds declined to leave town, and lectured again on Tuesday evening, and the same preacher again appeared. When the audience arose to go the clergyman mounted a chair in the rear of the hall and began a speech. "Pandemonium reigned supreme," says the Herald. "The clergyman was trying to talk, while boys were shouting, and a general uproar prevailed that was extremely disgusting and reprehensible in the eyes of all who love decency and orderly behavior. The riotous discord prevailed for some minutes, but finally the people commenced to pass out and thus the meeting closed." Wednesday night the clergyman remained away, and the meeting passed off quietly. The Herald speaks highly of Mr. Reynolds's oratory, and of the matter of his lectures.

THE daily papers of this city published a story that Colonel Ingersoll had been rejected from membership in the Players' Club because of his opinions on religious matters. The story was untrue, the colonel not having been even proposed for membership in the club, but the rumor givs the New York Dramatic Mirror—a paper that can be termed the official organ of the actors—the opportunity to put on record what is probably the opinion of all Players of worth and reputation. It says: "The publication was instrumental in showing most strikingly the great orator's popularity, and creating a tremendous amount of indignation among his friends and admirers before its falsity was discovered. The Players couldn't choose a better man than Ingersoll for rejection if they wanted to excite the enmity of the entire profession. The stage and its people hav no warmer friend in the world, and surely no abler one."

DR. WHITEHEAD.

CASTANA, IA., Jan. 9, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a subscriber to your paper for a long time, but hav never noticed anything in its columns about the secret order of the Knights of Pythias. Will you, or some of your many correspondents, giv through the columns of your paper a history of its origin, what its object is, and the benefits, if any, which are derived from it, and oblige a "seeker for truth?" Very respectfully, A. A. DAVIS.

BRISTOL, VT., Jan. 5, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: As some of your correspondents who are interested in the hen-and-egg problem are widely apart, and others do not understand how I got the answer I did, I thought I would try and explain. I think they will all readily see that the whole time given, divided by the time required to produce one egg, and that multiplied by the number of hens, should giv the correct answer; stated thus, seven divided by one and a half multiplied by six equals 27.9996.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find twenty-five cents for "Bible Inquirer, or a Key to Bible Investigation," by A. Jacobson. I buy a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER every week at the foot of Market street, Philadelphia. Those cartoons are just too great for anything. I get my work in on the ferry-boat when I sit down and spread out the paper in full. Oh, the black looks I get! Keep it up. They speak for themselvs. I am right in the hotbed of rampant fanaticism, the camp-meeting grounds of the New Jersey Methodist conference.

LONGMONT, COL., Jan. 1, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: It has been some time since I hav seen anything in THE TRUTH SEEKER regarding the Longmont branch of the Secular Union. This society was organized over two years ago, and has more than held its own. It has steadily increased its membership, and missed but one meeting since its organization. Among the stalwart members are Colonel Kelso, Joseph Wolff (brother of J. B. Wolff who spoke so ably before the Blair committee), Mrs. Etta Kelso, Mrs. Georgiana Rice, Mrs. E. J. Mellette, etc. Mr. and Mrs. Thornburgh, lately from Alliance, O., were present at the last meeting. About half of the members are Spiritualists, the rest are Agnostics and Materialists—but the latter are not so arrogant as some of THE TRUTH SEEKER correspondents seem to be.

MR. EDITOR: Twenty-eight is the correct answer to the hen-and-egg problem from an arithmetical standpoint, but the New York Tribune, the originator of the problem, gave twenty-four as correct; claiming that the hen was not thirty-six hours laying each egg, but that she laid an egg at the end of each thirty-six hours, and that each hen would lay four eggs in six days, and that the fifth egg would not be laid till the end of seven and one-half days. It is a "catch" problem, and of little interest but for the fact that it has shown how a simple problem will at times puzzle fair mathematicians. Many hav given forty-two as the answer. They reasoned in this wise: If a hen and a half lays an egg and a half in a day and a half, one hen will lay one egg in one day. It should be: One hen will lay one egg in a day and a half. A similar problem is this: If six cats catch six rats in six minutes, how many cats will it take to catch one hundred rats in one hundred minutes? One hundred is not the answer, but six. This should settle it, but it will not, for some will never be able to get any answer except forty-two.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL and other books per inclosed list. THE TRUTH SEEKER is doing a great work. I hope it will liv forever, and assist the poor, trodden-down human family. I saw my eighty-third birthday the 20th of December last, so I cannot do much more in this world.

Yes, it is time to hav a new miracle. It is nearly three thousand years since Elijah had his little fracas, and Balaam had his, and it all went up in smoke—nothing left as a memorial as evidence to the human family that the thing ever occurred at all. Now, if we can get a stone cathedral erected right in the city of New York in one night by a real god, it will convince everybody, and make more converts than all the Sam Joneses that were ever born, and save all the missionary expense to the heathen. Besides, we will find out who are the heathen—whether it be Talmage or the Chinaman. Of course, I expect it will be the old, old story, that gods are all asleep or gone on a journey. Even Talmage's God will be no exception. If Talmage be an honest man he will back up this test, because if his god be what he says he is, he is abundantly able to meet the test.

Yours in the bonds of humanity, THOS. KNIGHT.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., Jan. 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: It was too bad in me to play that joke on my mathematical friends B. R. Tucker, McArthur, "Zeno," and company. The argument by which I proved that if a hen and a half lay an egg and a half in a day and a half, six will lay forty-two eggs in seven days—namely, that all the data may be repeated an indefinit number of times without changng their relations—is the very same by which McArthur proves that a railroad train making a yard a second will never catch a cow running before it at the rate of a yard in two seconds, and by which "Zeno," Tucker, Henry George, et al prove that a geometrical increase of population will never overtake an arithmetical increase of food. The best possible proof that it is the same, is that they did not see the fallacy until Mr. Parkhurst pointed it out to them, and then triumphed over the refutation of arithmetic, that is, Tucker who has spoken, does so. The correct answer to the hen problem is as follows, with analysis, which Orella Locke asks for:

As (hens) 1.5 : 6 :: Eggs. 1.5 : Eggs. 28
As (days) 1.5 : 7

Multiply 2.25 : 42 :: 1.5
1.5
and multiply 210
42
and divide. 2.25)63.0(28
18 00
18 00

The mistake of Mr. Hazeltine, and, no doubt, of the Tribune man, consisted in running out seven divided by one-fifth into a circulating decimal, and multiplying this (imperfect) result by six, the result of the first simple proportion, instead of the sum of the circulating decimal.

MR. EDITOR: There are a class of people called the clergy and their followers who claim to be teachers. They hav constructed a book and called it the Holy Bible. This book starts out with the assertion, "In the beginning God created the heaven and earth." They hav been talking and writing about this God for a long time. From my own knowledge they hav talked and written about it over sixty years. It is expected that sensible people will talk about what they know and can demonstrate to be a fact. I hav found this to be a fact, that all we know is what we learn, and that we are never too old to learn. I hav inquired for a number of years of the people and also of the clergy. They are claimed to be God's agents. They tell us that God created us after his own image, but I hav not been fortunate enough to find out anyone to represent his character. I hav observed the word "create." I find it impossible to create something from nothing. I hav observed the words the clergy use in teaching, such as God, devil, heaven, hell, ghost, soul, spirit, angel, and immortality. These are words they hav invented expressly to deceive the people. They are words without any meaning. They are talking about something they do not know anything about, nor anyone else. Now, if we examin the matter calmly, candidly, and scientifically, we shall find it to be a fraud and a deception. In the coming year 1889 let us all try and be truthful and honest, and try and help each other along the journey of life. I believe we shall evolve out of darkness to something that we can understand and demonstrate to be a fact, and that our condition will be very much improved.

HARRISON HALBERT.

ONONDAGA HILL, N. Y., Feb. 1, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: To questions by Mr. Beecher that appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 5, 1889, I would say:

That the brain is not the commander of all power over the body. The vegetativ functions are directly under the control of the sympathetic system, which consists of a multiplicity of ganglia distributed throughout the body or organism. Each ganglion is itself a separate brain which coöperates with but is not commanded by other nervous structures similar to itself. Within the spinal cord there are nerve centers consisting of gray matter, which centers control unconscious reflex actions.

All the phenomena described in succeeding questions are explained by the fact that there are reflex and sympathetic nervous centers apart from the brain, which centers preside over the functions of certain organs.

The lower the form of life the smaller proportionally is the brain to the entire nervous system. Therefore, the less will the functions of organs be affected by the removal of the brain.

As long as the protoplasm within a cell is in motion, that cell is alive, brain or no brain. The very cell itself has a certain amount of independent nerve-power within its own protoplasm, else the protoplasm could not move after section of the nerves presiding over the part.

The brain is as much a conformer to the nervous states of its branches, even to the twigs that end in the cellular protoplasm of its peripheries, as it is commander of these branches and their cells.

Speaking broadly of all forms of life, the brain is no monopolist of nervous power; it is simply a coöperator, not a commander. And its coöperation can be dispensed with for a length of time that varies inversely as the grade of the organism.

Dissection is vivisection as long as the protoplasm is in motion.

Instinct has never been resolved into components that hav been proved to differ from those of reason.

Though reason and instinct present themselvs under different conditions, we hav not the data to say wherein they are essentially alike or different.

The reason movements of the limbs are executed by decapitated animals or men is because the multapolar cells in the spinal cord, with the nerves leading to and from them, are intact, and reflex actions follow the excitation of these cells by the shock of the blow received. Also, a panic may be said to arise at this time in every nervous center of the cord. This panic is due to the non-coöperation of the partner nerve cells that belong to the brain.

In the instance of the turtle performing coördinated movements after removal of the head, there is good evidence that there are coördinating centers in the so-called column of Clark, situated in the gray matter of the cord, and connected with the direct cerebellar tract which is but an extension of the cerebellum.

I will close by asking one question myself, What is the "vital knot?"

CLEVELAND, O., Jan. 6, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Although not a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, I am a devoted reader, buying the paper of newsdealers ever since Heston's creation of Adam—which, by the way, I believe is the only creation Adam ever had. But first let me say, as an excuse for not being a direct subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, that I am traveling most of my time, and would not receive the paper with any degree of regularity through the mails. But to return to the object of this letter, I will say I do not agree with Mr. John Hudson in regard to the biblical illustrations which appear on the last page of THE TRUTH SEEKER, as in my experience I find the majority of the so-called Christians with whom I come in contact hav never read the Bible, except certain verses which suit their particular ideas, and therefore are unacquainted with the absurdities which the Bible contains. And to illustrate the value of the aforesaid biblical illustrations, I will merely relate one of my many experiences with them and the parties to whom they are bad medicin. Once while passing THE TRUTH SEEKER around to my acquaintances for inspection one said, at first glance, with a smile, "Why, it is a religious paper." But at the next glance he said, "I would not read such a paper." Said I, "My friend, I pity the man on whose case you should happen to sit as judge." In surprise he asked, "Why?" I replied, "You would hear only one side of the case before rendering a decision." "But," said he, "there is no such verse in the Bible." I persuaded him, however, to take the paper home and compare the verse as given in the paper, with the result of getting him to read both the Bible and THE TRUTH SEEKER, the latter of which I loaned to him from time to time, and I think he will soon be safe; as your humble servant used to be quite orthodox until he started to read the Bible through, but now he is one of those obnoxious Freethinkers who delight to pass THE TRUTH SEEKER around, and he succeeds in getting it read by four or five persons each week who are on the orthodox side of the question, and who, by the way, could not be induced to even look at the paper if it were not illustrated. And I, for one, hope Brother Heston will not stop until he has John the Divine's last Delirium in the so-called Revelation illustrated to his entire satisfaction.

VINELAND, N. J., Jan. 11, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: In No. 2 of the current volume of THE TRUTH SEEKER, a Worcester "Liberal," in "Opinions on Liberalism," commences well, but falls into common errors. To be brief, I will pick out points, and quote little. He sees that church strength and advantage are gained by many issues, topics, and artifices, and thinks that against its power and influence right, justice, and truth are of little moment. If he means exerted only theoretically, he is right; but practically exerted against its organization, by a firm counter organization, those attributes would be of much moment. He approves strengthening our weak points to reduce the odds of advantage, but would confine our opposition to one object, while the enemy is armed and activ against us at all points, on all objects. Probably he would advise that we organize on one branch or topic, and had need to be studying the situation. A well-poised Union could face an avalanche like the Blair bill, and turn to any of the myriad forms of oppression that tyranny conceives. Church organization takes in every earthly topic but the liberty it fights, and makes them serve its treasury and authority. Its great wings and flanks are also composed of many issues and hav proportionate power; the source is practical and power-combining, as all may see. It expels nothing that is Christian, or that is not, if it will conform. The cautious "Liberal" would be a despot, on so-called cranks' control, and gladly lose them. They are as likely to hav a large range of ideas as most men, and about as likely to present them, but may exercise less suavity and regard for popularity. True Liberals will accord them due chances. This one is also sensitiv to prejudice, and would take care to lessen it. If he will reason upon it, he may see it the very heart of poison that supports theology, and all care to escape it. Popularity, as now known, is the imagined superiority of assumed authority. It is kept prevalent by ostracism so vile as hardly to deserve the slang title of Grundy. By it despots of all orders sway the masses, taking in Liberals, save a few who ignore it, sentiment and practice. It is unrepublican; our Constitution repudiates it. For a time it was so little apparent that our nation got favorably started; then church strength gave pride of power, assumption revived its smoldering embers, and has acquired the status of present popularity. Under it liberty cannot thrive. To gain their hold, true standards must be set and sustained by calling together their own.

MARY E. TILLOTSON.

CENTRAL CITY, COL., Dec. 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: If Ella E. Gibson ever shakes hands at so long a range, I ask the privilege of being permitted the honor, for these sensible words: "Is it not a great mistake for people who do not believe in the anthropomorphic God to use the same word, 'god,' as those who do believe in him, and then attempt to argue away their own change in the meaning of, or new use to which they put, the word God? Why will they endow the material universe—their 'it'—with the attributes of the gods of the Christian and pagan worshipers, even calling it—the universe—God? The only way for Liberals, or those who disbelieve in gods, is to discard the word entirely, then they will rid themselvs of their contradictions, and escape the ridicule they so justly merit for their seeming inconsistencies."

Can it be that they are unable, that they lack the force of will necessary, to break entirely away from their early training in the Christian faith? Is it not strange that so many, who claim to be Secularists, must patch up something to take the place of their old-time God? I believe that my early training was as strictly religious as that of any child, and yet I now find it utterly impossible for me to place anything above or beyond nature; and that my individual being is simply one of the outgrowths of the operations of nature, and, like everything else belonging to it, subject to its inevitable laws of growth and decay, faring neither better nor worse than other forms coexistent with it.

It has been a long time since I hav contributed anything to the "Letters from Friends" columns of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, although a constant reader of it. I find my time much more advantageously employed in endeavoring to disseminate my Freethought ideas through the medium of local newspapers, in the way of discussions, than in employing my feeble efforts in writing to you and your readers, who are not supposed to be of the "ninety and nine," and therefore "need not repentance."

We who are not blessed with the knowledge and ability of your many very excellent contributors should, through the medium of our home papers, be of untold benefit to our cause; for while we are endeavoring to air our crude ideas in THE TRUTH SEEKER, better writers more sensibly, or in more fitting language, say what we try to say. In fact, I deem our local papers the most effectiv method of educating people who could not be reached through any other medium. When a discussion is once provoked, it can be continued a long time and do a world of good by using proper discretion in the language. Taking my own experience into consideration, I would say, avoid strong language; be courteous and considerate of your opponent's feelings and beliefs. Strong language comes soon and fast enough without courting it, and generally through such language the discussion is brought to a close by request of the readers on the other side, thereby shutting out the very best possible avenue for effectual missionary work.

In conclusion I would say, if at any time any of the friends are confronted by the "lengthened period of time" argument in opposition to the "seven days' creation" of the Bible, they will confer a favor if they will turn the aforesaid "lengthened period of time" theorist over to me. I am anxious to "air" my arguments in opposition to that idea.

D. D. LAKE.

DETROIT, MICH., Jan. 7, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been trying for some time to arouse the readers and writers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to some new truths that are of more vital importance than any that hav ever appeared in any paper yet, and am very glad to see that two or three hav taken so much notice of me as to try to criticise my writings. But they should first try and understand what they read, and then try and understand what they write. Mr. J. A. Tuttle in the last TRUTH SEEKER says that "Mr. Wood asserts that only by taxation can the people be robbed of their land or homes," and challenges any person to dispute it, and further on he adds that "to license as many banks as are asked for, and thus tax the people so as to compel them to borrow bankers' debts to pay taxes with, is the only way possible to cause slavery, poverty, war, vice, crime, and misery to exist." Nevertheless, says Mr. Tuttle, I shall challenge him and all others to successfully controvert the self-evident fact that except for ownership taxation, usury, and slavery could not exist. So the only liberty that Mr. Tuttle has to offer to his fellow-men is to rob them of the best, the greatest, truest attribute of freedom, the liberty of owning a place to lay one's head. What miserable absurdities will not people uphold with fanatical zeal under the name of religion and reform! How many thousands hav wasted their lives, destroyed the lives and hopes of their families, and starved to death, following the advice of the newspapers by going to this, that, and the other place where times are so good and lands all free! I am very glad that Gabriel will be far more apt to blow his last call some ten million years hence, than that the people will ever become such fools as Mr. Tuttle hopes they will. Mr. Tuttle says, Mr. Wood proposes that the government shall abolish taxation and issue "fiat money" in payment of all expenses, "and loan without interest to those who hav occasion to borrow;" and Mr. Tuttle adds that will require a large and continuous issue of "fiat money," none of which will be available unless put in circulation through commercial exchange. Oh, dear! will Mr. Tuttle please tell where he finds this in my letter? Certain I am that I never dreamed of having the government loan one cent to anyone, either with or without interest, and cannot find a word about it in my letter. Will Mr. Tuttle please tell of an instance in the history of this country of fiat money ever being inflated or depreciated? The only real fiat money that history givs any account of was $60,000,000 issued in the year 1861. They were a full legal tender for all debts and dues. They were and are the only true fiat money that has ever been seen in this country, or any other, and hav never varied one mill up or down in over twenty-seven years of war and peace. Mr. Tuttle does not seem to know what fiat money is nor what liberty is. I do not suppose he has ever had any serious thought of the real meaning contained in the Declaration of Independence, nor ever thought to compare it with the miserable creed called the Constitution of the United States. Had the government of this country been formed in accordance with the Declaration of Independence, the government would hav never robbed anyone of life, liberty, or happiness, for the Declaration claimed that the natural right of every person born was and is always inalienable, above all earthly power of right to interfere with. The Revolutionary war was caused by taxation, and the rebellion of Captain Daniel Shays in Massachusetts just at the close of the Revolutionary war, against taxation, was more significant than the Revolutionary war itself. But the government sent the same veterans who had fought so long for liberty to put down this protest against slavery.

Perhaps I know more of Socialism than Mr. Tuttle. Certainly I never hav seen a Socialist, Communist, Anarchist, or any Georgeist or anti-landist who was ever able to show that the theories he advocates would ever lighten the burdens of the people. Now, the secretary of the treasury for 1884 says that the government had taken in taxes in ninety-seven years over $20,000,000,000. An ex-senator lately declared in this city that the expenses of the state governments are about the same as those of the general government, from which I assume that upward of $40,000,000,000 hav been forced from the people of this so-called free land in less than the first one hundred years, ostensibly for the support of government. But I say that it is for the purpose of compelling them to borrow bankers' debts to pay those taxes with, so that bankers and money-lenders may enrich themselvs by debt and interest. I can show Mr. Tuttle places within twenty miles of this city where people hav been driven from land and home by taxation. I can show him the places where twenty houses and business buildings stood forty years ago within the space of two miles square, where not a vestige remains to-day nor anything to replace them; and the young people who should fill the place in the future are gone, wanderers from land and home.

But enough of Mr. Tuttle. It is not for or to him that this is directed. He has never tried to think, yet he jumps his whole weight onto any new idea that happens to be placed before him in a pleasing light. He should join the few old fanatical Abolitionists who are still telling the Lord how they freed the nigger.

Ever for liberty or death, J. H. WOOD.

AURORA, O., Feb. 1, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Among New Year's greetings I received a very friendly and interesting letter from a reverend gentleman settled in a village on the lake shore about thirty miles away. He is better read, and more Liberal and broad in his views, than men of his cloth generally are. I would send you a copy of part of his letter, but find that in my answer to him I hav copied enough of it to show how extensiv reading and knowledge tend to Liberalize minds and change opinions begotten in the lessons and formulas of pulpits and Sunday-schools. He published some three years ago an article in the North American Review, or Popular Science Monthly, entitled, "The New Religion," which attracted some attention at that time. Heber Newton is not alone in efforts to reconstruct Christianity on some different basis. The old hell, and heaven, and supernatural instead of natural morality, are worn-out planks. N. EGGLESTON.

DEAR FRIEND: . . . You say you are reading a book, the oldest in the world, much older than Moses; and after saying that "it carries us back three thousand years before Christ, and introduces us to a society as refined as that of the best part of Christendom to-day, and to a code of morals, and of social manners, and religious teachings, that will compare with those of the Bible, and some of which are doubtless contained in it;" after saying "that Moses and Solomon are great, but largely as transmitters of the greatness of the great ages prior to their own;" after eloquently saying that "we are basking in the light of the nineteenth century, but the brightest beams hav come to us from the heavens which canopied the prehistoric race," the word "matchless" which you apply to the Bible, in near connection, seems to me like a sort of extravagance, or the result of habits acquired in professional life.

My brother, you speak of "decadence." I suppose you refer to the more than fourteen hundred years commencing about the time of Constantine, called in history properly the "Dark Ages." That "decadence" was inaugurated in Alexandria by the burning of the most important library the world will ever contain; and the most cruel and shocking murder ever committed. Its victim was the loveliest and most learned woman that ever lived, and one of the last students and philosophers of that ancient "society," and school, of which you say you are reading. Charles Kingsley has wept over her fate, and so hav you. Neither you nor he acknowledge brotherhood with that Christian bishop whose name cannot be wiped out of the account of one of the blackest crimes ever recorded.

That "decadence" lasted till Galileo was imprisoned and made to renounce—till Bruno was burnt at a stake—till Calvin burnt Servetus—till the rivers of Europe ran with human blood—till the Inquisition was abolished, and persecution exhausted itself.

The renaissance is slowly coming, and it cheers me to know that you are helping to redeem the race—not to restore it to Eden or to Jerusalem, but to exhume it from beneath the strata of superstition and ignorance that vicious selfishness and unholy craft hav piled up and incrusted over it, until it almost needs the convulsions of an earthquake to break and upheave them.

Your thoughts and illustrations are most beautiful toward the end of your letter. You compare these old volumes of ante-Mosaic times to the coal and oil that hav been stored so long in the earth and hav only until now begun to be utilized for the enlightenment and comfort of the race. I cannot add anything to this, and am afraid of getting tedious.

The calendar of my life is reaching its last page. Whether, as Franklin said, there will be a second edition, I know not. If each life from Menes or Moses or Abraham had been written in brief, the books could not stand singly in the land where the subjects lived, and fought, and killed each other. Whether my struggle has been manful, whether I hav wrestled unfairly, I am not the only judge. I want no crown to wear here or hereafter—no harp and no robe, that cost another a moment's toil or suffering. I hav paid all my bills so far, and should lose my independence if I felt that I could not to the end.

I am content "in the love of nature"—

NELSON, NEW ZEALAND, Dec. 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been in receipt of your publication about two years and a half. I receive it through your agent, Mr. Willis. I hav much pleasure in indorsing the many statements continually made, namely, that THE TRUTH SEEKER is one of the most Liberal and tolerant papers extant. I notice that some of your correspondents complain that you are in sympathy with Anarchy. I fail to see in any one of the editorials on this question one line or seutence that can convey such an idea. The impression made on my mind is that the writer urgently and warmly pleads for a fair trial, a fair investigation, for a class or organization that as a citizen he would not support or countenance; that as the controler of a medium claiming to court free and open criticism, irrespectiv of class or creed, position or wealth, he has kept THE TRUTH SEEKER true to its professions—that is to say, so far as we are able to judge—giving every cause a fair field.

Self and friends hav perused with pleasure and profit the many able and welcome articles from the pen of Robert G. Ingersoll. The refrain throughout all his contributions is the "brotherhood of man." This sentiment is the foundation-stone that transcends preëminently all creeds and religions; it is the basis on which the anticipated millennium must stand. To take up a position antagonistic to old and cherished institutions, such as the church with her army of wealthy adherents, needs extraordinary ability and resolution in order to accomplish any appreciable result; so that those men and women who elect to stand out as enemies to superstition and tyranny need and should hav all the sympathy and coöperation of those who accept their teaching. I trust Mr. Ingersoll may liv long, and in the end hav the satisfaction of knowing that he has been true to his convictions, hence true to himself. That the world will be better for his having lived, goes without saying.. Strange, I never read his articles without thinking of Robert Burns.

But, sir, there is one question that shocks us. I allude to Mr. Ingersoll's views on protection. That a man who has so ably dealt with other and larger questions should be the defender of an old, narrow-minded, and clannish policy is to very many a puzzle. One would hav thought and expected to find him taking a much higher stand than the role of a pettifogging politician. Why, sir, are you not preaching and teaching "reciprocity," the federation and commonwealth of the world? Is not protection the outcome of selfishness, often, too often, prompted by bitterness and retaliation? I find a splendid article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 23d, "The Principles of Freedom in Trade," by Robert C. Adams. While reading it I felt sure that it must be Ingersoll's, it seemed so in keeping with his usual broad and Liberal views—but, alas! no. Yet I was agreeably pleased to find that you, Mr. Editor, had another as able contributor. Study it, Mr. Ingersoll—I mean the article in question. I hav been holding you up as the very model of a reformer and statesman, but your expressions on protection hav lowered the barometer.

Your artist Watson Heston is doing well. His subjects seize and compel attention, and thus prove interesting to hundreds who will not and who cannot read. The front page of July 7th has a splendid picture, "Fishing." September 1st is the only one I take exception to. The word "blow" is applicable; the more especially is it conspicuous in the title, "Here is Our Goliath—Bring on Your David." I am sure Mr. Ingersoll needs none of this. October 6th, "The Burden of the Cross;" here we hav the situation at a glance. September 15th, "A Comparison of Records," another noble picture out of the many that grace THE TRUTH SEEKER and make it an attraction to all Liberals. I must not overlook the one for August 18th, "The Movement of the Clergy." This grand illustration and index of the coming day makes one feel assured and encouraged to work on for the "good time coming." April 7th, "The Mask Torn Off." This picture is, I think, perfectly true; and, without any exaggeration, is what may be expected should the "cross supplant the flag."

THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 6th contains the best brief exposition of Atheism that I hav read. I refer to the article over the signature of Prof. C. L. Haskell, "How to Convert an Atheist." It should be put in leaflet form and scattered by the thousand for mission work. It is just the article. The issue of September 15th contains another good and ably written article, "Wages and Tariff," by F. M. Holland. Yes, THE TRUTH SEEKER is certainly an educator that Liberals may be proud of. The issue of October 6th contains a reprint from the Banner of Light, "A Spirit's Tribute to Thomas Paine." It is certainly a worthy tribute to a worthy man—a man who, in my opinion, was one of the true apostles of the godhead, or, rather, perhaps I should say, of humanity. His fame and worth hav been obscured by church dignitaries and their dupes so long and successfully that few, very few, know the great worth, ability, and benevolence of Paine. But thanks and gratitude to him and others for the many privileges we now enjoy. Paine's life and works will yet illuminate the world and become the watchword of liberty everywhere. And while the morning star of intellectual liberty is brightening the coming day, the gloom of night and oblivion is now casting its shadow on the detractors of him who said: "The world is my country, and to do good my religion." Paine was an intellectual giant. That he never occupied the highest position of trust and confidence in the gift of the American people is certainly not his loss, as he merited the fullest confidence and respect. But America can make some amends. She can rear to his memory a monument that will remind posterity of the man who, more than any other, defied the tyrant, inspired you with confidence, and pointed the way to freedom. America, you are a great continent. You are inhabited by a great nation. Do not forget to be great in gratitude. When you honor the mighty dead—the dead who fought for you, bled for you, and would hav died for you—you honor yourselvs.

Yours truly, THOMAS HARWOOD.

When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Perfect Word.

My dear little Willie—my boy of four—
Played with his blocks on the nursery floor.
In gaudy tints on the blocks was set,
In printed letters, the alphabet;
This way and that way, side by side,
Block after block he turned and tried.
Watching my Willie, his voice I heard:
"Come and see, mamma, I've made a word!"
Though busy at work, I never forgot
To look when he asked—what mother would not?
"Is that a word, mamma?" he always said;
I laughed, and said, "No," and shook my head.
At last worn out, too tired to creep,
On the nursery floor he fell asleep;
To lay him in his crib I went,
And I saw he had made by accident
A word with the blocks set side by side—
A word when he hadn't even tried.
He had made a litter, as oft before,
With the blocks all over the nursery floor;
But, like a mother, I could not bear
To spoil the word, so I left it there.
A thought came into my heart: Just so
We grown-up ones to our duties go,
We ponder them over, we toil and fret
Over our life like an alphabet;
Till, after a while, too tired to weep,
Over many failures we fall asleep.
Only a letter through life we've made,
And, dreaming of doing, hav only played.
Yet the wondrous power of love may change,
And unknown to us, may the deeds arrange.
Oh, if we wake may the voice be heard
Telling at last of the perfect word.

The Reward of Perseverance.

At one of the mills in the city of Boston a boy was wanted; and a piece of paper was tacked on one of the posts, so that all the boys could see it as they passed by. The paper read:

"Boy wanted. Call at the office to-morrow morning."

At the time named there was a host of boys at the gate. All were admitted; but the overseer was a little perplexed as to the best way of choosing one from so many, and said he:

"Now, boys, when I only want one of you, how can I choose from so many?"

After thinking a moment, he invited them all into the yard, and driving a nail into one of the large trees, and taking a short stick, told them that the boy who could hit the nail with a stick a little distance from the tree should hav the place.

The boys all tried hard; and after three trials, each failed to hit the nail. The boys were told to come again next morning; and this time, when the gate was opened, there was but one boy, who, after being admitted, picked up the stick, and, throwing it at the nail, hit it every time.

"How is this?" said the overseer. "What hav you been doing?"

And the boy, looking up with tears in his eyes, said:

"You see, sir, I hav a mother; and we are very poor. I hav no father, sir, and I thought I would like to get the place and so help all I can; and, after going home yesterday, I drove a nail into the barn, and hav been trying ever since, and hav come down this morning to try again."

Many years hav passed since then, and this boy is now a prosperous and wealthy man; and at the time of an accident at the mills he was the first to step forward with a gift of $500 to relieve the sufferers. His success came by perseverance.

He Knew All About It.

Johnnie livs out in western New York, near the famous Silver Lake camp-ground. One day at Sunday-school the minister talked to the children about the duty of their making a right start early in life, and showed them what a safeguard the temperance pledge would be. He had a supply of triple-pledge cards on hand, and Johnnie with many others very gladly gave his name. He carried the card home to his mother, with his name written on it in his very best style, and proudly showed it to his mother and father. His good mother was very glad of his act, but his father only laughed. Said he:

"Why, Johnnie, you don't understand this. You are too young to know all it means."

"No, I ain't, papa," said Johnnie. "I understand all about it. It means, if I always keep that pledge, I'll never come home as you did last Fourth of July."

His father said no more, but concluded that Johnnie did know more than he gave him credit for.

Calling a Newspaper a Worm.

Speaking of children, we hav this from the South Side. A family over there, subscribers to the Derrick, hav among their household treasures a three-year-old daughter. Sometimes the mother goes out on the porch in the morning to get the paper and at other times the father gets it. Recently the father and the little girl went out for the paper, and as he picked it up he remarked: "The early bird gets the worm." The following morning the father did not make his appearance when breakfast was ready, and a member of the family inquired where he was. Little Tot answered up promptly: "Papa is out on the porch reading the worm."—Oil City Derrick.

Dear Miss Wixon: Here are the names of the donors up to January 27th, which make up the sum. It has been better than I expected. And many thanks to the donors, and the old folks down South can drink milk from their own cow, which I hope will do them good. I will send, in a few days, a beautiful poem that was sent to me from one of the donors for the good of the Children's Corner. I will close, as I hav already taken up a great deal of space for the names, so good-bye. Ever your true friend,

Miss Satie Thorpe.

[In addition to the above, the editor of the Corner has received fifty cents from G. F. Moore, Cleveland, O., which she has forwarded to the Caseys.]

Correspondence.

Jan. 25, 1889.

Dear Miss Wixon: I will send you a "Memory Gem," which you may print if you like:

Hearts, like doors, can ope with ease
To very, very little keys,
And don't forget that they are these,
"I thank you, sir," and "If you please."

Jenkin Rees.

Home City, Kan., Jan. 21, 1889.

Miss Wixon, Dear Friend: I now endeavor to write you my first letter, telling you that I am going to school. My studies are reading, spelling, arithmetic, grammar, geography, and physiology. I am twelve years old. We hav much snow here. I like to go to school; hav not been absent yet. We had school four months. We are to hav school four months more. I like to read books. I hav four sisters and two brothers. We liv in the country. I do not go to church very often, because mamma and papa do not want me to. We were once Catholics, but we gave it up; now we do not belong to any church. My uncle keeps The Truth Seeker, and I like to read the letters from other little girls. My teacher's name is Melissa B. Smith. She is a Christian. She goes to Sunday-school as often as she can. The people around here are almost all Christians. I will now cease writing. Hoping you success with your work, I remain,

Your Freethinker friend,

Aggie Hartmann.

[The subjoined well-written letter was written by a colored boy attending the Holley school at Lottsburgh, Va. It was written to Photius Fisk, Esq., a friend and patron of that school, and also a dear lover of humanity, who kindly permits the publication of the letter in the Corner. We must all admire Carey Parker's determination not to use tobacco in any form, and we feel sure all the boys and girls who read the letter will be as wise as Carey in refusing to use that noxious weed that is destructiv of the soil as well as human beings.—Ed. C. C.]

Holley School, Va., Jan. 16, 1889.

Dear Friend: I am going to tell you about a lesson that we had on tobacco last Sunday. I did not know before that it was a poison. We learned that it has a bad effect on the body, the mind, and the morals. I am glad that you do not use tobacco. I never mean to use it. Nine of us boys signed the pledge not to use it. I wish everybody would stop using it. I wish that there was not any tobacco in the world. I learned in the history that tobacco was first raised in Virginia, and twenty slaves were brought from Africa in a Dutch vessel to tend the tobacco crops.

Tobacco was the ruin of the soil all about us in this part of old Virginia.

Only one stalk of corn for our bread can grow in a hill here, the ground is so poor and worn out.

I am trying to learn to be a teacher, and I thank you for all the beautiful kindness you hav shown to this school. The winter is so warm little flowers are in bloom now. I did not see the eclipse of the moon last night. I trust you are enjoying health.

Very sincerely, Carey Parker.

Science Column.

Alcohol.

This fluid poison can be made from anything containing sugar. It is a chemical which has a great effect upon the brain and nerves. In small quantities, it excites; in greater, paralyzes. By its use a man's higher faculties become paralyzed and leave him under control of his lower and debasing passions; his senses become obscured, and his judgment impaired, until finally his whole nervous system becomes exhausted, and he dies of paralysis, epilepsy, or insanity.

If we use alcohol, we blunt our finer perceptions, which we should cherish and cultivate by obedience to the laws of health.

If we persist in the use of spirits our muscles will change, in a great degree, to fat, and will soon become flabby and feeble.

Athletes know that if they indulge freely in alcoholic drink, they will fail to harden their muscles, and in order to attain the vigorous conditions desired they abstain entirely from its use during their time in training. Firm and activ muscles are the desire of everyone. Some say that men who are distinguished for their strength of body and mind are the users of intoxicating drinks, but such men frequently become diseased, and die before they reach an old age. Such men squander their natural powers.

If we use alcohol, our blood becomes poisoned and unfit for its work. It dilates the smaller blood-vessels, as can be seen by the flushing of the face; and the internal organs, if we could see them, would look redder. The flushing will pass off after a certain time on a person not habituated to it, but if the use of the poison is continued in, the vessels will remain dilated. A red nose shows the state of many parts of the body.

Even a moderate use of alcohol, as wines, etc., at meals, will excite the appetite for food, so that a man will overload his stomach and thus injure himself. And the habitual drinker is apt to lose his appetite, and after a time will get so he cannot digest food. Our stomach was made for the digestion of food, and not intended as a receptacle for liquors. If used as a pouch for burning liquor, it will soon get so it will gladly receive it, but will not be of use for the digestion of food.

The use of spirits has a manifest effect upon the breath. If a person takes more than a small quantity of alcohol, it will be thrown out of the body with no change. The breath of a person who has been drinking will always betray him, no matter what he uses to drown the odor. There is nothing which will disguise the smell of alcohol. The breath of a drinker contains, besides the vapor of water and carbonic acid gas, which are found in the natural breath, the vapor of alcohol, which is unnatural and is known by its odor. Such a breath is very offensiv.

Knowing the injurious effects of alcohol on the human system, we should avoid cultivating a taste which may get beyond our control, and which, besides ruining our own health, may curse our offspring.

If parents taught their children the science of health instead of the superstitious dogmas which are crammed into their heads, we should hav a better, healthier, and more temperate race. If they would teach them anatomy and physiology one day in the week instead of sending them to Sunday-school, they would hav healthier bodies and minds.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

ROME OR REASON. A Memoir of Christian and Extra-Christian Experience. By Nathaniel Ramsay Waters. Price, $1.75.

This book comprises a very critical analysis of both Protestantism and Catholicism, from the vantage-ground of an intimate personal experience with the two systems. The writer, it appears, is determined to nothing extenuate nor set down aught in malice. His examination of the Protestant principle will be new to some Protestants, as will his philosophy of Catholicism to many Catholics. Besides the very interesting memoir which is the main part of the book, it contains notes, parts of correspondence, and an essay or two; all partaking of the analytical and deeply earnest spirit which appears in it from the first. The plan of the work is strikingly original, its purport is set forth in the tersest and clearest language, and the manifest sincerity with which the whole is written will commend it to readers of many various shades of opinion. The work is very argumentativ, with touches of liveliness here and there, which serve to relieve the general gravity of its strain. It has the merit throughout of being free from coarseness and gibing; while it deals the most trenchant blows which pure logic is capable of inflicting.

From the Indianapolis Sentinel.

"The Bible of Nature, or the Principles of Secularism," by Dr. Felix L. Oswald, is described on the title-page as "a contribution to the religion of the future," and is "reverently dedicated" to the memory of Benedict Spinoza. Dr. Oswald's view of the religion of the future is that it "will preach the gospel of redemption by reason, by science, and by conformity to the laws of our health-protecting instincts." The present work consists of a large number of maxims—classified as "physical," "mental," "moral," and "objectiv," whose universal observance, the author holds, would elevate the race and finally make of this earth a paradise. The professor is a physician of fine attainments, a very clever writer, a radical Freethinker, and a devout believer in physical culture. Many of his maxims are eminently sound and may be practiced to advantage, whether they really embody what is to be the religion of the future or not. Price, $1.

Frederick May Holland's admirable work on "The Reign of the Stoics" has reached a second edition. The writer is a scholar and a thinker of eminence, whose "Rise of Intellectual Liberty" is decidedly one of the greatest and best books ever written. His "Reign of the Stoics" is, we believe, the first attempt to relate the history of that remarkable body of philosophers, in connection with an exposition of their creed, which has been pronounced by a distinguished divine "the noblest ever made out by human beings." Their maxims embody some of the best fruits of human wisdom, and most of them are as safe rules for conduct to-day as when they were written. This little volume presents a comprehensiv view of their philosophy and morals, and its study will yield the highest intellectual enjoyment and promote the best moral culture. $1.25.

"The Order of Creation—The Conflict Between Genesis and Geology" is a collection of notable papers from the pens of Mr. Gladstone, Professor Huxley, Professor Max Müller, Dr. Albert Reville, of the College of France, and Mrs. E. Lynn Lynton, the English novelist, which appeared some time since in British reviews. Mr. Gladstone is represented by two papers, Professor Huxley by two, and the other contributors by one each. The great English statesman is one of the sturdiest and ablest defenders of the Mosaic account of the creation in the world, and his papers in this volume are marked by cogency of logic, cleverness of statement, and breadth of scholarship. The "scientific" view is presented with great skill and vigor by the four other controversialists. It is four against one, but the one is a good match for the four. 75 cents.

A LETTER TO COLONEL KELSO.

MODESTO, CAL., Aug. 10, 288.

COL. JOHN R. KELSO, Dear Sir: I wonder if you would like to hear how I like your last book, "The Universe Analyzed." I hav read it once, and am going over it again with my husband, for it will bear more than one reading. I cannot find words to express my admiration for this the latest and best work of your brain. In many portions it is inexpressibly grand. This book has touched a responsiv chord within me that none of your other works ever did. After reading this, however, I appreciate them more. This is the key to them all.

It ought to be read by everyone, for it is food for thought, if nothing more; but the ordinary mind can never grasp your master thoughts, and the ordinary mind will never read it. I never before read anything that lifted me so far above everything as do some passages in this book. I was fascinated, and, for the time being, left all thoughts of the petty annoyances of life in the background. I think that in some respects you hav gone beyond the thoughts of most mortals, and that in others you hav voiced the thoughts of many. I wish I could talk to you and your oved and loving wife about these great ruths, if such they are. Her "Arbor Hom-nis" is a fine production, and is certainly an original one. I imagin the honored individual who crowns the apex bears a resemblance to her husband.

If there are weak places in your theories, I am not wise enough to find them, though some of your reasonings are almost past comprehension, notably the formation of worlds. Your flight of imagination (if such it be) is grand, or, rather, sublime, and if it be not imagination, your reasoning is more sublime. I hope you will find sale for this work. It ought to attract scientific minds.

FLORELLA A. FINNEY.

OF MRS. SLENKER'S "JOHN'S WAY," AND "LITTLE LESSONS."

"Little Lessons" is a very interesting little book, there is so much information to be learned from it.—ALICE CARY JORDAN, Wytheville, Va.

We hav glanced over "Little Lessons for Little Folks," and think them splendid, and hope you will receive a large sale for them.—BEVERIDGES, Perrysville, Pa.

I hav read both books and think they are grand. The "Little Lessons" are splendid, and most old people can learn a great deal from them.—BENJ. J. DANAWAY, Terre Haute, Ind.

The children are much interested in "Little Lessons." I am surprised that so much can be said and made so pleasant to read about such ordinary things.—OLIVE T. WOOD, Sebastopol, Cal.

Commentaries on the Bible without number hav been written, but we can assure our readers that the richest and raciest of them all can be had by sending 75 cents to this office for Mrs. E. D. Slenker's commentary, entitled, "Studying the Bible." Also, if they want two of the best stories ever written, send 15 cents to the same for "John's Way," and 75 cents for "The Darwins."—Investigator.

"John's Way" entirely fills the bill in my estimation. Its deep interest will hold the mind of a young lady until she sees more truth than she thinks for. Once started, they develop rapidly, and, Eve-like, they love the fruit so well they want everyone else to share in their joys. I keep it moving—the book. I like the "School Teacher," and will send it to my young friend shortly.—JOHN N. LEARY.

Inclosed please find $1 to pay for six copies of "John's Way." I may say I hav bought at various times about one dozen copies, and lent them to orthodox friends, who in every instance desired to retain the little book, and it in several instances has been the means of their calling a halt and examining their creed, and becoming subscribers to our Liberal papers.—GEORGE MADDOCKS, Hamilton, Ont.

"Little Lessons" is nicely printed, in large, clear type, and is very prettily and substantially bound. The language in which it is written is comprehensiv to the young, and interesting to older people as well. The lessons are about the stars, monkeys, fishes, water, stones, leaves, nerves, frogs, cows, grass, dolls, etc. Concerning these she has succeeded in imparting much knowledge in a form that is likely to hold the interest and deeply impress the minds of the young.—F. GRAVES, Hastings, Mich.

"John's Way" was taken at a single dose—between ten and bedtime. The heaviest blows possible at that monster of superstition, theology, are always in order, and add to this proof from nature that every right thought, word, or act is an impress on character, and that character is our real selvs, the germ of which is as indestructible as is the universe. My little boy nine years old, and just learning to read, is already jealous of anyone looking at "Little Lessons." For children, even if they are sixty years old, "Little Lessons" is a gem.—C. C. LITTLEFIELD, Omaha, Neb.

You should all read "John's Way," and hav the children read it. I once saw the eldest of a family read "The Darwins," by the same author, to a listening group of little folks, and it is a pleasant thing yet to remember how much they all enjoyed the story. "John's Way" givs us a glimpse into the every-day life of a household where the inmates are agreeable and polite as well as intelligent. After reading this little book you feel at peace with all the world, and as though you had met and talked with delightful people. It will make a nice holiday present for your little daughter, granddaughter, niece, cousin, or neighbor.—MARY BAIRD FINCH, Frenchtown, Neb.

Obituary.

DIED.—Jan. 9, 1889, at the residence of her parents at Plymouth, Ransom county, Dak., Sabra S. Harris, aged seventeen, daughter of Jackson and Susan C. Harris.

Brother Harris, like his father before him, is an outspoken Infidel. He and his good wife hav faithfully taught, alike by precept and example, the ennobling principles of Liberalism to their children. All are earnest, genuin Infidels.

E. E. Harris, the eldest son, is the third generation of earnest workers in the cause of Freethought, and of course subscribes for THE TRUTH SEEKER. The entire family are held in the highest esteem even by Christian neighbors, on account of their good, happy, and useful lives.

Sabra was of a most gentle and affectionate disposition; she found her happiness in making heaven in her own home, and reaching out from thence her loving nature sought to promote the happiness of all with whom she associated.

There was a very large attendance at her funeral. Many for the first time witnessed a burial service without priest, parson, or prayer; without Bible or any reference to God, Christ, heaven, or hell.

Sabra was a good girl, a loving daughter, a most affectionate sister, and a faithful friend. She worshiped at the shrine of truth. Her god was nature. Her church, all humanity. Her creed, justice—justice tempered with mercy. She read, studied, thought for herself, and rejoiced in the glorious freedom and ennobling truths of Liberalism, and scorned alike the empty profession of faith and the bigotry and fanaticism of sectarians.

Sabra believed, and her life justified her belief, that a life of uprightness, actuated by a desire to do good to her fellow-creatures, was sure of happy results. This made her life one of bright, joyous happiness, and she died without the faintest shadow of a fear.

The remembrance of her loving, pure, useful life, the joy and brightness she brought into their lives, is now the source of comfort to her near and dear ones.

Back to the bosom of her mother earth we consigned the fair young maiden.

Let the birds sing above her,
The flowers bloom over her,
The sighing winds sing her requiem.
Beneath the icy mantle of winter we left her
Sweetly sleeping. Sweetly sleeping ever.
To wake to pain and sorrow? Never! no, never!

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this they will probably do so at once.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

TO ARMS!

And Moses spake unto the people, saying, Arm some of yourselvs unto the war, and let them go against the Midianites, and avenge the Lord of Midian —Num. xxxi, 3.

Gems of Thought.

THE committee of the church council that made the "four gospels" the canons of their faith had to select them from fifty-four contradictory versions. The evangelists themselvs contradict each other on many essential points; and their chronicles can hardly hav been written before the end of the second century, as not one of the earlier fathers (before Ireneus) ever quotes a single passage of their text, while they relate many events which seem to hav been recorded in the apocrypha. These apocrypha, like the arbitrarily excepted works, originated in a century so prolific of spurious prophecies, forged epistles and biographies, that it has justly been called the age of pious frauds. The four gospels, as well as the larger part of the Pauline epistles, were repudiated by the Socinians, and others of the more intelligent sects of the early Christians.—Prof. Felix L. Oswald, in The Secret of the East.

FOR our Bible, such as it is, we are indebted to the wranglings of the fathers and the laborious plodding of subsequent pedants. We are entirely at their mercy, and they are at deadly variance among themselvs, not only as to certain books which are altogether rejected, but as to which passages are inspired and which are not in the books that hav been accepted. In finding out what the Ghost actually has written, the difficulty of the task becomes more formidable every attempt we make to undertake it. Certain books of the Bible quote from books and records which no longer exist. Were these books and records also inspired? If not, how can portions of books which are not inspired form any portion of books which are inspired? If the Holy Ghost were to quote from the Secular Review, would the Secular Review thereby become inspired? The references of the Holy Ghost to works which seem to hav existed before he began to write the Bible for our salvation and bewilderment are more frequent than a superficial reader would suppose. I here giv a list of the works the Holy Ghost had before him when he was writing, and from which he has quoted: Books lost, cited in the Old Testament. The Book of the Wars of the Lord (Num. xxi, 14). The Book of the Covenant (Ex. xxiv, 7). The Book of Jasher, or the Upright (Josh. x, 13; 2 Sam. i, 18). The Book of the Acts of Solomon (1 Kings xi, 41). . . These works may each and all hav been inspired. I cannot allege that I say so through inspiration; nevertheless, I feel inclined to think that the Book of Jasher, the Book of Iddo, and the rest of them, were juvenil and immature performances of the Ghost. I opine that he incorporated the gist of them into his more recent writings, and then committed to the flames the crude compositions of his adolescence. It is, however, a pity he burnt them. With what holy and absorbing interest we should hav read them as milestones on the road of mental development on which traveled the only ghost that ever took to writing books! Still, some Tischendorf or Shapira may yet unearth the Ghost's boyish volumes, the Book of Gad and the Book of Nathan. We hav certain of the boyish writings of Sir Walter Scott, which were tenderly preserved by his mother; but the Ghost, being his own mother, does not stand on quite parallel lines with Sir Walter Scott.—Saladin's God and His Book.

THE word "mind" describes all the possible states of consciousness of each animal; but as after its death there is no longer in that case any continuing animal so neither is there any possibly continuing mind. But it is only in connection with the mental and vital processes that there is any shadow of attempt by theologians to in any fashion identify soul, and therefore when life has ceased and consciousness is consequently no longer, there is not even the faintest trace of aught remaining to which the word "soul" can with any reasonableness be applied from the theological standpoint.—Bradlaugh.

CONCENTRATION is the secret of strength in politics, in war, in trade; in short, in all management of human affairs.—Emerson.

HE timidly climbed up the brown-stone steps,
He timidly rang the bell,
He felt that this visit might be his last,
Though the reason he couldn't tell.

As he stood at the door the winter wind
Whirled in the streets about,
But above its roaring he heard her say,
"John, tell him that I am out."

Then timid no more, with stately mien,
He said to the butler tall,
"Pray go to Miss Jones with my compliments,
And tell her I didn't call."

CLARA: "Mother, just think of it!" Mother: "What is it, my daughter?" "Charles has insured his life for my benefit for $50 000." "He has? Well, now, my daughter, there is no longer any objection to your making him that angel cake you hav been talking about."

REGINALD YOUNG (who has been very attentiv during the evening): "I wonder, Miss Mabel, if you would consider me impertinent should I ask you the old question?" Miss Mabel (greatly agitated): "O Reginald! This is so sudden—I—I—yes, I will listen to you, Reginald." Reginald Young: "Well, then, hav you read 'Robert Elsmere?'"

OH! I dreamed that I lay on a hot summer's day
'Neath the shade of a spreading beech-tree,
Nought the deep silence broke, save the grasshopper's croak,
And the faint lullaby of the bee.

Soon the sun to his rest slowly sank in the west,
And there broke on my ear a sweet lay
Of maidens returning from milking and churning,
And reapers from meadows of hay.

Far away in the dell I could hear the sheep-bell
As the flock homeward wended its way.
Hark! now it draws near. Who speaks in my ear?
Who is it, and what does he say?

With a snort and a lurch I awoke. 'Twas in church,
'Twas the preacher had droned, not the bee;
'Twas a hymn that they sang, and no sheep-bell that rang,
But the bag—which they're handing to me.

ST. PETER: "So you were a coal-dealer on earth. Did you join in any of the combines to raise prices?" New spirit (proudly): "No, St. Peter; I never did." St. Peter: "Were you careful to see that your scales were correct?" New spirit: "Always." St. Peter: "Did you giv full weight?" New spirit: "Invariably." St. Peter: "When people asked for Lehigh coal, did you always deliver Lehigh?" New spirit: "Great Anthracite! If you are going to be as particular as all that I might as well giv it up. Where is the entrance to the sulphur slope?"

We, the undersigned, adult residents of the United States, do hereby respectfully but earnestly petition your honorable body NOT to pass any bill in regard to the observance of Sunday, or any other religious institution or rite.

We also petition you NOT to adopt any resolution for the amendment of the national Constitution that would by instruction in public schools or in any other way give preference to religious principles over the views of religion held by non-religious persons, but to keep the government strictly secular, and the separation of church and state complete.

THE Evening Post speaks of the editor of the Independent as "that amazing and amusing old moralist." The Post is right; the Independent's morals are amazing if compared with the morals of truthful folk.

A YEAR ago the study of German was abolished in the public schools of St. Louis, a city with a large German element. The school board of Louisville, another city with a considerable German population, has now taken a similar step.

IT is with great pleasure that we read that the British East Africa Company has succeeded in obtaining the release of the Catholic missionaries recently captured by the insurgents by the payment of a ransom to Bashiri. But what we are aching to know is if the pope reimbursed the East Africa Company.

THE Methodist Episcopal church now has 2,154,237 communicants. The value of church property, including parsonages, has reached the enormous sum of $97,546,515. The church property, exclusiv of the parsonages, is valued at $85,000,000. There was raised in 1888 for building and improvement purposes $2,449,804. The current expenses—sexton, light, fuel, etc.—were $2,140,031.

LORD WOLSELEY took this view of the future in making an address at Birmingham: "Those who study the map of Europe at the present moment and the condition of things in Europe must feel that there is hanging over us a war cloud greater than any which has hung over Europe before. It means that when it bursts—and burst it will as surely as the sun will rise to-morrow—it means not, as in former days, a contest between two highly trained armies, but a war of extinction, of devastation, between great armed nations whose populations are armed and trained to fight."

MR. MCREA, a farmer near Winnipeg, loves money more than he loves religion; at least, so it seems, for when he learned that his wife had given $10 toward building a Presbyterian church there, he tried to hang himself in the barn. Mrs. McRea cut him down, and then he jumped into the river. Mrs. McRea and a neighbor fished him out, and the church authorities voted to return the $10 and save further trouble.

"So the clergy are all down on Robert Elsmere!" exclaims Puck. "Discerning men! It is certainly far better that the lambs of the flock should pore over the society journals, where some careful collector of our friends' dirty linen holds it up with a chuckle and a leer for us to see—or the elevating columns of the great dailies, devoted week after week to accounts of women's underclothes and their kisses. 'Verily, we are growing hard up for subjects,' as the professor of anatomy said, when all he could find to dissect was the leg of a table."

THE New York Sun is proud of the fact that Pope Leo personally thanked Charles A. Dana for the good work of his paper. Alas! exclaims Liberty, that the idealist of the Brook Farm has sunk so low as to pride himself on the compliments of that king of impostors and human enslavers, the pope. What would his former fellow-dreamers and gentle reformers hav thought of the "good work" which now so pleases Pope Leo as to induce him to forgiv and forget Mr. Dana's youthful sins against the authority of the infallible church-state combination?

THE Sun thus rebukes Revivalist Harrison: "We regret to learn that Brother Harrison, the young revivalist now operating in this city, sometimes uses language in his sermons that devout people must consider irreverent or even blasphemous. Some of his remarks of last Sunday, for example, as reported in yesterday's Sun, must hav given a shock to those of his hearers who truly reverence the divine power. He should study the scriptures and follow their teachings in regard to the deity. He cannot find there any such phraseology or imagery as he indulges in at times. He boasts that four hundred sinners hav been converted in his revival campaign, and we are surprised that some one of them, after hearing him preach, has not asked him to follow the example of the king of Israel, who said: 'I will keep my mouth with a bridle.'"

LIBERTY, in the widest and best sense of the term, says Secular Thought, is little understood in this country. We boast that we are free people, and we best illustrate this freedom by imposing all sorts of restrictions upon our people. Moncure Conway, in one of his recent essays on this subject, alludes to the large number of amiable people who are full of ardor to fasten on their neighbors their private notion of personal conduct which does not concern them otherwise than sentimentally. The fanatic who aims to punish his neighbor for drinking a glass of wine, or for selling it, is really proceeding on the principle of the Inquisition. A man has as much right to punish his neighbor for his belief as for any conduct which does not specifically injure another. He may claim that drinking does injure others; but so said the inquisitor concerning heresy. It is not inconceivable that a salvation theocracy may yet punish all persons for not attending church, or neglecting to say their prayers. There is really no limit to the interference with the liberty of the individual on this continent, and it might as well be carried into the domain of religion as any other.

THE New York Herald says: "Speaking of an appeal to the Baltimore municipality for the suppression of a so-called Infidel Sunday-school, Cardinal Gibbons said in a sermon recently: 'For my part, I would be sorry to see the arm of the civil law used toward the suppression of this school. Coercion is not conversion. The only sword I would draw against the enemy of Christ is the sword of the spirit.' Did you say the Catholic church is not liberal, Dr. McGlynn?" Dr. McGlynn responds: "I should not be surprised to learn that some un-American, malevolent colleague of Cardinal Gibbons in the episcopate had already sent to Rome, with unfriendly comments, the fuller press report of the cardinal's utterances, in the hope of seriously impairing his standing in Rome by pointing out the discrepancy between his words and those of the ill-omened syllabus of Pius IX., in which all modern liberties of speech, of the press, and of conscience are denounced and proscribed. The cardinal's words are clearly at variance with the spirit and practice of the Inquisition for the last six hundred years, and from the point of view of an inquisitor would fairly warrant his being dragged before that tribunal for condemnation."

The Limitations of Toleration.

A DISCUSSION BETWEEN

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL,
HON. FREDERICK R. COUDERT, and
GOV. STEWART L. WOODFORD,

BEFORE

The Nineteenth Century Club of New York

Stenographically reported for The Truth Seeker by I. N. Baker.

The points for discussion, as submitted in advance, were the following propositions:

First. Thought is a necessary natural product—the result of what is called impressions made through the medium of the senses upon the brain, not forgetting the fact of heredity.

Second. No human being is accountable to any being—human or divine—for his thoughts.

Third. Human beings have a certain interest in the thoughts of each other, and one who undertakes to tell his thoughts should be honest.

Fourth. All have an equal right to express their thoughts upon all subjects.

Fifth. For one man to say to another, "I tolerate you," is an assumption of authority—not a disclaimer, but a waiver, of the right to persecute.

Sixth. Each man has the same right to express to the whole world his ideas, that the rest of the world have to express their thoughts to him.

THE PROCEEDINGS.

Courtlandt Palmer, Esq., President of the Club, in introducing Mr. Ingersoll, among other things said:

The inspiration of the orator of the evening seems to be that of the great Victor Hugo, who uttered the august saying, "There shall be no slavery of the mind."

When I was in Paris, about a year ago, I visited the tomb of Victor Hugo. It was placed in a recess in the crypt of the Pantheon. Opposite it was the tomb of Jean Jacques Rousseau. Near by, in another recess, was the memorial statue of Voltaire; and I felt, as I looked at these three monuments, that had Colonel Ingersoll been born in France, and had he passed in his long life account, the acclaim of the liberal culture of France would have enlarged that trio into a quartette.

Colonel Ingersoll has appeared in several important debates in print, notably with Judge Jeremiah S. Black, formerly Attorney-General of the United States; lately in the pages of The North American Review with the Rev. Dr. Henry M. Field, and last but not least the Right Hon. William E. Gladstone, England's greatest citizen, has taken up the cudgel against him in behalf of his view of Orthodoxy. To-night, I believe for the first time, the colonel has consented to appear in a colloquial discussion. I have now the honor to introduce this distinguished orator.

COLONEL INGERSOLL'S OPENING.

Ladies, Mr. President, and Gentlemen: I am here to-night for the purpose of defending your right to differ with me. I want to convince you that you are under no compulsion to accept my creed; that you are, so far as I am concerned, absolutely free to follow the torch of your reason according to your conscience; and I believe that you are civilized to that degree that you will extend to me the right that you claim for yourselves.

I admit, at the very threshold, that every human being thinks as he must; and the first proposition really is, whether man has the right to think. It will bear but little discussion, for the reason that no man can control his thought. If you think you can, what are you going to think to-morrow? What are you going to think next year? If you can absolutely control your thought, can you stop thinking?

The question is, Has the will any power over the thought? What is thought? It is the result of nature—of the outer world—first upon the senses—those impressions left upon the brain as pictures of things in the outward world, and these pictures are transformed into, or produce, thought; and as long as the doors of the senses are open, thoughts will be produced. Whoever looks at anything in nature, thinks. Whoever hears any sound—or any symphony—no matter what—thinks. Whoever looks upon the sea, or on a star, or on a flower, or on the face of a fellow-man, thinks, and the result of that look is an absolute necessity. The thought produced will depend upon your brain, upon your experience, upon the history of your life.

One who looks upon the sea, knowing that the one he loved the best had been devoured by its hungry waves, will have certain thoughts; and he who sees it for the first time, will have different thoughts. In other words, no two brains are alike; no two lives have been or are or ever will be the same. Consequently, nature cannot produce the same effect upon any two brains, or upon any two hearts.

The only reason why we wish to exchange thoughts is that we are different. If we were all the same, we would die dumb. No thought would be expressed after we found that our thoughts were precisely alike. We differ—our thoughts are different. Therefore the commerce that we call conversation.

Back of language is thought. Back of language is the desire to express our thought to another. This desire not only gave us language—this desire has given us the libraries of the world. And not only the libraries: this desire to express thought, to show to others the splendid children of the brain, has written every book, formed every language, painted every picture, and chiseled every statue—this desire to express our thought to others, to reap the harvest of the brain.

If, then, thought is a necessity, "it follows as the night the day" that there is, there can be, no responsibility for thought to any being, human or divine.

A camera contains a sensitive plate. The light flashes upon it, and the sensitive plate receives a picture. Is it in fault, is it responsible, for the picture? So with the brain. An image is left on it, a picture is imprinted there. The plate may not be perfectly level—it may be too concave, or too convex, and the picture may be a deformity; so with the brain. But the man does not make his own brain, and the consequence is, if the picture is distorted it is not the fault of the brain.

We take then these two steps: first, thought is a necessity; and second, the thought depends upon the brain.

Each brain is a kind of field where nature sows with careless hands the seeds of thought. Some brains are poor and barren fields, producing weeds and thorns, and some are like the tropic world where grow the palm and pine—children of the sun and soil.

You read Shakespeare. What do you get out of Shakespeare? All that your brain is able to hold. It depends upon your brain. If you are great—if you have been cultivated—if the wings of your imagination have been spread—if you have had great, free, and splendid thoughts—if you have stood upon the edge of things—if you have had the courage to meet all that can come—you get an immensity from Shakespeare. If you have lived nobly—if you have loved with every drop of your blood and every fiber of your being—if you have suffered—if you have enjoyed—then you get an immensity from Shakespeare. But if you have lived a poor, little, mean, wasted, barren, weedy life—you get very little from that immortal man.

So it is from every source in nature—what you get depends upon what you are.

Take then the second step. If thought is a necessity, there can be no responsibility for thought. And why has man ever believed that his fellow-man was responsible for his thought?

Everything that is, everything that has been, has been naturally produced. Man has acted as under the same circumstances we would have acted; because when you say "under the circumstances," it is the same as to say that you would do exactly as they have done.

There has always been in men the instinct of self-preservation. There was a time when men believed, and honestly believed, that there was above them a God. Sometimes they believed in many, but it will be sufficient for my illustration to say, one. Man believed that there was in the sky above him a God who attended to the affairs of men. He believed that that God, sitting upon his throne, rewarded virtue and punished vice. He believed also that that God held the community responsible for the sins of individuals. He honestly believed it. When the flood came, or when the earthquake devoured, he really believed that some God was filled with anger—with holy indignation—at his children. He believed it, and so he looked about among his neighbors to see who was in fault, and if there was any man who had failed to bring his sacrifice to the altar, had failed to kneel, it may be to the priest, failed to be present in the temple, or had given it as his opinion that the God of that tribe or of that nation was of no use, then, in order to placate the God, they seized the neighbor and sacrificed him on the altar of their ignorance and of their fear.

They believed when the lightning leaped from the cloud and left its blackened mark upon the man, that he had done something—that he had excited the wrath of the gods. And while man so believed—while he believed that it was necessary, in order to defend himself, to kill his neighbor—he acted simply according to the dictates of his nature.

What I claim is that we have now advanced far enough not only to think, but to know, that the conduct of man has nothing to do with the phenomena of nature. We are now advanced far enough to absolutely know that no man can be bad enough and no nation infamous enough to cause an earthquake. I think we have got to that point that we absolutely know that no man can be wicked enough to entice one of the bolts from heaven—that no man can be cruel enough to cause a drouth—and that you could not have Infidels enough on the earth to cause another flood. I think we have advanced far enough not only to say that, but to absolutely know it—I mean people who have thought, and in whose minds there is something like reasoning.

We know, if we know anything, that the lightning is just as apt to hit a good man as a bad man. We know it. We know that the earthquake is just as liable to swallow virtue as to swallow vice. And you know just as well as I do that a ship loaded with pirates is just as apt to outride the storm as one crowded with missionaries. You know it.

I am now speaking of the phenomena of nature. I believe, as much as I believe that I live, that the reason a thing is right is because it tends to the happiness of mankind. I believe, as much as I believe that I live, that on the average the good man is not only the happier man, but that no man is happy who is not good.

If then we have gotten over that frightful, that awful superstition—we are ready to enjoy hearing the thoughts of each other.

I do not say, neither do I intend to be understood as saying, that there is no God. All I intend to say is, that so far as we can see, no man is punished, no nation is punished by lightning, or famine, or storm. Everything happens to the one as to the other.

Now let us admit that there is an infinite God. That has nothing to do with the sinlessness of thought—nothing to do with the fact that no man is accountable to any being, human or divine, for what he thinks. And let me tell you why.

If there be an infinite God, leave him to deal with men who sin against him. You can trust him, if you believe in him. He has the power. He has a heaven full of bolts. Trust him. And now that you are satisfied that the earthquake will not swallow you, nor the lightning strike you, simply because you tell your thoughts, if one of your neighbors differs with you, and acts improperly or thinks or speaks improperly of your God, leave him with your God—he can attend to him a thousand times better than you can. He has the time. He lives from eternity to eternity. More than that, he has the means. So that, whether there be this Being or not, you have no right to interfere with your neighbor.

The next proposition is, that I have the same right to express my thought to the whole world, that the whole world has to express its thought to me.

I believe that this realm of thought is not a democracy, where the majority rule: it is not a republic. It is a country with one inhabitant. This brain is the world in which my mind lives, and my mind is the sovereign of that realm. We are all kings, and one man balances the rest of the world as one drop of water balances the sea. Each soul is crowned. Each soul wears the purple and the tiara; and only those are good citizens of the intellectual world who give to every other human being every right that they claim for themselves, and only those are traitors in the great realm of thought who abandon reason and appeal to force.

If now I have got out of your minds the idea that you have to abuse your neighbors to keep on good terms with God, then the question of religion is exactly like every question—I mean of thought, of mind—I have nothing to say now about action.

Is there authority in the world of art? Can a legislature pass a law that a certain picture is beautiful, and can it pass a law putting in the penitentiary any impudent artistic wretch who says that to him it is not beautiful? Precisely the same with music. Our ears are not all the same; we are not touched by the same sounds—the same beautiful memories do not arise. Suppose you have an authority in music? You may make men, it may be, by offering them office or by threatening them with punishment, swear that they all like that tune—but you never will know till the day of your death whether they do or not! The moment you introduce a despotism in the world of thought, you succeed in making hypocrites—and you get in such a position that you never know what your neighbor thinks.

So in the great realm of religion, there can be no force. No one can be compelled to pray. No matter how you tie him down, or crush him down on his face or on his knees, it is above the power of the human race to put in that man, by force, the spirit of prayer. You cannot do it. Neither can you compel anybody to worship a God. Worship rises from the heart like perfume from a flower. It cannot obey; it cannot do that which some one else commands. It must be absolutely true to the law of its own nature. And do you think any God would be satisfied with compulsory worship? Would he like to see long rows of poor, ignorant slaves on their terrified knees repeating words without a soul—giving him what you might call the shucks of sound? Will any God be satisfied with that? And so I say, we must be as free in one department of thought as another.

Now I take the next step, and that is, that the rights of all are absolutely equal.

I have the same right to give you my opinion that you have to give me yours. I have no right to compel you to hear, if you do not want to. I have no right to compel you to speak if you do not want to. If you do not wish to know my thought, I have no right to force it upon you.

The next thing is, that this liberty of thought, this liberty of expression, is of more value than any other thing beneath the stars. Of more value than any religion, of more value than any government, of more value than all the constitutions that man has written and all the laws that he has passed, is this liberty—the absolute liberty of the human mind. Take away that word from language, and all other words become meaningless sounds, and there is then no reason for a man being and living upon the earth.

So then, I am simply in favor of intellectual hospitality—that is all. You come to me with a new idea. I invite you into the house. Let us see what you have. Let us talk it over. If I do not like your thought, I will bid it a polite "good day." If I do like it, I will say: "Sit down; stay with me, and become a part of the intellectual wealth of my world." That is all.

And how any human being ever has had the impudence to speak against the right to speak is beyond the power of my imagination. Here is a man who speaks—who exercises a right that he, by his speech, denies. Can liberty go further than that? Is there any toleration possible beyond the liberty to speak against liberty—the real believer in free speech allowing others to speak against the right to speak? Is there any limitation beyond that?

So, whoever has spoken against the right to speak has admitted that he violated his own doctrine. No man can open his mouth against the freedom of speech without denying every argument he may put forward. Why? He is exercising the right that he denies. How did he get it? Suppose there is one man on an island. You will all admit now that he would have the right to do his own thinking. You will all admit that he has the right to express his thought. Now will somebody tell me how many men would have to immigrate to that island before the original settler would lose his right to think and his right to express himself?

If there be an infinite Being—and it is a question that I know nothing about—you would be perfectly astonished to know how little I do know on that subject, and yet I know as much as the aggregated world knows, and as little as the smallest insect that ever fanned with happy wings the summer air—if there be such a Being, I have the same right to think that he has, simply because it is a necessity of my nature—because I cannot help it. And the Infinite would be just as responsible to the smallest intelligence living in the infinite spaces—he would be just as responsible to that intelligence as that intelligence can be to him, provided that intelligence thinks as a necessity of his nature.

There is another phrase to which I object—"toleration." "The limits of toleration." Why say "toleration?" I will tell you why. When the thinkers were in the minority—when the philosophers were vagabonds—when the men with brains furnished fuel for bonfires—when the majority were ignorantly orthodox—when they hated the heretic as a last year's leaf hates a this year's bud—in that delightful time these poor people in the minority had to say to ignorant power, to conscientious rascality, to cruelty born of universal love: "Don't kill us: don't be so arrogantly meek as to burn us; tolerate us." At that time the minority was too small to talk about rights, and the great big ignorant majority when tired of shedding blood, said: "Well, we will tolerate you; we can afford to wait; you will not live long, and when the Being of infinite compassion gets hold of you we will glut our revenge through an eternity of joy; we will ask you every now and then, 'What is your opinion now?'"

Both feeling absolutely sure that infinite goodness would have his revenge, they "tolerated" these thinkers, and that word finally took the place almost of liberty. But I do not like it. When you say "I tolerate," you do not say you have no right to punish, no right to persecute. It is only a disclaimer for a few moments and for a few years, but you retain the right. I deny it.

And let me say here to-night—it is your experience, it is mine—that the bigger a man is the more charitable he is; you know it. The more brain he has, the more excuses he finds for all the world; you know it. And if there be in heaven an infinite Being, he must be grander than any man; he must have a thousand times more charity than the human heart can hold, and is it possible that he is going to hold his ignorant children responsible for the impressions made by nature upon their brain? Let us have some sense.

There is another side to this question, and that is with regard to the freedom of thought and expression in matters pertaining to this world.

No man has a right to hurt the character of a neighbor. He has no right to utter slander. He has no right to bear false witness. He has no right to be actuated by any motive except for the general good—but the things he does here to his neighbor—these are easily defined and easily punished. All that I object to is setting up a standard of authority in the world of art, the world of beauty, the world of poetry, the world of worship, the world of religion, and the world of metaphysics. That is what I object to; and if the old doctrines had been carried out, every human being that has benefited this world would have been destroyed. If the people who believe that a certain belief is necessary to insure salvation had had control of this world, we would have been as ignorant to-night as wild beasts. Every step in advance has been made in spite of them. There has not been a book of any value printed since the invention of that art—and when I say "of value," I mean that contained new and splendid truths—that was not anathematized by the gentlemen who believed that man is responsible for his thought. Every step has been taken in spite of that doctrine.

Consequently I simply believe in absolute liberty of mind. And I have no fear about any other world—not the slightest. When I get there, I will give my honest opinion of that country; I will give my honest thought there; and if for that I lose my soul, I will keep at least my self-respect.

A man tells me a story. I believe it, or disbelieve it. I cannot help it. I read a story—no matter whether in the original Hebrew, or whether it has been translated. I believe it or I disbelieve it. No matter whether it is written in a very solemn or a very flippant manner—I have my idea about its truth. And I insist that each man has the right to judge that for himself, and for that reason, as I have already said, I am defending your right to differ with me—that is all. And if you do differ with me, all that proves is that I do not agree with you. There is no man that lives to-night beneath the stars—there is no being—that can force my soul upon its knees, unless the reason is given. I will be no slave. I do not care how big my master is, I am just as small, if a slave, as though the master were small. It is not the greatness of the master that can honor the slave. In other words, I am going to act according to my right, as I understand it, without interfering with any other human being.

And now, if you think—any of you, that you can control your thought, I want you to try it. There is not one here who can by any possibility think, only as he must.

You remember the story of the Methodist minister who insisted that he could control his thoughts. A man said to him, "Nobody can control his own mind." "Oh, yes, he can," the preacher replied. "My dear sir," said the man, "you cannot even say the Lord's Prayer without thinking of something else." "Oh, yes, I can." "Well, if you will do it, I will give you that horse, the best riding horse in this county." "Well, who is to judge?" said the preacher. "I will take your own word for it, and if you say the Lord's Prayer through without thinking of anything else, I will give you that horse." So the minister shut his eyes and began: "Our father who art in heaven, hallowed be thy name; thy kingdom come, thy will be done——" "I suppose you will throw in the saddle and bridle?"

I say to you to-night, ladies and gentlemen, that I feel more interest in the freedom of thought and speech than in all other questions, knowing, as I do, that it is the condition of great and splendid progress for the race; remembering, as I do, that the opposite idea has covered the cheek of the world with tears; remembering, and knowing, as I do, that the enemies of free thought and free speech have covered this world with blood. These men have filled the heavens with an infinite monster; they have filled the future with fire and flame, and they have made the present, when they have had the power, a perdition. These men, these doctrines, have carried fagots to the feet of philosophy. These men, these doctrines, have hated to see the dawn of an intellectual day. These men, these doctrines, have denied every science, and denounced and killed every philosopher they could lay their bloody, cruel, ignorant hands upon.

And for that reason, I am for absolute liberty of thought, everywhere, in every department, domain, and realm of the human mind.

PRESIDENT PALMER.

In the very amusing sketch of "Father Tom and The Pope," Father Tom is represented as saying that "every sensible man is a man who judges by his senses; but we all know that these seven senses are seven deluders, and that if we want to know anything about mysteries, we call in the eighth sense—the only sense to be depended upon—which is the sense of the Church."

Mr. Kernan was to have attended to-night, to give us "the sense of the Church"—the Roman Catholic—but he, unfortunately, has been forced to go to Chicago. Mr. Coudert, however, who is one of the few men I know who could take his place in such an emergency, has kindly consented to appear.

REMARKS OF MR. COUDERT.

Ladies and Gentlemen and Mr. President: It is not only "the sense of the Church" that I am lacking now, I am afraid it is any sense at all; and I am only wondering how a reasonably intelligent human being—meaning myself—could in view of the misfortune that befell Mr. Kernan, have undertaken to speak to-night.

This is a new experience. I have never sang in any of Verdi's operas—I have never listened to one through—but I think I would prefer to try all three of these performances rather than go on with this duty which in a vain moment of deluded vanity I heedlessly undertook.

I am in a new field here. I feel very much like the master of a ship who thinks that he can safely guide his bark. (I am not alluding to the traditional bark of St. Peter, in which I hope that I am and will always be, but the ordinary bark that requires a compass and a rudder and a guide.) And I find that all these ordinary things, which we generally take for granted, and which are as necessary to our safety as the air which we breathe, or the sunshine that we enjoy, have been quietly, pleasantly, and smilingly thrown overboard by the gentleman who has just preceded me.

Carlyle once said—and the thought came to me as the gentleman was speaking—"A Comic History of England!"—for some wretch had just written such a book—(talk of free thought and free speech when men do such things!)—

"A Comic History of England! The next thing we shall hear of will be A Comic History of the Bible!" I think we have heard the first chapter of that comic history to-night; and the only comfort that I have—and possibly some other antiquated and superannuated persons of either sex, if such there be within my hearing—is that such things as have seemed to me charmingly to partake of the order of blasphemy, have been uttered with such charming bonhomie, and received with such enthusiastic admiration, that I have wondered whether we are in a Christian audience of the Nineteenth Century, or in a possible Ingersollian audience of the Twenty-third.

And let me first, before I enter upon the very few and desultory remarks which are the only ones that I can make now and with which I may claim your polite attention—let me say a word about the comparison with which your worthy President opened these proceedings.

There are two or three things upon which I am a little sensitive: One, aspersions upon the land of my birth—the city of New York; the next, the land of my fathers; and the next, the bark that I was just speaking of.

Now your worthy President, in his well-meant efforts to exhibit in the best possible style the new actor upon his stage, said that he had seen Victor Hugo's remains, and Voltaire's and Jean Jacques Rousseau's, and that he thought the niche might well be filled by Colonel Ingersoll. If that had been merely the expression of a natural desire to see him speedily annihilated, I might perhaps in the interests of the Christian community have thought, but not said, "Amen!" (Here you will at once observe the distinction I make between free thought and free speech!)

I do not think, and I beg that none of you, and particularly the eloquent rhetorician who preceded me, will think, that in anything I may say I intend any personal discourtesy, for I do believe to some extent in freedom of speech upon a platform like this. Such a debate as this rises entirely above and beyond the plane of personalities.

I suppose that your President intended to compare Colonel Ingersoll to Voltaire, to Hugo and to Rousseau. I have no retainer from either of those gentlemen, but for the reason that I just gave you, I wish to defend their memory from what I consider a great wrong. And so I do not think—with all respect to the eloquent and learned gentleman—that he is entitled to a place in that niche. Voltaire did many wrong things. He did them for many reasons, and chiefly because he was human. But Voltaire did a great deal to build up. Leaving aside his noble tragedies, which charmed and delighted his audiences, and dignified the stage, throughout his work was some effort to ameliorate the condition of the human race. He fought against torture; he fought against persecution; he fought against bigotry; he clamored and wrote against littleness and fanaticism in every way, and he was not ashamed when he entered upon his domains at Fernay, to erect a church to the God of whom the most our friend can say is, "I do not know whether he exists or not."

Rousseau did many noble things, but he was a madman, and in our day would probably have been locked up in an asylum and treated by intelligent doctors. His works, however, bear the impress of a religious education, and if there be in his works or sayings anything to parallel what we have heard to-night—whether a parody on divine revelation, or a parody upon the prayer of prayers—I have not seen it.

Victor Hugo has enriched the literature of his day with prose and poetry that have made him the Shakespeare of the Nineteenth Century—poems as deeply imbued with a devout sense of responsibility to the Almighty as the writings of an archbishop or a cardinal. He has left the traces of his beneficent action all over the literature of his day, of his country, and of his race.

All these men, then, have built up something. Will anyone, the most ardent admirer of Colonel Ingersoll, tell me what he has built up?

To go now to the argument. The learned gentleman says that freedom of thought is a grand thing. Unfortunately, freedom of thought exists. What one of us would not put manacles and fetters upon his thoughts, if he only could? What persecution have any of us suffered to compare with the involuntary recurrence of these demons that enter our brain—that bring back past events that we would wipe out with our tears, or even with our blood—and make us slaves of a power unseen but uncontrollable and uncontrolled? Is it not unworthy of so eloquent and intelligent a man to preach before you here to-night that thought must always be free?

When in the history of the world has thought ever been fettered? If there be a page in history upon which such an absurdity is written, I have failed to find it.

Thought is beyond the domain of man. The most cruel and arbitrary ruler can no more penetrate into your bosom and mine and extract the inner workings of our brain, than he can scale the stars or pull down the sun from its seat. Thought must be free. Thought is unseen, unhandled and untouched, and no despot has yet been able to reach it, except when the thoughts burst into words. And therefore, may we not consider now, and say, that liberty of word is what he wants, and not liberty of thought, which no one has ever gainsaid, or disputed?

Liberty of speech!—and the gentleman generously tells us, "Why, I only ask for myself what I would cheerfully extend to you. I wish you to be free; and you can even entertain those old delusions which your mothers taught, and look with envious admiration upon me while I scale the giddy hights of Olympus, gather the honey and approach the stars and tell you how pure the air is in those upper regions which you are unable to reach."

Thanks for his kindness! But I think that it is one thing for us to extend to him that liberty that he asks for—the liberty to destroy—and another thing for him to give us the liberty which we claim—the liberty to conserve.

Oh, destruction is so easy, destruction is so pleasant! It marks the footsteps all through our life. The baby begins by destroying his bib; the older child by destroying his horse, and when the man is grown up he joins the regiment with the latent instinct that when he gets a chance he will destroy human life.

This building cost many thousand days' work. It was planned by more or less skilful architects (ignorant of ventilation, but well-meaning). Men lavished their thought, and men lavished their sweat for a pittance, upon this building. It took months and possibly years to build it and to adorn it and to beautify it. And yet, as it stands complete to-night with all of you here in the vigor of your life and in the enjoyment of such entertainment as you may get here this evening, I will find a dozen men who with a few pounds of dynamite will reduce it and all of us to instant destruction.

The dynamite man may say to me, "I give you full liberty to build and occupy and insure, if you will give me liberty to blow up." Is that a fair bargain? Am I bound in conscience and in good sense to accept it? Liberty of speech! Tell me where liberty of speech has ever existed. There have been free societies. England was a free country. France has struggled through crisis after crisis to obtain liberty of speech. We think we have liberty of speech, as we understand it, and yet who would undertake to say that our society could live with liberty of speech? We have gone through many crises in our short history, and we know that thought is nothing before the law, but the word is an act—as guilty at times as the act of killing, or burglary, or any of the violent crimes that disgrace humanity and require the police.

A word is an act—an act of the tongue; and why should my tongue go unpunished, and I who wield it mercilessly toward those who are weaker than I, escape, if my arm is to be punished when I use it tyrannously? Whom would you punish for the murder of Desdemona—is it Iago, or Othello? Who was the villain, who was the criminal, who deserved the scaffold—who but free speech? Iago exercised free speech. He poisoned the ear of Othello and nerved his arm and Othello was the murderer—but Iago went scot free. That was a word.

"Oh," says the counsel, "but that does not apply to individuals; be tender and charitable to individuals." Tender and charitable to men if they endeavor to destroy all that you love and venerate and respect!

Are you tender and charitable to me if you enter my house, my castle, and debauch my children from the faith that they have been taught? Are you tender and charitable to them and to me when you teach them that I have instructed them in falsehood, that their mother has rocked them in blasphemy, and that they are now among the fools and the witlings of the world because they believe in my precepts? Is that the charity that you speak of? Heaven forbid that liberty of speech such as that should ever invade my home or yours!

We all understand, and the learned gentleman will admit, that his discourse is but an eloquent apology for blasphemy. And when I say this, I beg you to believe me incapable of resorting to the cheap artifice of strong words to give point to a pointless argument, or to offend a courteous adversary. I think if I put it to him he would, with characteristic candor, say, "Yes, that is what I claim—the liberty to blaspheme; the world has outgrown these things; and I claim to-day, as I claimed a few months ago in the neighboring gallant little state of New Jersey, that while you cannot slander man, your tongue is free to revile and insult man's maker." New Jersey was behind in the race for progress, and did not accept his argument. His unfortunate client was convicted and had to pay the fine which the press—which is seldom mistaken—says came from the pocket of his generous counsel.

The argument was a strong one; the argument was brilliant, and was able; and I say now, with all my predilections for the church of my fathers, and for your church (because it is not a question of our differences, but it is a question whether the tree shall be torn up by the roots, not what branches may bear richer fruit or deserve to be lopped off)—I say, why has every Christian state passed these statutes against blasphemy? Turning into ridicule sacred things—firing off the Lord's Prayer as you would a joke from Joe Miller or a comic poem—that is what I mean by blasphemy. If there is any other or better definition, give it me, and I will use it.

Now understand. All these states of ours care not one fig what our religion is. Behave yourselves properly, obey the laws, do not require the intervention of the police, and the majesty of your conscience will be as exalted as the sun. But the wisest men and the best men—possibly not so eloquent as the orator, but I may say it without offence to him—other names that shine brightly in the galaxy of our best men, have insisted and maintained that the Christian faith was the ligament that kept our modern society together, and our laws have said, and the laws of most of our states say, to this day, "Think what you like, but do not, like Samson, pull the pillars down upon us all."

If I had anything to say, ladies and gentlemen, it is time that I should say it now. My exordium has been very long, but it was no longer than the dignity of the subject, perhaps, demanded.

Free speech we all have. Absolute liberty of speech we never had. Did we have it before the war? Many of us here remember that if you crossed an imaginary line and went among some of the noblest and best men that ever adorned this continent, one word against slavery meant death. And if you say that that was the influence of slavery, I will carry you to Boston, that city which numbers within its walls as many intelligent people to the acre as any city on the globe—was it different there? Why, the fugitive, beaten, blood-stained slave, when he got there, was seized and turned back; and when a few good and brave men, in defence of free speech, undertook to defend the slave and to try and give him liberty, they were mobbed and pelted and driven through the city. You may say, "That proves there was no liberty of speech." No; it proves this: that wherever, and wheresoever, and whenever, liberty of speech is incompatible with the safety of the state, liberty of speech must fall back and give way, in order that the state may be preserved.

First, above everything, above all things, the safety of the people is the supreme law. And if rhetoricians, anxious to tear down, anxious to pluck the faith from the young ones who are unable to defend it, come forward with nickel-plated platitudes and commonplaces clothed in second-hand purple and tinsel, and try to tear down the temple, then it is time, I shall not say for good men—for I know so few they make a small battalion—but for good women, to come to the rescue.

PRESIDENT PALMER.

In what I said, ladies and gentlemen, I tried to sink my personality. I did not say, in introducing Colonel Ingersoll, that in case he had been born in France, and in case he had passed away, I thought that a fourth niche should be prepared for him with the three worthies I mentioned; but that I thought the acclaim of the liberal culture of France—the same free thought that had erected these monuments, would have erected a fourth for Colonel Ingersoll had he lived among them. But perhaps even in saying that I was led away from the impartiality I desired to show, in my admiration and love for the man.

I now have the honor to introduce to you that accomplished gentleman and scholar, my friend, our neighbor from the goodly city of Brooklyn, General Stewart L. Woodford.

GENERAL WOODFORD'S SPEECH.

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen: At this late hour I could not attempt—even if I would—the eloquence of my friend Colonel Ingersoll; nor the wit and rapier-like sarcasm of my other valued friend Mr. Coudert. But there are some things so serious about this subject that we discuss to-night, that I crave your pardon if, without preface, and without rhetoric, I get at once to what from my Protestant standpoint seems the fatal logical error of Mr. Ingersoll's position.

Mr. Ingersoll starts with the statement—and that I may not, for I could not, do him injustice, nor myself injustice, in the quotation, I will give it as he stated it—he starts with this statement: that thought is a necessary natural product, the result of what we call impressions made through the medium of the senses upon the brain.

Do you think that is thought? Now stop—turn right into your own minds—is that thought? Does not will power take hold? Does not reason take hold? Does not memory take hold, and is not thought the action of the brain based upon the impression and assisted or directed by manifold and varying influences?

Secondly, our friend Mr. Ingersoll says that no human being is accountable to any being, human or divine, for his thought.

He starts with the assumption that thought is the inevitable impression burnt upon the mind at once, and then jumps to the conclusion that there is no responsibility. Now is not that a fair logical analysis of what he has said?

My senses leave upon my mind an impression, and then my mind, out of that impression, works good or evil. The glass of brandy, being presented to my physical sense, inspires thirst—inspires the thought of thirst—inspires the instinct of debauchery. Am I not accountable for the result of the mind given me, whether I yield to the debauch, or rise to the dignity of self-control?

Every thing, of sense, leaves its impression upon the mind. If there be no responsibility anywhere, then is this world blind chance. If there be no responsibility anywhere, then my friend deserves no credit if he be guiding you in the path of truth, and I deserve no censure if I be carrying you back into the path of superstition. Why, admit for a moment that a man has no control over his thought, and you destroy absolutely the power of regenerating the world, the power of improving the world. The world swings one way, or it swings the other. If it be true that in all these ages we have come nearer and nearer to a perfect liberty, that is true simply and alone because the mind of man through reason, through memory, through a thousand inspirations and desires and hopes, has ever tended toward better results and higher achievements.

No accountability? I speak not for my friend, but I recognize that I am accountable to myself; I recognize that whether I rise or fall, that whether my life goes upward or downward, I am responsible to myself. And so, in spite of all sophistry, so in spite of all dream, so in spite of all eloquence, each woman, each man within this audience is responsible—first of all to herself and himself—whether when bad thoughts, when passion, when murder, when evil come into the heart or brain he harbors them there or he casts them out.

I am responsible further—I am responsible to my neighbor. I know that I am my neighbor's keeper. I know that as I touch your life, as you touch mine, I am responsible every moment, every hour, every day, for my influence upon you. I am either helping you up, or I am dragging you down; you are either helping me up or you are dragging me down—and you know it. Sophistry cannot get away from this; eloquence cannot seduce us from it. You know that if you look back through the record of your life, there are lives that you have helped and lives that you have hurt. You know that there are lives on the downward plane that went down because in an evil hour you pushed them; you know, perhaps with blessing, lives that have gone up because you have reached out to them a helping hand. That responsibility for your neighbor is a responsibility and an accountability that you and I cannot avoid or evade.

I believe one thing further: that because there is a creation there is a Creator. I believe that because there is force, there is a Projector of force; because there is matter, there is spirit. I reverently believe these things. I am not angry with my neighbor because he does not; it may be that he is right, that I am wrong; but if there be a Power that sent me into this world, so far as that Power has given me wrong direction, or permitted wrong direction, that Power will judge me justly. So far as I disregard the light that I have, whatever it may be—whether it be light of reason, light of conscience, light of history—so far as I do that which my judgment tells me is wrong, I am responsible and I am accountable.

Now the Protestant theory, as I understand it, is simply this: It would vary from the theory as taught by the mother church—it certainly swings far away from the theory as suggested by my friend—I understand the Protestant theory to be this: That every man is responsible to himself, to his neighbor, and to his God, for his thought. Not for the first impression—but for that impression, for that direction and result which he intelligently gives to the first impression or deduces from it. I understand that the Protestant idea is this: that man may think—we know he will think—for himself; but that he is responsible for it. That a man may speak his thought, so long as he does not hurt his neighbor. He must use his own liberty so that he shall not injure the well-being of any other one—so that when using this liberty, when exercising this freedom, he is accountable at the last to his God. And so Protestantism sends me into the world with this terrible and solemn responsibility.

It leaves Mr. Ingersoll free to speak his thought at the bar of his conscience, before the bar of his fellow-man, but it holds him in the inevitable grip of absolute responsibility for every light word idly spoken. God grant that he may use that power so that he can face that responsibility at the last!

It leaves to every churchman liberty to believe and stand by his church according to his own conviction. It stands for this: the absolute liberty to each individual man to think, to write, to speak, to act, according to the best light within him; limited as to his fellows, by the condition that he shall not use that liberty so as to injure them; limited in the other direction, by those tremendous laws which are laws in spite of all rhetoric, and in spite of all logic.

If I put my finger into the fire, that fire burns. If I do a wrong, that wrong remains. If I hurt my neighbor, the wrong reacts upon myself. If I would try to escape what you call judgment, what you call penalty, I cannot escape the working of the inevitable law that follows a cause by an effect; I cannot escape that inevitable law—not the creation of some dark monster flashing through the skies—but, as I believe, the beneficent creation which puts into the spiritual life the same control of law that guides the material life, which wisely makes me responsible, that in the solemnity of that responsibility I am bound to lift my brother up and never to drag my brother down.

REPLY OF COLONEL INGERSOLL.

The first gentleman who replied to me took the ground boldly that expression is not free—that no man has the right to express his real thoughts—and I suppose that he acted in accordance with that idea. How are you to know whether he thought a solitary thing that he said, or not? How is it possible for us to ascertain whether he is simply the mouthpiece of some other? Whether he is a free man, or whether he says that which he does not believe, it is impossible for us to ascertain.

He tells you that I am about to take away the religion of your mothers. I have heard that said a great many times. No doubt Mr. Coudert has the religion of his mother, and judging from the argument he made, his mother knew at least as much about these questions as her son. I believe that every good father and good mother wants to see the son and the daughter climb higher upon the great and splendid mount of thought than they reached. You never can honor your father by going around swearing to his mistakes. You never can honor your mother by saying that ignorance is blessed because she did not know everything. I want to honor my parents by finding out more than they did.

There is another thing that I was a little astonished at—that Mr. Coudert, knowing that he would be in eternal felicity with his harp in his hand seeing me in the world of the damned, could yet grow envious here to-night at my imaginary monument.

And he tells you—this Catholic—that Voltaire was an exceedingly good Christian compared with me. Do you know I am glad that I have compelled a Catholic—one who does not believe he has the right to express his honest thoughts—to pay a compliment to Voltaire simply because he thought it was at my expense?

I have an almost infinite admiration for Voltaire; and when I hear that name pronounced, I think of a plume floating over a mailed knight—I think of a man that rode to the beleaguered City of Catholicism and demanded a surrender—I think of a great man who thrust the dagger of assassination into your Mother Church, and from that wound she never will recover.

One word more. This gentleman says that children are destructive—that the first thing they do is to destroy their bibs. The gentleman, I should think from his talk, has preserved his!

They talk about blasphemy. What is blasphemy? Let us be honest with each other. Whoever lives upon the unpaid labor of others is a blasphemer. Whoever slanders, maligns, and betrays is a blasphemer. Whoever denies to others the rights that he claims for himself is a blasphemer.

Who is a worshiper? One who makes a happy home—one who fills the lives of wife and children with sunlight—one who has a heart where the flowers of kindness burst into blossom and fill the air with perfume—the man who sits beside his wife, prematurely old and wasted, and holds her thin hands in his and kisses them as passionately and loves her as truly and as rapturously as when she was a bride—he is a worshiper—that is worship.

And the gentleman brought forward as a reason why we should not have free speech, that only a few years ago some of the best men in the world, if you said a word in favor of liberty, would shoot you down. What an argument was that! They were not good men. They were the whippers of women and the stealers of babes—robbers of the trundle-bed—assassins of human liberty. They knew no better, but I do not propose to follow the example of a barbarian because he was honestly a barbarian.

So much for debauching his family by telling them that his precepts are false. If he has taught them as he has taught us to-night, he has debauched their minds. I would be honest at the cradle. I would not tell a child anything as a certainty that I did not know. I would be absolutely honest.

But he says that thought is absolutely free—nobody can control thought. Let me tell him: Superstition is the jailer of the mind. You can so stuff a child with superstition that its poor little brain is a bastile and its poor little soul a convict. Fear is the jailer of the mind, and superstition is the assassin of liberty.

So when anybody goes into his family and tells these great and shining truths, instead of debauching his children they will kill the snakes that crawl in their cradles. Let us be honest and free.

And now, coming to the second gentleman. He is a Protestant. The Catholic church says: "Don't think; pay your fare; this is a through ticket, and we will look out for your baggage." The Protestant church says: "Read that bible for yourselves; think for yourselves; but if you do not come to a right conclusion you will be eternally damned." Any sensible man will say, "Then I won't read it—I'll believe it without reading it." And that is the only way you can be sure you will believe it: don't read it.

Governor Woodford says that we are responsible for our thoughts. Why? Could you help thinking as you did on this subject? No. Could you help believing the Bible? I suppose not. Could you help believing that story of Jonah? Certainly not—it looks reasonable in Brooklyn.

I stated that thought was the result of the impressions of nature upon the mind through the medium of the senses. He says you cannot have thought without memory. How did you get the first one?

Of course I intended to be understood—and the language is clear—that there could be no thought except through the impressions made upon the brain by nature through the avenues called the senses. Take away the senses, how would you think then? If you thought at all, I think you would agree with Mr. Coudert.

Now I admit—so we need never have a contradiction about it—I admit that every human being is responsible to the person he injures. If he injures any man, woman, or child, or any dog, or the lowest animal that crawls, he is responsible to that animal, to that being—in other words, he is responsible to any being that he has injured.

But you cannot injure an infinite Being, if there be one. I will tell you why. You cannot help him, and you cannot hurt him. If there be an infinite Being, he is conditionless—he does not want anything—he has it. You cannot help anybody that does not want something—you cannot help him. You cannot hurt anybody unless he is a conditioned being and you change his condition so as to inflict a harm. But if God be conditionless, you cannot hurt him, and you cannot help him. So do not trouble yourselves about the Infinite. All our duties lie within reach—all our duties are right here; and my religion is simply this:

First. Give to every other human being every right that you claim for yourself.

Second. If you tell your thought at all, tell your honest thought. Do not be a parrot—do not be an instrumentality for an organization. Tell your own thought, honor bright, what you think.

My next idea is, that the only possible good in the universe is happiness. The time to be happy is now. The place to be happy is here. The way to be happy is to try and make somebody else so.

My good friend General Woodford—and he is a good man telling the best he knows—says that I will be accountable at the bar up yonder. I am ready to settle that account now, and expect to be, every moment of my life—and when that settlement comes, if it does come, I do not believe that a solitary being can rise and say that I ever injured him or her.

But no matter what they say. Let me tell you a story, how we will settle if we do get there.

You remember the story told about the Mexican who believed that his country was the only one in the world, and said so. The priest told him that there was another country where a man lived who was eleven or twelve feet high, that made the whole world, and if he denied it, when that man got hold of him he would not leave a whole bone in his body. But he denied it. He was one of those men who would not believe further than his vision extended.

So one day in his boat he was rocking away when the wind suddenly arose and he was blown out of sight of his home. After several days he was blown so far that he saw the shores of another country. Then he said, "My Lord; I am gone! I have been swearing all my life that there was no other country, and here it is!" So he did his best—paddled with what little strength he had left, reached the shore, and got out of his boat. Sure enough, there came down a man to meet him about twelve feet high. The poor little wretch was frightened almost to death, so he said to the tall man as he saw him coming down, "Mister, whoever you are, I denied your existence—I did not believe you lived; I swore there was no such country as this; but I see I was mistaken, and I am gone. You are going to kill me, and the quicker you do it the better and get me out of my misery. Do it now!'

The great man just looked at the little fellow, and said nothing, till he asked, "What are you going to do with me, because over in that other country I denied your existence?" "What am I going to do with you?" said the supposed god. "Now that you have got here, if you behave yourself I am going to treat you well."

Subsequent to Mr. Foote.

From the London Freethinker.

"Was Jesus Insane?" By L. K. Washburn. Truth Seeker Company, New York. Mr. C. B. Reynolds was prosecuted for some blasphemy, much of which was borrowed from Mr. Foote, yet vigorously defended by Colonel Ingersoll; and now Mr. Washburn, another American lecturer, takes the title of one of Mr. Foote's old pamphlets. He does not go into the subject of the insanity of Jesus so thoroughly as Mr. Foote did, but he says enough, in his usual bright style, to make out a very good case.

A Funeral Address.

[Mary Fiske, over whose remains the following funeral address was spoken by Colonel Ingersoll, was one of the characters of New York city. Her life was essentially Bohemian. Her direct associations were with the stage and its people. Through this association and her work upon dramatic papers, and the plays she wrote, she was as well known as the leading actors. She was born February 13, 1837, and died February 4, 1889. Her life, says one who knew her, was a story of good-fellowship, thoughtlessness, impulsiveness, and generosity. Her career was all romance. She was a genius. No writer for the press was ever better known to the theatrical profession, and in her the army of men and women upon the stage who mimic and exaggerate life always had an advocate. She had lived with them, fasted and feasted with them, sang and danced with them, wrote plays for them, and defended them with voice and pen. Of late she was best known as the author of "Philip Herne," one of the most successful of recent plays, and as a staff writer on the Dramatic Mirror. Harrison Grey Fiske, the editor of the Mirror, who knew her through and through, says: "She was thoroughly original, and so she studied men more than books. She had a superb contempt for those crutches and slavish devices wherewith less self-reliant and splendidly equipped writers seek to hobble along the dusty highway of journalism. There was in her character an imperious disregard for conventional methods. Winged with her own genius she flew fearlessly to dizzy hights while patient plodders toiled in the valleys below. Her practical knowledge ran the whole gamut of mankind. With equal facility and truth she depicted every stratum of life. Whether it was a play or a prize-fight; a scene in the city's noisome slums or an unsullied page straight from the book of nature; a comic incident behind the scenes or a pathetic one in a churchyard, that commanded her attention, she was always graphic, analytical, and adequate. She numbered among her hundreds of acquaintances all sorts and conditions of men—great and humble, rich and poor, good and evil. Her sympathies were universal. The unfortunate and downtrodden could always claim her pity and her help. She was blind to nothing on earth but the faults of her friends. Her humor was irresistible. Her pathos was as sweet and tender as her humor was spontaneous and infectious. She was able, when she wished, to put more genuine tears into type than any press writer with whose work I am familiar. Her touch was dextrous, delicate, and highly artistic in its power of suggestion. And there are some of her printed articles that bear evidence of a poetical feeling, a wealth of imagery and rhythmic beauty, and a flow of fiery eloquence that forcibly remind us of the mighty thinker, writer, and orator who, by her express desire, is to speak the final words over her clay before it is committed to the restful bosom of her mother earth." The funeral was at Scottish Rite Hall, on the 6th instant. About a thousand people were present, among whom were scores of those prominent in various walks of life who had been her comrades or had known and admired her genius. The altar was buried under an avalanche of flowers. The services were of song, a few words by Mr. Harry Edwards, and this short address by Colonel Ingersoll, who spoke in response to a last request by Mrs. Fiske herself:]

My Friends: In the presence of the two great mysteries, life and death, we are met to say, above this still, unconscious house of clay, a few words of kindness, of regret, of love and hope.

In this presence let us speak of the goodness, the charity, the generosity, and the genius of the dead.

Only flowers should be laid upon the tomb. In life's last pillow there should be no thorns.

Mary Fiske was like herself. She patterned after none. She was a genius, and put her soul in all she did and wrote. She cared nothing for roads, nothing for beaten paths, nothing for the footsteps of others—she went across the fields and through the woods and by the winding streams and down the vales and over the crags, wherever fancy led.

She wrote lines that leaped with laughter and words that were wet with tears. She gave us quaint thoughts and sayings filled with the "pert and nimble spirit of mirth." Her pages were flecked with sunshine and shadow, and in every word were the pulse and breath of life.

Her heart went out to all the wretched in this weary world, and yet she seemed as joyous as though grief and death were nought but words. She wept where others wept, but in her own misfortunes found the food of hope. She cared for the to-morrow of others but not for her own. She lived for to-day.

Some hearts are like a waveless pool, satisfied to hold the image of a wondrous star—but hers was full of motion, life, and storm.

She longed for freedom. Every limitation was a prison's wall. Rules were shackles, and forms were made for serfs and slaves.

She gave her utmost thought. She praised all generous deeds, applauded the struggling, and even those who failed.

She pitied the poor, the forsaken, the friendless No one could fall below her pity, no one could wander beyond the circumference of her sympathy. To her there were no outcasts—they were victims. She knew that the inhabitants of palaces and penitentiaries might change places without adding to the injustice of the world.

She knew that circumstances and conditions determine character; that the lowest and worst of our race were children once, as pure as light, whose cheeks dimpled with smiles beneath the heaven of a mother's eyes. She thought of the road they had traveled, of the thorns that had pierced their feet, of the deserts they had crossed; and so, instead of words of scorn, she gave the eager hand of help.

No one appealed to her in vain. She listened to the story of the poor, and all she had she gave. A god could do no more.

The destitute and struggling turned naturally to her. The maimed and hurt sought for her door, and the helpless put their hands in hers. She shielded the weak, she attacked the strong.

Her heart was open as the gates of day. She shed kindness as the sun sheds light.

If all her deeds were flowers the air would be faint with perfume. If all her charities could change to melodies a symphony would fill the sky.

Mary Fiske had within her brain the divine fire called genius, and in her heart the "touch of nature that makes the whole world kin."

She wrote as a stream runs that winds and babbles through the shadowy fields, that falls in foam of flight and haste, and laughing joins the sea.

A little while ago a babe was found—one that had been abandoned by the mother, left as a legacy to chance or fate.

The warm heart of Mary Fiske, now cold in death, was touched. She took the waif and held it lovingly to her breast and made the child her own.

We pray thee, Mother Nature, that thou will take this woman and hold her as tenderly in thy arms as she held and pressed against her generous, throbbing heart the abandoned babe. We ask no more.

In this presence let us remember our faults, our frailties, and the generous, helpful, self-denying, loving deeds of Mary Fiske.

Materialism.

Materialism does not certainly insure the mind against error and superstition.

Democritus, the "Laughing Philosopher" of Greece, who died in the centennial of his age, 460 B.C., says: "Everything is composed of atoms of infinitly small elements, each with a definit quality, form, and movement, whose inevitable union and separation shape all different things and forms, laws and effects, and dissolve them again for new combinations." "There are no casualties; everything is necessary and determined by the nature of the atoms, which hav certain mutual affinities, attractions, and repulsions." From such an elevated platform of elementary principles he might hav beheld "all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them" without having any occasion to "fall down and worship" either gods or demons. Was it because he did not wish to offend the prevailing sentiment of that age that he admits its spiritualistic inventions but insists that "the gods themselvs, and the human mind, originate from such atoms?" The Laughing Philosopher's theory is complete without the further hypothesis of the existence of gods; and the existence of the human brain might account for the "human mind" without any necessity of assuming the entical or atomistic character of the mind, independent of the brain. This would entirely harmonize with and complete the atomistic philosophy of Democritus.

It is well to observe that the title of "Laughing Philosopher" is misleading; for his "laugh" is only a complacent toleration of prevailing foibles and follies, which he taught his disciples to "regard with serene equanimity."

Mr. J. R. Perry says that "the idea that intelligence is floating about in chunks or like a cloud in a rainy day, and may be drawn down occasionally, is too absurd for belief."

To me this "chunk" or "cloud" idea of the nature of intelligence, absurd as it may seem, appears no more improbable than does the idea that the mind or spirit has a separate entical organization capable of maintaining consciousness independent of the visible bodily organs. Thought is functional, and the brain is its organ. In a scientific sense this hypotnesis accounts for every phase of mental phenomena. The dual, or spirit theory is as unnecessary to science as is a fifth wheel to a wagon. It is prompted by the natural love of life, that would invent some scheme by which we might snatch the wreath of immortality from the very jaws of death. Alas for our dreams! We must die! Let us, then, be as kind and good and true as we can for the little day we may liv. When Mr. Perry speaks of the "higher sense" by which he knows and has experiences of things outside of the range or capacity of the ordinary senses, I am such a blankety-blanked "Blank Material" brother that I must hav a Baphometic baptism or a Pentecostal inundation of the Holy Ghost to even comprehend him. This egotism without its sentiment is what makes Mr. Perry admirable. Few men can support at the same time such lofty notions of themselvs and such generous toleration of others.

I do not pretend to any experiences outside the limits of the ordinary senses; and I find that the contents of "memory and thought" and the inventions of the most fervid imagination, no matter how kaleidoscopic fancy's vision, are all entirely constructed of bits of mundane experiences. Even if we fancy a future life, we simply project the lights and shadows of this life beyond the grave. The only thing we can imagin of a "higher sense" than ours, is that it is not ours. Paul when caught up to the third heaven related his experiences in the language of the ordinary senses. He says he "heard unspeakable words," not by a "higher sense," but through the same sense of hearing. Such is the limit of the human understanding by virtue of its own organization.

Mr. Perry relates that he saw a picture of Black Hawk produced through the mediumship of Mr. Rogers, by placing a cardboard upon which it was drawn within a folding slate, securely closed, a box of oil paints being fastened to the slates on the outside. And he says "the various colors of paints must hav been by some means conveyed through them" (the slates). Now, it is intimated that this is a scientific experiment according to the law of induction. I wish to examin this pretension carefully and critically. This supposed drawing in of the paint, I suppose, might be called a spiritual test of endosmose. Let us compare it with a well-known experiment in natural science. Let a solution of sugar in a tube closed below with a slip of bladder tied across the end and open above be suspended in a vessel of water. The quantity of liquid in the tube is soon seen to increase by the passing through of the thinner fluid. It will flow over and run down into the outer vessel, and so the action will go on till the two mixtures become uniform. I giv this experiment on the authority of Dutrochet and Liebig. They describe it in all its details, so that you or I or anyone can also actually realize it.

The only part of Mr. Perry's statement that is really his own experience is, "I saw a picture." All that part that relates to the circumstances of its seeming production is given on the relation of others. Let those others speak; and let them, like Dutrochet and Liebig, appeal to the experiment in our own hands.

There is no evidence that the paint went through the slates, no more than that the brushes went through them. It is the logical necessity of a conformity to material conditions that demands paint; and yet there is no more need of providing visible paint than there is need of brushes, and there is just the same need of a visible painter as of either. To be consistent, an artist should hav been tied to the outside of the slates, to be gradually absorbed within them through their pores. To entitle this experiment to scientific regard, "everything else being equal," a similar result should follow for anyone without the intervention of mediums.

This mediumship smacks of mediatorship, and is suggestiv of Christ and the priesthood.

It is also suggestiv of fraud; and the history of modern Spiritualism is mostly a history of exposed, and often self-confessed, deception. I do not think that Mr. Perry or Mr. Burr, nor even Mr. McArthur, are deliberately trying to deceive us. They are probably the honest, though willing, victims of this imposition. To be sure, they are in eminent company, and that ought to comfort them a little. Mr. McArthur makes out a long list of eminent names, seemingly for the purpose, with his usual candor, of intimating by a profuse use of quotation marks that some one has called them "illiterate," "knave," "ridiculous," etc. Now, for my part, I hav never called such men fools or knaves, though some of that list hav been mentally aberrant and hav even been inmates of insane asylums. In some cases it was this very Spiritual delusion that constituted their lunacy. I might write volumes, as volumes hav been written, to show that often great mental ability is conjoined with some mental disability—the iron and clay of the human organization. But what if Gerrit Smith and Horace Greeley and Tasso were in insane asylums? What if Hugh Miller and other great men committed suicide? "A fool has not sense enough to go crazy." These men are not knaves generally, though Bacon (somebody's Shakspere) confessed it. Moreover, I do not know that a single name in the list is that of a pretender to mediumship. Browning is there—Browning, the author of "Sledge the Medium." Ha, ha, ha! but that is rich! McArthur says: "One minute with J. K. P. Baker and I am done."

> Well, fare thee well; and if forever,
> Still forever fare thee well.

"A. H. K," of Pacific, Mo., comes up to the help of the spirits, and batters his man of straw ferociously. He is up altitudinisimusly in ghost experiences, but he cannot understand plain English. So ta, ta, "A. H. K." J. K. P. BAKER.

The Slanderer's Vocabulary.

The Christian slanderer abounds everywhere. The pulpit, the prayer-meeting, the Young Men's Christian Association, the religious press, the secular press, and all kinds of theological controversies are full of slanders. The religious bigot revels in the use of certain hate and terror-inspiring words in order to induce "conversions." Once fix upon a hated person the stigma implied in one of these words, and he is ruined in business and especially in social life. As a business man pious men shun him, women and children of the timid and pious order look with horror on him, and every moral sneak in the community sides with them. The minister and deacon with horror point to the French Revolution as a legitimate fruit of Atheism and Infidelity. Thomas Paine and Colonel Ingersoll are pointed out as shining examples of cussedness in the Atheistic ranks, and lying and malicious stories are told of the lives of those illustrious gentlemen. The mention of their names is made to call up in the minds of the ignorant and bigoted an association of wickedness and horrors sufficient to make stout-hearted persons turn pale. They serve among the ignorant to frighten grown people and children into churches, as goblin stories do to compel naughty boys to obey their parents.

To call a man an Atheist or an Infidel in an average community where religious bigotry and hatred are still in vigorous life, evinces a design to injure him in business and among his associates. I think just as little of the honesty and manhood of one who applies to me either of those epithets of scorn and contempt as if he had called me a criminal. The animus in both cases is the same. He means to attach odium to me. And the pulpit and the religious press in their free use of these epithets are not only accountable for their common use among the people, but are exceedingly mean and dishonest in so doing. An ignoramus who takes up and repeats this pulpit slang, if he mingles no malicious intent with the act, may be pardoned because he knows no better. Generally, the presumption of ignorance, and therefore freedom from scoundrelly intent, may be indulged in favor of Sunday-school children and most other ignorant persons who hav not learned to weigh the meaning and effect of their words, but if the pulpit and religious press are one-half as learned as they are supposed to be, their misuse and abuse of these words is unpardonable.

To be an Atheist is no crime, nor is it the least evidence that a person is a bad neighbor, a bad citizen, a bad husband or father. Why, then, should he be considered odious? Why teach his neighbors to abhor him, and women and little children to shudder when they behold him? There are very few Atheists, but some of the very best men in every honorable relation in life that I hav ever known were of this distinction.

When the pulpit calls a man an Atheist I cannot take its word as proof. Nearly every orthodox pulpit many times a year speaks of Thomas Paine as an Atheist, yet in the first sentence of the fourth paragraph of his "Age of Reason" he says, "I believe in one God and no more." And it is more reasonable to presume that he knew what he believed than it would be to suppose the minister of the to-day knows. His honesty in this declaration is surely more unimpeachable than that of his assailants.

Who are Atheists? In any honest sense of the word they are those and those only who deny the existence of God. Surely the term Atheist does not include those who hav no opinion one way or the other on the question. Atheism is a positiv, affirmativ state of mind. To include those as Atheists who hav no belief in the existence of God, we must include the infant in its cradle, the little boy and girls, the youths who hav no knowledge or convictions on the subject—all of these, and also those older ones who are honestly and diligently seeking the truth, but hav yet reached no conclusion, are to be scheduled together, because in their ignorance they cannot declare a belief in God. And if orthodoxy be true, they must be punished in an endless hell. Even Colonel Ingersoll must be ranked with the Atheistical host, though he, with a manliness and honesty which all would do well to practice, owns up to his ignorance at the precise point where it begins, and says, "I don't know." If all who "do not know" were honest and courageous enough to admit their ignorance, the army of the ignorant would include nearly all men, and they would be more manly, self-respecting, and deserving of regard than they now are, and would grow more honest. Instead of lending themselvs to the bigots' hue and cry of "Atheist and Infidel," as they now do, and hunting down and destroying honest men, they would stand by these and say, "Stand back, slanderers and libelers!"

To say "I don't know" does not imply a denial of a fact, but ignorance of its existence. And no just man will treat a want of knowledge as either a vice or a crime.

Who are Infidels? To be an Infidel is to be merely unfaithful. This is the true meaning of the word Infidel, and no more and no less. To be unfaithful, to be an Infidel, implies that one must know, first, of the existence of some being or person; second, that he owes to that being or person an obligation or duty; third, he must be able to perform that obligation or duty; fourth, he must be unfaithful to that obligation or duty—that is, must fail or refuse to perform it. Then, and not before, is he an Infidel. All of these facts must exist before he can be condemned as an Infidel. In theology, therefore, he must believe there is a God, he must believe he owes that God a duty or service, he must hav the ability to perform that duty or service, and he must willfully neglect or refuse to perform it. If this be so, shall infants, small children, and youths be considered immoral persons and be punished as Infidels? Shall honest inquirers before they hav reached any conclusion?

I hav now shown how incautious and often unjust the pulpit and laity of the orthodox churches are, if honest, in the use of the every day language or slang of the pulpit, and how malicious religious bigots and slanderers are in the use of certain harmful words. I believe that to orally accuse another, or to write or print a statement charging him, maliciously and falsely, with being an Atheist, or with being an Infidel, in a theological sense, has never been held by any court to be slanderous or libelous, yet owing to the bigotry and ignorance of mankind, such charges are quite as injurious to a man among his associates and in his business relations as many other charges that are actionable at law. This impunity extends to the pulpit and its followers an opportunity to indulge in malice to their hearts' content, and to force every moral coward to join them in their campaigns of slander. All of these deserve the contempt which we extend to other slanderers and villifiers.

As long as men and women, for the sake of business or social standing, will pander to these abuses, the race of hypocrits will never die out, and they will continue to contribute to the support of causes which belittle their own manhood. The pious and aggressiv villifier silences most voices and the sneaks creep under his wings for protection, and pay tribute for that protection. LEVI NORTH.

Gender and the Great Cosmic Unity.

To "PERICLES:" No, I did not consider it "ungallant masculin egotism, and an unjust slight of her [my] sex," when "Pericles" used the masculin gender to represent the Great Cosmic Unity. How could I, when mythology, Judaism, and Christianity make my sex superior to the masculin, and even to God himself, since one woman, by eating an apple, defeated the grand purposes of the almighty, turned the world upside-down, which God nor man has ever been able to right?

Jesting aside, I did but question the utility and consistency of using mythological titles to represent the Universe, if the old theory of a Being was not intended to be conveyed. To be sure, we call the sun he, and the moon she, metaphorically, but each is only a portion of the Universe, while we never hear the Universe itself called he, him, and his, but use the pronoun it; and as the Great Cosmic Unity is but another name for the Universe, I fail to see why it would be detracting from its vastness, wholeness, or grandeur to apply the same pronoun in this case, since the substance is one and the same. When referring to the Great Cosmic Unity, it might be written in capitals or italics, if preferred.

As our Christian friends make a personal God and place him outside of the Universe, it is consistent for them to endow him with gender (three persons, all males), but for us, who believe in no personal God, anywhere, but that the Great Cosmic Unity contains all that is, it seems to me inconsistent to use either the male or female gender, for gender should only be applied to persons, except when used metaphorically as a personification. If any gender is used we want a word that comprises all genders, since the Great Cosmic Unity is the All.

"The Great Cosmic Unity" being "greater than any anthropomorphic god," as "Pericles" says, such an insignificant word as God should never be used to describe it. It is degrading to the Great Cosmic Unity, belittles and stultifies it, is a misapplication of terms or language, as it does not convey our meaning, and givs the Christian reason to sneer at us for coming to his vocabulary for words to express our "negations," and justly subjects us to his scorn and derision.

This is the idea I intended to convey in my article of December 22d, not that I ridiculed the form of expression, but the Christian would, and did, to my knowledge.

It will be perceived I do not consider God "the highest possible title," but a disgraceful appellation, invested with the accumulated madness growing out of all the religions that hav centered around that cruel myth since man began to manufacture a demon to worship!

I admire many things, but worship nothing, not even the Great Cosmic Unity. Worship is servility—it betrays inferiority. Man is superior to the whole Universe, aside from himself; therefore, should not worship it. Worship is born of the dogma that gods and angels exist superior to man. Destroy that falsehood and there is nothing left above man for man to worship; and for him to worship himself, or his inferiors, would be foolishness. ELLA E. GIBSON.

THEOLOGIANS are the confidants of the most high; they know the motivs of all his actions, and assure us that if there are plagues, wars, famins, musketoes, bed-bugs, and theological bickerings here below it is ever for the greater good and well-being of mankind. Anyway, it is quite sure that whatever happens in this world invariably turns to the greater advantage and profit of the priests, God, in all his works, having in view the benefit of none other than his clergy.—Voltaire.

The War on Senator Blair's Bill.

The war on Senator Blair's bill to make Sunday a day of religious languor, so far as the power of the national government can do it, and against his resolution amending the Constitution so that Christianity is our national religion, goes merrily on, and protests are loading down the Washington mails and cumbering the desks of the Senators inches deep.

Secretary Stevens sends report of his own and two other speeches before the Aurora Turnverein of Chicago, and the Drovers' Journal prints the protest sent to Washington by the Columbia Turnverein of the Town of Lake, and which Senator Cullom presented to his associates in the Senate. In California the Liberals are alive, and though obliged to fight a proposed Sunday law of their own state, hav not forgotten to whisper in the ears of Senators Stanford and Hearst that they would better not vote for Mr. Blair's fanatical measure. The Chicago Law Times has given Mr. Charles B. Waite sixteen of its big pages to argue against the bill, and the Seventh Day Adventists are working fiercely against their religious foes, and for the preservation of their own religious liberty. We hope every individual reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER will do his duty, by getting our petition signed and sending it to one of his Senators at Washington. The petition will again be found on the last page of this paper. The names of the various Senators were given in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 9th inst.

The people are being foully deceived by the promoters of this Christian movement. Its advocates declare that the Sunday bill is in the interests of labor, and we regret to say that there are laborers shallow enough to believe them. In this state, only last week, an assembly of the Knights of Labor officially sought the help of the clergy of their town to stop Sunday traveling, because it deprives the workingmen of a chance for recreation. But just let the clergy hav charge of the day, and what opportunity will the workingman hav for recreation? What can he do? Where, but in the church, can he spend the day? Can he travel on the steam-cars? Can he travel on an excursion boat? Can he even take a horse-car to the suburbs of the cities and walk out into the fields? Not if the church knows herself! Sunday will be a day of sleep—in the church in the morning, at home in the afternoon.

The advocates of the Educational Amendment bill declare that they do not intend to establish a state religion, and then invoke the whole tremendous power of the general government to guarantee that each state shall teach the principles of the Christian religion! If this is not establishing a state church, it is establishing a state religion, and the church will not long be wanting. Our secular schools will soon be Sunday-schools, and the "principles of the Christian religion"—if anyone can define them—will be the a b c of the curriculum as well as the theme of the graduating essay.

The great aim of the church is to govern the education of the children and to control one-seventh of every man's time. If she could only run the world one day in each week she could get a great deal of cash out of the people, and the importance of her clergy—who are the church—would be enormously enhanced. They would be as great men as the state officers, and they would wax fat, even as the politicians do.

There used to be a law on the statute books of the New Haven Colony, which forbid profanation of the Lord's day by work, sport, or recreation, and concluded thus:

"If the court, upon examination, find that the sin was proudly, presumptuously, and with a high hand, committed against the known command and authority of the blessed God, such a person therein despising and reproaching the Lord, SHALL BE PUT TO DEATH, that all others may fear and shun such provoking, rebellious courses."

We recommend Senator Blair to try and get this reënacted into law. It seems to agree with the sentiment of the churches of to-day as well as with the desire of the ancient Puritans.

The Priest.

There are several points of view from which the doctrins taught by priesthoods to their peoples may be regarded. One view contemplates these doctrins as emanating from the people themselvs. The people, it may be said, essayed to explain nature's workings around and within them, made a rude guess, and deputed a priesthood to the work of the continued exhibition of their supposed knowledge. But there is another view. The doctrins may be considered as emanating from the priesthood. They may be considered as fictions got up by knaves and imposed upon the people with the design of securing an easy and luxurious living.

It makes a great difference, when we read of affairs between peoples and their priesthoods, what spectacles we look through. Prepared spectacles are used by Christians in inspecting the account of the Jewish priesthood. They discard these in examining corresponding pagan organizations. Then they hav no trouble in discerning all sorts of guile. Let us try to view their own institution with equally accurate vision.

Opening Exodus and Numbers, we at once meet a familiar sight. Somebody has had intercourse with a deity, and has by him been appointed ruler. Of course. Zoroaster received his laws from Ormuzd, the god of light. The Egyptian priests communed with the god Thoth. Was not the Cretan lawgiver Minos the friend of Zeus? Was he not even his son, and did he not ascend to the sacred cave on Mount Dicte to bring down the laws that his god had placed there for him? Lycurgus was instructed by Apollo. Numa Pompilius received more than mortal wisdom from the nymph Egeria. The Koran was given Mohammed by the angel Gabriel. So when we see a man named Moses claiming divine vicegerentship under a god named Jehovah, we are not surprised. Neither are we surprised on learning further that the persons chosen as associates were Moses's brother and the brother's sons. We are equally prepared to meet the following: "Every oblation of theirs, every meat offering of theirs, and every sin offering of theirs, and every trespass offering of theirs, which they shall render unto me, shall be most holy for thee and thy sons. In the most holy place shalt thou eat it; it shall be holy unto thee. . . . All the best of the oil, and all the best of the wine, and of the wheat, the first-fruits of them, which they shall offer unto the Lord, them hav I given thee" (Num. xviii). Burke, by the way, innocently remarks that he can see no purpose and meaning in the universal custom of sacrifices if it be not of divine ordination and significance. We can. We can see ever so much purpose in it without any effort at all. To us it seems all bulged out with meaning.

These "offerings" were exceedingly numerous. There was scarcely an act of daily life, from killing a chicken to bearing a child, which this Jehovah did not wish attended by an offering to his agents. To make matters worse, Jehovah delivered to the ministry of his new government a constitution and code of laws and minute observances, every infraction of which called for an offering. But we hav space for no further exposition of the offering business. A sufficiently clear idea of the pertinacity and multitudinousness of the demands for offerings may be got from something before our eyes at the present day. As the products of industry hav become vastly diversified a circulating medium has been invented. We need only glance at the gentlemen now urging their congregations to "put money into the Lord's treasury," meaning their own purses.

But with all the offerings and similar little amenities, the life of priesthoods was not altogether a happy and untroubled one. No age has been without its bad people, and those ages had their Infidels as well as the present. Men hav been found in every period so wrong-headed as to set themselvs against the lawful and beneficent rule of God's friends. Moses and Aaron soon found their case no exception. There were in each of the thirteen tribes restless spirits continually seeking escape from the new government. Some retained an affection for Egypt, their nativ land, and these exclaimed against what they called inconveniences and hardships, and against their leaders as the authors of their troubles, and even wished to stone their benefactors (Num. xiv). Notwithstanding that we are now told in legends that their new God showed his power and care in frequent miracles that should hav convinced the most skeptical, it seems that those who were there, and should hav known if anyone should, by no means exhibited such a faith as we should expect. Some wanted to worship other gods. Others had more confidence in golden serpents. But there is no accounting for the waywardness of man.

Then many of the chiefs said that a trust and an unrightful and unlawful combination was being set up in the God's-friendship business. This branch of industry being such a profitable one in those days, no wonder they invoked opposition to the bloated monopolists. Many and bitter were the complaints they made that the new constitution would be injurious to their particular interests, and that the profitable places would be engrossed by the families and friends of Moses and Aaron, and others equally well born excluded (Num. xvi, 3). In Josephus and the Talmud we learn some particulars not so fully narrated in scripture. We are there told that one Korah made public objections to Moses's conferring the priesthood upon Aaron, and this, he said, without the consent of the people. He accused Moses of having obtained the government by fraudulent artifice, and having deprived the people of their liberties; and of conspiring with Aaron to perpetuate the tyranny in their family. The people then began to cry out: "Let us maintain the liberty of our tribes; we hav freed ourselvs from one slavery, and shall we allow ourselvs to be deceived and subdued by Moses?" And so these Infidel doubters clamored on, at great length. The more hardened called in question the reality of Moses's conferences with God; objecting to the privacy of the meeting, and the preventing of any of the people from being present at the colloquies, or even approaching the place, as grounds of great suspicion. This seems strange when other passages of scripture represent God every now and then appearing to the whole people. It would seem that if he had really done so these men would not hav doubted. Modern Infidels may go so far as to insinuate that the supernatural events did not occur; that the only possibly truthful parts of the account are those treating of the doubts, and natural events such as we see around us every day, and that the supernatural element was inserted in the legends later to subdue future generations. But these scoffers should take warning from the horrid fate that befell their brother Infidels of those days, Korah and his associates (Num. xvi). Priesthoods hav always had their little ways of getting rid of the contumacious and unsubduable, and let it be remembered that our own days present plentiful examples. But this is getting too far ahead. The intractable Korah and friends made many other charges that are to be named. They accused Moses of peculation; as, embezzling part of the golden spoons and the silver chargers that the princes had offered at the dedication of the altar (Num. vii); and the offerings of gold by the common people (Ex. xxxv, 22), as well as most of the poll-tax (Num. iii; Ex. xxx). Aaron they accused of pocketing much of the gold of which he pretended to hav made a molten calf. Besides peculation, they charged Moses with ambition; to gratify which passion he had, they said, deceived the people, by promising to bring them to a land flowing with milk and honey, instead of which he had brought them from such a land. All this, they said, he thought light of, provided he could make himself an absolute prince (Num. xvi, 13). Malcontents urged as a grievance that, to support with splendor the new dignity in the family, the partial poll-tax already levied and given to Aaron (Num. iii) was to be followed by a general one (Ex. xxx), which would probably be augmented from time to time, if Moses were suffered to go on promulgating new laws, on pretense of new revelations of the divine will, till the people's whole fortunes were devoured by the hierarchy. In fine, no less than two hundred and fifty men, "famous in the congregation, men of renown," forming themselvs into a Hebrew Secular Union, led the people against God's just and regularly ordained government, for all the world as similar intractable persons are doing to-day, and worked the mob up to such a pitch of frenzy that they called out, "Stone 'em, stone 'em, and thereby secure our liberties; and let us choose other captains to lead us back into Egypt, in case we do not succeed in reducing the Canaanites." Then—but our space is ended. Let the reader call some Christian friend and let the two sit down together and, without Christian spectacles, read, and try to look into with a discerning eye, the history of the course which never ran smooth between God's acquaintances and those who were not willing to submit themselvs to them.

Paine Celebrations.

The great discussion between Colonel Ingersoll, F. R. Coudert, and Stewart L. Woodford, printed in this issue, precludes the publication of the accounts of the Paine celebrations received. Mr. Stevens got the Chicago report in by running it into his report of the American Secular Union. The reports from Milwaukee, Philadelphia, and other places came too late for last week's issue. We would urge our friends who desire accounts of their meetings published in THE TRUTH SEEKER to send the copy at the earliest possible moment after the affair happens. News to be interesting to other than the participants needs to be fresh.

Paine celebrations in the East this year hav not been so frequent nor vociferous as in some previous years, nor as much so as we could wish. Boston had a good one; so did Philadelphia. New York had to be content with the regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club. Mrs. Severance stirred the people up in Wisconsin, and Pennsylvanians were roused to enthusiasm by the Pittsburgh Secular Society with music, speaking by C. Fannie Allyn, recitations, and a social. We hav not heard from Alliance, Columbus, nor Cleveland, Ohio, though doubtless each had a celebration worthy of record. Probably the largest, most enthusiastic, and hilarious celebration was held out around the hinges of the Golden Gate. It was accompanied by the formation of the California State Liberal Union with a membership reaching toward a thousand, and culminated Tuesday evening, the 29th ult., in a great dance, in which a hundred couples amused some six hundred spectators.

Moody has been working upon the nervous system of the people of San Francisco for several weeks with a "revival," and Sam Jones has dates at the same place for the same purpose. The Christians of the state are moving heaven and earth to secure the passage of a Sunday law, and the Liberals found it was time to bestir themselvs. S. P. Putnam began a series of Sunday night lectures, lasting through January. His audiences ran up to a thousand, and on Monday the 28th the state Union was formed, and its officers directed to arrange for a series of meetings to be held at Sacramento for the purpose of influencing the California legislature. Money to pay for this work and the distribution of documents was voted, and the Christians hav found a foe worthy of their steel—or steal, which is what the Sunday law would lead up to. Judge North, of Oleander, was chosen president of the state Union, but declined on account of age, and nominated S. P. Putnam, who was elected unanimously. The other officers are, secretary, Emil S. Lemme, San Francisco; treasurer, A. H. Schou, Oakland; executiv committee, Ranford Worthing, San Diego; W. F. Freeman, Stockton; Philip Cowen, Petaluma; William Schroeder, San Francisco; W. S. Rogers, Boulder Creek; John Robinett, Nipomo; Mrs. Kate Parker, Anaheim; J. E. Clark, Los Angeles; L. Magenheimer, San Jose. These are good men who subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and California is now second to no state in Liberal organization and capacity for work. The Germans of the coast, who were holding a convention at the same time, sent their official allegiance to the Union, and promised aid to defeat any Sabbatarian legislation.

It would not be disadvantageous to Freethought if the Liberals in every state would for a while leave alone the abstract and get down to the concrete issues of the hour. There is scarcely a state in which there is not need for some special effort. The Christians are pushing ahead all along the line, in state and nation, and there are none to oppose save the Infidels. And where there is no defensiv work to be done, there is the aggressiv propagation of our principles to be attended to. Heretofore, we as a body of Liberals hav mostly labored to get men and women out of the church. We ought to now add to that work an effort to get the church out of the state. Here in New York city we are snowed under by the Catholics. Mike Corrigan is running the town, and the only satisfaction in the situation is that the Protestants are snowed under with the rest, and must contribute out of their store to support the Roman Catholic church, which had nearly a million dollars given it last year, and will get more in this year of their Lord. The Chicago Liberals are making a brave fight in their locality, and on the national issues individuals are doing splendidly by protests to their Senators. And at this time, this work is of a great deal more importance than lectures on subjects which hav been discussed a thousand times.

On April 30th of this year, New York is to celebrate the adoption of our national Constitution and the inauguration of Washington as the first president—practically the beginning of the Republic. The clergy hav obtruded themselvs into this affair to such an extent that it is to be a religious carnival. There was no man who did more to accomplish the independence of this country than Thomas Paine, but his name will not be heard in the exercises because he denied the inspiration of the Christian Bible. This is all wrong—infamously wrong—and the Liberals of this town ought to make some formal protest, demanding a place for some speaker who will recognize Paine. His portrait, also, ought to be among those of the other great men who labored so wisely for the republic. Let us see if the churches hav got our throats so firmly in their grasp that we cannot make at least a feeble outcry.

Trouble in the State Senate.

The legislators up in Albany got the benefit of the clergy one day last week with a result that made some of them long for anything but a repetition. As is well known, it is the habit of the Senate to open proceedings with a prayer. The senators delegate some officer to invite in rotation the preachers of the city, and for their communication to heaven, lasting from one to ten minutes, the clergy get a five-dollar note. In this way the senators "work the religious racket" at the expense of the state and keep solid with the clergy. The praying on Tuesday of last week was done by Rev. S. V. Leech, Methodist. One of the things Mr. Leech wanted the Lord to grant was "deliverance from the reckless flood of immigration that has already deluged our great cities with a horde of ignorant emigrants committed to superstition, who now constitute the majority in the slums."

Senator Grady, of the sixth, a district in which "ignorant immigrants" largely preponderate, was upon his feet at once, at the conclusion of the stump speech. "I ask unanimous consent," he said, "at this time to make a motion that the officer in charge of the invitation of clergymen to open the proceedings of the Senate with prayer be directed to omit from the invitation for the rest of this session the gentleman who has just assaulted the throne of mercy with a very peculiar petition. I do not think that under a guise of prayer we ought to be required to sit here and hav the political majority of our cities assailed as being ignorant immigrants committed to superstition. That is a little heavy upon our consciences here. I hav no objection to any prayer that calls down from the throne of mercy such grace as may be required for this body." Senator Grady was followed by Senator Murphy. Mr. Murphy asked for the official report of the prayer. He said: "It is time such a document as that should go to the people of the state. Why should seven or eight men representing such constituencies of this state, as good and pure and intelligent as any other constituencies of the state, hav their religion insulted by the clap-trap politician who, at the early stages of the last session, made a primary election for the office of chaplain."

More and uglier things would hav been said, but the presiding officer ruled the discussion out of order, and the senators had to sit down.

The aim of the Rev. Mr. Leech was to hit the Catholic constituencies of Senator Grady and Murphy. It was Methodist hatred of Catholicism. But the senators deserve to be humiliated for being such willing tools of superstitious champions as to spend the state's money in hiring prayers. There is no earthly reason why legislativ proceedings should include religious services. If religion really made the senators more honest, no one would lament the five dollars per day for that purpose, but as it does not prevent all sorts of schemes and jobbery going into law, and as in itself it is only superstition, the daily prayer is a daily five-dollar farce.

In this particular instance, Mr. Leech hit harder than he knew. Senator Grady is a Tammany man. Tammany is a Roman Catholic political institution. Roman Catholicism is supported in this city by "a horde of ignorant immigrants committed to superstition." Mr. Leech was right in asking for deliverance from such cattle. Senator Murphy's idea of political life and duty was summed up in his refusal to introduce a bill to tax churches and church institutions because there are "thirteen institutions in the district, and they would kill him politically if he did such a thing."

Editorial Notes.

WE congratulate our English friend and subscriber, Mr. T. Brumage, upon his election to the Portsmouth school board. We know he will render a good account of himself in the work to free the school children of his town from superstitious teachings. To stand sixth among fifteen successful candidates, with no political organization to support him, is very good proof that Mr. Brumage is well thought of by his neighbors.

MAINE uses her lottery laws to some purpose. A year ago the Saint John Baptist Benevolent Society held a fair, and, among other things, it offered a watch as a prize to the person having the greatest number of votes at ten cents each Joseph Dion was a contestant for that pr'ze and failing to obtain it, brought suit to recover the money which he contributed. The statute upon which the action was based provides that "every lottery, scheme, or device of chance of whatever name or description, whether at fairs or public gatherings or elsewhere, and whether in the interest of churches, benevolent objects, or otherwise, is prohibited." It also affixes a penalty that is half to the person who sues and the other half to the state. Dion sued for $147. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount sued for.

FOLLOWING the example of the Chicago German Freethinkers, the Freethinkers of that nationality living in Milwaukee are founding a school for the instruction of their children. The first session of the school was held January 6th, with thirty-seven scholars. Since then the attendance has largely increased. A school building is now being erected. The children admitted are between the ages of five and fifteen years, and the book adopted for use is the treatis by Prof. W. M. Kottinger, of Milwaukee, on "Freethinking." In addition to this the pupils will be taught history and natural science by means of object-lessons. The constitution and by-laws in use in the Chicago schools were adopted verbatim. Some of the Milwaukee papers are howling "Anarchy!" at the Freethinkers, the reporters apparently being too ignorant to distinguish the difference between Rationalism and Anarchy, or too dishonest to tell the truth about the school. Our German friends ought to induce these sensational pencil-pushers to attend the school for an hour or two and get just a little education.

A REMINDER of the oft-repeated generous deeds of Photius Fisk comes to us as a photograph of the monument erected through his munificence over the remains of William Shreeve Bailey in the Mt. Olivet cemetery at Nashville, Tenn. The inscription tells the story of the friendship of two brave toilers for the human race: "William Shreeve Bailey, born February 10, 1806, died February 20, 1886. One of the bravest pioneers of abolitionism for chattel slavery, and of Freethought for mental slavery. Though often outraged and martyred for his principles, he was never conquered, suppressed, nor discouraged. It was through the efforts of such heroes that the world has been made fit for the abode of humanity. He rests in the peace and honor so nobly won. This monument is erected to his memory by his Hellenic friend, Photius Fisk." So stands the record. It tells us truly of William Shreeve Bailey's life. The equal heroism of his lifelong antislavery friend is known only to a few of the present generation. May it be many years ere it be revealed on a monumental shaft of stone.

Lectures and Meetings.

W. F. JAMIESON lectured in Red Oak, Ia., from February 5th to 9th inclusiv. His next engagements will be Anita and Irwin. He will answer calls for lectures in Iowa. Address at Irwin, Ia.

THE lectures at the Manhattan Liberal Club for the balance of the month are as follows: 15th, "The Abolition of National Taxation," by Brick Pomeroy; 22d, "Hypnotism," experimentally illustrated, by Dr. R. A. Gunn.

Letters from Friends.

EAST OTTO, Jan. 8, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $2. Send the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL and giv credit for the rest for THE TRUTH SEEKER, the best paper I hav to keep me posted on what our Christian friends would like to do with our natural rights.

An Adventist preacher spoke here the other night on the Blair bill. He said he did not want to be compelled to keep any particular day of the week, or at least more than one. I being a Spiritualist, all days are alike with me.

Your paper is what folks should read in this orthodox place, but they are afraid the devil will get them if they do. I hav got past being frightened at gods, devils, and hells.

Yours for truth and happiness, C. BURCHARD.

BRONSTON, KY., Jan. 1, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I send you $1 25, for which send me six copies of Paine's "Age of Reason" and the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1889. I intend to be somewhat aggressiv this year. I want the "Age of Reason" for distribution in my neighborhood I like the course of THE TRUTH SEEKER generally, and especially its position on church and state and the taxation of church property. Giv the Spiritualists, or anybody else, ample room to demonstrate that we liv again after death. I suppose that there are no persons but that would believe it if they could. Talmage in his sermon of December 29th, makes a good issue. He says, "Take the supernatural out of the Bible and you make it a collection of lies and humbugs, in preference to which I choose Æsop's Fables." J. N. BROWN.

GOWER, Mo., Jan 1, 1889.

MR EDITOR: I liv in Gower, a priest-ridden town. I am the only person, as far as I know, in the town taking your paper. I hav been a subscriber for six or eight years I hav tried hard to get others, persons that believe its teachings, to subscribe for it, but so far hav failed. I received a letter over a year ago from J. E. Remsburg, stating he would giv one or a half dozen lectures in my vicinity if so desired. I knew I could get him an audience, but a house to lecture in was the trouble. There is a good-sized hall in the town, Gower, owned by a Baptist, and I thought I could get it for Remsburg, but I could not; I offered to pay him the money, his price, myself; but he did not want any Infidel to lecture in the community.

I long for the day when Truth shall reign.

J. W. HUTCHISON, M D.

DODGE CITY, KAN., Jan. 1, 1889

MR. EDITOR: "Frigid Atheism." Turn to Edwin N. Beecher's analytical dissertation in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 29th. Study it carefully. Toward the close he asks: "Can they [honest Atheists] not perceive that a godless race—unless at the summit of intelligence—must inevitably be sinful?"

Unless at the summit of intelligence! Dear Brother Beecher, that is our goal—our acme—our ideal condition of man—our "destiny." The summit of intelligence! Repeat it! Never let it die!

By the plural personal pronoun "our" I mean all the Atheists, all the Materialists, all the Infidels, all the Liberals, all the Freethinkers, and all the teachers and educators of the world. We may never attain this heaven, but the strife for it will purify us of much of this inevitable sinfulness, while the aids we lend our fellows in the struggle will giv us grace, mercy, and peace. Amen. J. C. BAIRD.

CHAMPLIN, MINN., Jan. 1, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I hav received the ANNUALS sent for, and hav distributed them to my Liberal friends. They hav read them with much delight. We consider the fourteen questions you gave your correspondents to answer, the grandest proposition that can be offered at this time to a reading public. Let us hav national questions like these, tested by the clearest heads and unprejudiced minds of the country; ther your readers may judge, think, and settle down on well-defined principles. Out of the twenty-four that hav answered, six hav failed to reply to the fourteenth. We hav carefully read the answers, and find many important suggestions, but, nevertheless, many of the theories offered on the "economic troubles" appear impracticable under the present condition of society. We think John Peck's answer to the fourteenth is more comprehensiv, better defined, and will sooner be accepted when brought out as a political issue, than any theory advanced on the question. It is evident that in order to bring more harmony, peace, and prosperity to the masses, they must hav more money in circulation, more employment, and more homes. J. KINSER.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., Jan. 5, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: In your last issue Edwin N. Beecher asks some rational questions about animals, which I will try to answer as far as possible.

1. Is it absolutely certain that the brain is the commander of all power over the body? No. The inferior ganglia cause involuntary motions without reference to the brain.

2. What causes a chicken to run, etc., after being beheaded? The irregular action of the muscles when separated from the controling brain. The renewed flopping on being touched is caused by the stimulus applied to the muscles.

3. What causes the turtle after being beheaded to draw in its neck if touched? Reflex action through an inferior ganglion.

4. What causes the body to quiver long after death? Don't know.

5. What causes the turtle's heart to beat after decapitation? Any animal's heart has an independent nervous system.

6. Can a headless body be vivisected? No.

7. Why do the headless bodies of animals exhibit instinct? They don't.

8. Do they feel? You must ask some one who has been decapitated. C. L. JAMES.

HAMILTON, N. Y., Jan. 1, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: In the village of Hamilton, one of the most beautiful villages in the state of New York, is located Madison University, the largest theological institution of the Baptist order in the United States. In this school are educated and fitted for the Christian ministry many hundreds of young men, all believing it is a nice thing to be called a minister, that a minister's life is an easy one, and one to be desired, and such are the ones who say they hav a call from the Lord to become preachers. Those aspirants who hav the means to pursue their studies and pay their bills are made welcome students and are the privileged ones, and are allowed to obtain situations as best they can anywhere around. And there is also a class of young men who hav a fancy to become preachers, and claim to hav a special call from God to preach, but hav not the means to go through their studies. This class are called "charity students," and if they hav a call from God to preach they are all looked upon as of a lower class of young men, and if allowed to enter the university and hav their education free they hav to promis that after they obtain a license to preach they will go as missionaries to some foreign or undesirable place and preach for small pay, while the better-off class of students hav a good time of it somewhere else. Some of the poorer class of students hav to use extreme economy to struggle through. As an illustration of this there is a notice pinned up in the post-office in this village, in writing, of one who wishes to sell a beautiful Bible costing some $12, a Bible containing all the improvements lately had in Bibles, revised edition, with concordance, illustrations, family record, etc., all for $6. Just under this offer for sale some other person placed a writing like this:

Bibles hav become unsalable More are given away than sold. If the Bible is true science is false. If science is true the Bible is a humbug.

These two notices attract a crowd of observers, and many think the comments in the lower notice are correct—that the one who pays $6 for this book "pays dear for a whistle."

A RESIDENT OF HAMILTON.

ONONDAGA HILL, N. Y., Jan. 1, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: No problem ever was solved by passion The labor problem that involves the slavery question is subject to this principle.

The world wants a Newton to formulate this problem logically. As it took the mathematicians fifty years to assimilate the philosophy of the "Principia," so it will take the philosophers of social science many years to thoroughly master a true calculus of that science.

Labor can never gain its liberty or obtain its justice until it comprehends its own dynamics. As long as education flounders in the mire of history, she takes her knowledge second-hand from the past, and adopts the error that is more warped inasmuch as it is more ancient. As long as laborers do not comprehend the laws of motion they will be the ones moved and not the movers. As long as they cannot factor the equation that contains their dues these dividends will only come to them in part. Men may calculate shrewdly for themselvs if they learn how to calculate. Each man should learn to use his brain, and use it on his business, and mind that business well. Other men doing the same, there would be no call for charity, for each would get his share. The state of poverty exists because those that are in that state know not how to get that which is theirs. Their ignorance is easily explained. For centuries men hav sought for wisdom in ancient books and neglected the volumes of natural phenomena before them. Nearly every man can tell how to get to heaven on the Bible plan. Scarcely one man in ten thousand can calculate the formulæ for potential energy performing work by changes of position. Some will say these principles of analytic science are not practical. But as long as men choose to study scripture, fiction, history, and "news," they will be slaves. When they master the formulæ of physics, chemistry, biology, and social science, they will find broader liberties. CHAS. E. BOYNTON, M D.

EUREKA, CAL., Jan. 6, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: In the issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 15, 1888, appeared a letter from J. R Perry, of Wilkesbarre, Pa., the writer of which needs correcting. Mr. Perry claims that the main object of the Brotherhood of Agnostic Moralists, of which society I am a member, is to sit down on modern Spiritualism. Nothing is more untrue. The object of the society is to sit down on all nonsense in general, but not on Spiritualism in particular. Mr. Perry relates some sleight-of-hand performances, and asks us to accept them as facts. I hav seen many sleight-of-hand performances in my life. I hav seen men shot dead to all appearances, and a few minutes later they appeared upon the stage as well as ever. I hav seen a boy throw a coin on the floor, and a little pig started up where the coin fell, and in less than half a minute it grew big enough to weigh a hundred pounds, and it ran underneath the stage What would Mr. Perry say if I claimed to hav seen men shot dead and then come to life again, and to hav seen a coin turned into a pig? He would probably say I deserved pity for being so silly. What, then, must we say of Mr. Perry? He finishes with a postscript in which he says he would like to see Mrs Slenker account for those facts. Of course she cannot account for them, as she is not in the business; but if she was making a business of legerdemain, she would not account for it then, as it would ruin the business to expose the tricks. For two years I left no opportunity unimproved to investigate Spiritualism, and my efforts satisfied me that it was all humbug.

Mr. J. Hacker, in reply to my letter published some months ago, claimed that I sanctioned land-grabbing. Nothing is farther from the truth. And a gentleman from Detroit, by name of Wood, thinks that I am a heap of selfishness. Let us judge people by their actions. I hav offered to contribute $10, and more, if necessary, toward defraying the expenses if suit is brought against the trustees of Girard College. If all Liberals would offer to contribute according to their means at the same rate, the sum offered would in the aggregate amount to hundreds of thousands of dollars. Yet, I am selfish. Now let such generous men as Mr. Wood from Detroit come forward, and there will be no need for a suit. We will get money enough to buy the college and turn the rascals out. So come forward, Mr. Wood; subscribe $100 or $1,000, since you are so generous, and verify your words with your actions. ROBERT GUNTHER.

THE EGG DISCUSSION CLOSED.

GRATTAN, MICH., Jan. 31, 1889.

MR EDITOR: This may be late for the egg problem. I sent my solution ten days ago, but not being exactly satisfied, I sent the problem to a friend twenty-five miles away, who is an expert in mathematics. I inclose his answer herewith, and think he has found where the catch is.

It is evident that, according to the way the question is stated, the hens would not lay any more eggs in seven days han in six, therefore twenty-four is probably the true answer.

Yours truly, CONVERSE CLOSE.

LAKEVIEW, MICH., Jan. 26, 1889.

C CLOSE, My Dear Sir: Your "poultry problem" is at hand. I herewith submit solution as it at first appeared to me: If a hen and a half lay an egg and a half in a day and a half, then one hen would lay an egg in a day and a half; or she would lay two-thirds of an egg in one day, or fourteen-thirds eggs in seven days; and six hens would lay in seven days six times fourteen-thirds eggs, or eighty-four-thirds, equal to twenty-eight

This solution is manifestly erroneous, since the seventh day would not be a day for laying. By the conditions, each hen goes to her nest every thirty-six hours. Hence, she would lay at the expiration of one and a half days, three days, four and a half days, six days, and seven and a half days. Whence, at the expiration of seven days, each hen would hav a "charge to keep" until the end of seven and a half days. Since six is the highest common multiple less than seven of one and a half, we hav only to determin how many eggs they would lay in six days. Then, if a hen lay an egg in a day and a half, in six days she would lay four eggs, and six hens in the same time lay twenty-four eggs. True, there is an absurdity in the statement that a "half a hen would lay half an egg." But we are not at liberty by this incongruous condition to impose another—that a hen would lay "before her time."

There are many apparently simple questions that involve much latitude of discussion. We do not always technically mean what we say. For instance, "at the rate of ten per cent per annum," in a promis ory note due in less than one year. For five per cent paid in six months is a higher rate than ten per cent paid in one year, inasmuch as ten per cent payable semi-annually is greater than ten per cent payable annually.

I trust I hav partially met your difficulty.

Very truly yours, SALEM F. KENNEDY.

MILWAUKEE, ORE.

MR. EDITOR: It may seem ungrateful to attack McArthur when he has pledged himself not to reply, but that is his business, not mine. He does not propose to pay any attention to any of us until he gets through with Mrs. Slenker, but as he has started to compute the amount of agreement between him and her on the plan of discussion adopted in his athlete problem, he is not likely to get through till "eternity ceases." He commenced with the statement that Mrs. Slenker "publicly admitted a very small portion of the phenomena to be true." That is the first term of a decreasing series. The next term Mrs. Slenker states thus: "I hav seen nearly all phases of the phenomena. . . . but I believe everything I ever saw or experienced was done by the mediums and their confederates. I know about half of it was, because I was told how it was done. The rest of it I could do myself with a little practice." The next term carries the supposed admission beyond the range of observation or theory and resolves it into a mere matter of charity. She says: "I am loth to believe all are deceivers or deceived."

Out of this, by his favorit theoretical process, McArthur is trying to work some practical results in the interest of Spiritualism, and we are all invited to hold our breaths and keep perfectly quiet until he gets through. If the concessions to Spiritualism of all that immense array of distinguished persons named by McArthur are to be discounted like those of Mrs. Slenker, and we hav got to follow each of them up in the same way to get at results, anyone may hav my chance right now.

There is no disagreement between Mr. James's solution and mine, because we did not work the same problem. Not being a mind-reader, I do not know why he changed the question of distance into one of time, but his solution, as he states it, is correct, and as he made seconds correspond to yards, the numbers in his answer are the same as in mine.

McArthur seems to assume that all correct mathematical apparitions are practical, and that the only way to be theoretical is to be absurd. I called McArthur's attention to the fact that by a converging series it was impossible to work out as "wide a divergence as it was possible to imagin." Not being able to dispose of this in any way he skips it.

He repeats his proposition over again that "There is as wide divergence between theoretical and practical mathematics as it is possible to conceive" And by way of proof, after remarking that "figures hav, at all times, been a source of trouble to some of our greatest minds," he proceeds to inform us that the "divine Plato" actually ascertained that 1 plus 1 equals 2. Plato, however, worked this out by a "practical" solution. If he had gone at it "theoretically" it would hav stood thus: 1 plus $\frac{1}{2}$, plus $\frac{1}{4}$, plus $\frac{1}{8}$, plus, etc., "till eternity ceases." Poor Plato, however, had a world of trouble in finding a reason for the surprising result obtained by working out this abstruse problem. He at last ascertained that it was on account of their "participation in duality," or something to that effect.

But Plato was never quite himself again after that. He always appeared sort of white around the gills, and had a kind of far-off look, as if he was gazing abstractedly or distractedly into the "summer-land."

To appreciate what comes next we must understand that McArthur has identified mediums with saints. He proves the wide divergence of theoretical from practical mathematics by a quotation from St. Augustine's idiotic rhapsody on the trinity. Then he adds the misstatement that I said the race must be run on the instalment plan.

And this, alas, is McArthur! This is the distinguished Freethinker of whom we were proud and whose fame had extended across two oceans! Ghost-hunting has brought him to this in so short a time! Better let the ghosts go. "Let them cover their eyeless sockets with their fleshless hands, and fade forever from the imaginations of men."

D. PRIESTLEY.

SING SING, N. Y., Jan. 1, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: As I hav been an interested reader of your valuable paper for some time, it has become my desire to send you a few lines for publication, in which I could express my views on religion and the Bible. In my early childhood I was trained under strict religious influence, and when I became old enough to think for myself I looked upon religion as a serious matter, and made up my mind to investigate it. I thought I believed the Bible from cover to cover, and said I did, but when I started to read it I did not believe so much of it, and by the time I had read it through I found out that I did not believe any of it. And by careful investigation I find out that the majority of people who think they believe the Bible are the very ones that never read it, and indeed it is often the case that they cannot read at all, and do not know what they really do believe, for they do not know what the Bible contains. And I am satisfied that if anyone will publish some statements which I can pick out of the Bible and they get caught they will be arrested for printing immoral literature.

I also wish to state that through looking into history I find that, in regard to the life of Christ, there was no account given of him until the sixth century, and consequently the account that was given at that late date must hav been very liable to errors, and therefore I ask, on what authority do Christians call the Bible the word of God? I should like to hav somebody describe God. He is described in various ways in the Bible, and among them are some that are very ridiculous. He is described as a jealous God. It also states that he is a God of love; in another place we find that God is a consuming fire. But St. John the Divine makes him the most ridiculous of all; he describes him as follows: His head and his hairs were white like wool, as white as snow; and his eyes were as a flame of fire, and his feet like unto fine brass, as if they burnt in a furnace; and his voice as the sound of many waters; and he had in his right hand seven stars and out of his mouth went a two-edged sword, and his countenance was as the sun shining in his strength (Rev. 1, 14–16). Now, I want to know if any thinking person believes in any such a superhuman monster as that, or if any sober or sane man has seen it, or if God ever exhibited himself in that shape to talk to anyone. If this can be proved to be true, then I say that I hav no respect for such a God; and if it is not true then I hav no respect for the author of the statement or for the so-called word of God.

I must now close by giving my opinion of modern Christians, and that is, that the majority of them do not know what they really do believe, and the more ignorant they are the more they think they believe, and the more enlightened they are on the subject the more they doubt it.

ADRIAN, MICH., Jan. 8, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find twenty-five cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL.

Ananias was supposed to be the greatest liar of any age. The habit originated with the creation. It is inherent. The example was set in the garden of Eden, and the practice has been diffused by high and low, by Jew and gentile. Not satisfied with ordinary prevarication, the Ananiasites form themselvs into societies, the better to exercise the accomplishment. One has recently been formed in this city. There are no restrictions; anybody is eligible, the big liar, medium liar, little liar, in fact, all kinds of liars. The accomplishment has had its votaries from St. Paul down to ragged St. Patrick. But the most absurd liar is one who assumes to foretell the destiny of the human species, man. These liars affect to consign the human family to eternal happiness or to eternal misery. They state that the creator of all has predestined a part to damnation, yet they claim power through that creator to redeem the world. What an idiocy! The man who assumes the pulpit and thunders forth his dogmas is the most devilish liar of them all. He knows he lies, and knows that the bigger part of his hearers know he lies, also.

An old Ananias disciple who has grown gray in the service of orthodoxy occasionally calls on me, for my soul's good. He says, in reply to questions asked him in regard to subterfuge used in gospel teaching, that strategy is necessary to a revival effort. It is sanctioned by God. Any means is admissible to the conversion of a soul.

Years ago I used to visit the preaching precinct of a certain minister. As soon as his few hearers were seated, the contribution scoop was thrust in front of them soliciting money for heathens abroad. After the main exercises were over the scoop again was presented, this time for home contingencies. If the contribution was meager, displeasure was plainly visible on his countenance. Then we would arise and sing, and the benediction would follow. Its intensity was governed by the amount of galore extracted from the contribution scoop. Again, at night, the same scene was enacted. Thus each succeeding Lord's day the same farce is gone through with, all for Christ.

Lies hav been the orthodox weapon since the origination of the dogmas. The whole structure is a lie. The basis was conceived in a lie. Its huge proportions hav been developed by lies. But it will meet with a reality—oblivion.

The lies and fallacies that are improvised to run the dogmatic structure, the mythical foundation, of a heartless doctrin, they do not believe will recoil upon themselvs. To gratify their own love of ease and to appropriate the earnings of their more industrious fellow-mortals, and, in obedience to their licentious desires, to appropriate the chastity of their neighbor's family, their avarice reaches out to a lion's share. Plunder is their direct aim; lying is their daily weapon.

O. S. BARRETT.

MADISONVILLE, KY., Jan. 1, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: About the 23d of December last an elder (the Campbellites repudiate reverend, but they recognize elder, although the wearer may be as youthful as Timothy, or younger) by the name of Dorris, held forth at a meeting-house near me called Bethlehem, and after his preachment took up a collection. In order to encourage his hearers to donate, he said that he did not suppose there was a man or woman in their graves who ever suffered for food or raiment in consequence of having given to the Lord. He next stated that he did not believe a man or woman living ever suffered for having given to the Lord. He then said that on other occasions like this he had said, and that he would say here, that if anyone in the house had ever given anything to the Lord in good faith, and now wanted it back, if such a one would hold up his or her hand he would giv it back to him. I held up my hand, and he said, "How much did you giv?" I answered, "$25" "When and where?" he inquired. I answered, "$25 to this church, $10 to Browder's Methodist church, and $10 to the Methodist church on the Henderson road." "Oh," said he, "you can settle that with the Methodists; I hav nothing to do with that." I suppose he thought that Methodists were not working for his Lord. By that remark, however, he recognized his obligation for the $25. He then sat down a moment, and after ruminating over the $25 he got up and said that he did not believe that I gave the money in good faith, that the disturbance was uncalled for, that it was all done for "sarcasm" I replied, not for sarcasm, or anything of the kind, that I meant business; that he had promised to refund that money, and I wanted it. "Well, call around," said he, "and you shall hav it." I supposed he meant when his meeting closed, and I kept my seat until the meeting closed. He was near the stove, and I went to the stove. He drew near me and I thought he was going to say something to me, but when he did not I said to him, "Sir, I would like you to giv me some good reason for saying you did not believe I gave that money in good faith." He said, "Do you believe in God?" I said, "No, not in your God, or the God of the Bible." He answered, "I hav no use for any other," and turned rather aside. I said, "Do you intend to pay that money?" and he replied, "I do not." The next morning he left without paying it. He informed the audience that he was an evangelist for southwestern Kentucky. Thus this evangelist of southwestern Kentucky, of the Campbellite persuasion, showed how much more precious in his eyes was a $25 bill than his character for veracity. I hav talked with several members of his own church, and with members of others, of the Methodist church, and of no church, who heard it all, and all but one member of his own church thought he was morally bound to pay it, and that one would not giv me his opinion.

If this is called in question anywhere, any person can assure himself of the facts in the case by addressing me at Madisonville, Hopkins Co., Ky., and I will refer them to witnesses both in his church and out of it. I was a member in good standing in the Campbellite church when I gave that money, and on that occasion gave more than all the rest of that congregation, though my membership was with another congregation, and I was helping them to pay a preacher for holding a protracted meeting for them.

I omitted to state that, before he closed the meeting, he told the congregation he hoped they would repay the money, and that he would throw in liberally. I told him I did not claim anything from them; that the obligation rested on him individually.

C. A. SMITH.

INDIAN GROVE, MO., Jan. 3, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: As protracted meetings are on the rampage here this winter, I will giv you some of my experience at one of their recent carnivals, also some of my subsequent reflections, after a futil effort to digest the theological hash that was dished out to the eager multitude on this occasion. There is one thing that I hav frequently observed, and that is, when individuals undertake to explain a thing they do not understand themselvs they always end in mystery, hence the many frantic efforts to explain the enigmatical problems with which the Christian religion abounds hav all failed. The only apology offered is simply the trite expression, Great is the mystery of godliness. On the particular occasion to which I refer the speaker went to some length to portray sin in all its hideous deformity as being the product of an inherent spirit or principle that appears to predominate in the moral character of man, and from which man unaided by grace divine is unable to free himself, this gift of grace being contingent upon an expression of faith in Christ on the part of those soliciting divine aid or freedom from the bondage of sin. God is spoken of as a consuming fire, it being meant that he cannot behold sin with the least degree of allowance, invariably meting out a punishment for every sin. Then following upon this was a course of reasoning that would leave you to conclude that a man in an advanced age, in the final winding-up of a long, sinful career, after having committed all the dark and infamous crimes to which a vicious, low, depraved nature is addicted, when there is no longer ability to make restitution, to restore what has been taken by fraud or force, when many long years of dissipation and vicious habits hav eliminated from his nature every trace of the distinguishing features that elevate man above the brute and that alone can crown his brow with glory—that by simple faith and prayer, only this and nothing more, this entire load of guilt can be transferred to the shoulders of an innocent Christ, and this entire catalog of crime be wiped out by an application of the atoning blood by which his moral nature is renovated and made pure, and having received a full and complete pardon he is launched into eternity with the assurance that not a solitary stripe will be laid on his back for the many offenses committed. This we are told is infinit justice. It seems to me that it would require a microscopical investigation to discover either justice or the restraining power this class or style of teaching is likely to exercise over the conduct of man. The youth will persist in sowing wild oats, understanding that provision has been made by kind providence by which the evil consequences may be avoided. Those broken remarks from which these deductions are drawn were interspersed with vituperation and invectiv hurled at the Infidel with all the fierce rancor and vindictivness of a fanatical religious bigot. The speaker, Mr. Herley, in the conclusion of his remarks paused to giv vent to what I suppose to be an original inspiration, and stated most emphatically that an individual that would endeavor to alienate the affection of a person from his church would steal. He did not say steal in so many words—I may put it too strong, for he simply stated that if he had a purse with money in it he would not leave it where such a man could get his fingers on it, as he certainly would take it if he did. Now, this man knows that some of the greatest men the world has ever produced antagonized the church. They had sipped the nectar from the sacred communion cup; they followed the blind guide of credulity; they were obedient to the dictation of the elders, and some of them for a time went whining at the feet of a haughty, dictatorial priesthood, and after a genuin Christian experience they decided that it was a gigantic fraud, a contemptible humbug, and they sought to enlighten the minds of their fellows, to free their intellects, and point out the impositions and cunning trickery by which an intolerant and cruel priesthood would enslave them. And not until this class of brave men became strong enough to successfully resist religious intolerance, and the church to a certain degree became civilized, has the world become a fit place for an honest man to dwell in. An individual whose moral sensibility has been outraged and blunted by the inculcation of the doctrin of total and hereditary depravity and kindred theological dogmas abandons the high estate of manhood to which he was born and adopts the nature of a brute and gives full rein to all the base appetites and passions of his depraved nature, but if he in the nick of time preceding final dissolution embraces Christianity and yields up the ghost, he is conveyed by a shining convoy of angels to the glorious shore, and is received with the plaudit, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant!" and is seated at the right hand of God to bask in eternal sunshine and joy forever. Another individual has traversed the weary journey of life; his sun is setting beneath the shadows of eternal night; he takes a retrospectiv view of the past and finds not a single action for which he needs to blush, and while admonishing the friends to emulate the noble example he has left passes to the unknown, dying as he has lived, an unbeliever, and is consigned to the fiery pit where the worm dieth not, followed by the reverential amens and throat-splitting hallelujahs of the blood-washed throng. This is orthodoxy. If you happen to be an unbeliever in such absurd vagaries, you are branded as a thief by the clergy, those that think no ill of their neighbors, and they use their influence to the utmost to prejudice the minds of all religious people against you.

If there is a God, how would it be possible for him to reveal himself to man and establish his identity? Should we accept the bare statement, "I am God?" I think not, because we know not whether it be true. Should the voice indicate that it required the sacrifice of an Isaac or an incarnate God, it should be denounced at once as an imposition and a fraud. If there is a God, infinit in all his attributes, whose inclination and ability to do good is limited only by the infinity of his power, and who recognizes mankind as his children and is favorably disposed toward them, it would be an easy matter for him to place man in a state where the conditions would be such that he would hav no inclination to sin. He would tone up the moral nature of man and remove every temptation that would tend to lead him astray. By the fiat of his omnipotence he would so change and revolutionize the nature of the most wicked and incorrigible of his children in one moment, in the twinkling of an eye, that every impulse and emotion of his being would be in perfect harmony with the divine mind. The evil that is in man being annihilated, there would be nothing to impede his advancement in the divine life. Or will he cast off his own children and consign them to a burning pit to suffer the excruciating pain of sulphureous flame and smoke, to bewail and lament their sad fate forever, in pursuance of some prearranged plan or some pet hobby to which he may formerly hav committed himself, such, for instance, as the free-agency craze or his unalterable decree to ultimately damn a certain portion of the human family forever?

There are quite a number of nominal Liberals in this locality. They are sneered at and derided for their Antichristian views. They do not seem to understand the importance of coöperation in our efforts to advance our cause.

Fraternally yours, W. E. WALTON.

Buying a Cow.

TO SADIE THORPE.

[DEAR MISS WIXON: The following is the poetry I promised to send. It is from C. Fanny Allyn. I thought it would be nice for the Children's Corner.—SADIE THORPE.]

My dear little Sadie, your kindness of heart
To many a worker will courage impart:
There's many a blessing will fall on your brow,
For helping the aged and buying the cow.

Some people pray loudly for mercy and grace,
Some people pray softly for heaven's high place—
But none of them sweeter—though humbly they bow—
Than you by your action in buying the cow.

Our hearts grow the better for doing kind deeds,
Our homes are the brighter for work without creeds.
And many a Christian will gladly allow
That earth is the nobler for buying this cow.

May the "worthy old couple" hav joy for a guest,
And peace clasp around them her mantle of rest.
May stars, moon, and sunlight impress on your brow
The blessing of nature for buying a cow.

And we who are working for deeds more than prayer,
While such as you help us need never despair.
We'll work with the children improving the now,
And send you our kisses for buying the cow.

Last Words of Noted People.

George Washington closed his great life with the brave words: "I die hard, but I am not afraid to go." John Adams said: "Jefferson still survives," but Jefferson was then lying dead at his home in Monticello. His last words were: "This is the 4th day of July." Both were great pioneers of American Independence, and both passed away on the anniversary of the independence of the country they had served so faithfully. John Q. Adams, knowing that the trials of life were over and that death was quiet and eternal rest, said: "This is the last of earth; I am content." James Madison, already touched by the sting of death, sank back on his couch, saying: "I always talk better when I lie." William Henry Harrison closed his life with the noble words: "The principles of the government, I wish them carried out; I ask nothing more." Gen. Zachary Taylor told the truth in his last words: "I hav tried to do my duty." General Grant, seeing that his family were deeply grieved, said: "I want nobody distressed on my account." Frederick V., the Danish sovereign, cried with his latest breath: "There is not a drop of blood on my hands." Charles I. was executed on the scaffold. His last word was, "Remember," referring to his desire that his son Charles should forgive his father's murderers. Anne Boleyn, who met the same fate, grasped her neck, saying, "It is very small, very small." Sir Thomas More said on the scaffold: "For my coming down, let me shift for myself." General Wolfe was mortally wounded in the capture of Quebec (1759). On hearing that the enemy was retreating, he cried: "What, do they run? Then I die happy." General Montcalm was mortally wounded in the same battle. On being told that he could not liv very long, he said: "So much the better. I shall not see the surrender of Quebec." Captain Lawrence, the noted American naval officer, was mortally wounded in the battle between the Chesapeake and Shannon, and was carried below. On leaving the deck, he shouted: "Don't giv up the ship!" Francis Bacon, when dying, said: "For my name and memory, I leave it to men's charitable speeches and to foreign nations and to the next age." Vanini said: "Come, let us die cheerfully like a philosopher." Voltaire said: "Let me die in peace." Diderot said: "The first step toward philosophy is incredulity." Madam Roland's last words on the scaffold were: "O Liberty! what crimes are committed in thy name." Mozart's last words were: "Let me hear once more those notes, so long my solace and delight." Alfieri said to his friend who was standing near: "Clasp my hand, dear friend; I die." Goethe cried: "Light, more light." Byron: "Come, come, no weakness: let's be a man to the last. I must sleep now." Boileau, as he closed his eyes, said: "It is a great consolation to a poet about to die that he has never written anything injurious to virtue;" and Sir Walter Scott, not knowing the end was so near, said: "I feel as if I were myself again." Benjamin Franklin said: "A dying man can do nothing easily." Haller said: "The arteries cease to beat." Lamb said: "My bedfellows are cramp and cough; we three sleep in a bed." The late vice-president, T. A. Hendricks, knowing that his suffering was over, said: "I am free at last."

Thinking it would be of interest to the young folks to know how some of the world's great lights were extinguished, I write this article for the Corner, with a hope that it will be accepted. G. J. REMSBURG.

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

The children of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S Corner hav undoubtedly derived much pleasure from the quaint and queer notions and expressions of little men and women, as they are told in a column of the Corner under the head of "What the Little Ones Are Saying." I hav a few to giv to the children, and here they are in a nutshell:

Away up in Wisconsin there is a little boy, Otto by name, who very properly calls me "Uncle." Well, Otto is very fond of pancakes. One day, in the absence of his mother, he unceremoniously helped himself to three or four, which had just been taken from the griddle and were awaiting the arrival of papa. Presently mamma returned, just in time to see probably the fifth pancake disappear in Otto's capacious mouth. "My son," she cried, "where are those pancakes going?" And Otto, unacquainted with his anatomy, and not at all disturbed, pointed to his head and said, "Up here, mamma."

Rex—the short for Reginald—is the name of another little Wisconsin man of my acquaintance. One day, overhearing the conversation of some visitors, he heard the word "private" used, and not knowing its definition, he inquired of his mother the meaning of this word. His mother explained it to him, having no idea that he would find any use for it for at least ten years. She was, however, mistaken, for the next day found Rex skirmishing about the wet and muddy garden without having first taken the precaution to put on his shoes, and upon inquiry by his exasperated mother, what business he had in the garden, he replied that it was "private business."

A precocious little lady is one of my youthful friends in this city—Alice by name. Last Thanksgiving I responded to an invitation from Alice's mother to dinner. They are good Christian people, but I am almost afraid that you will infer from the following that Alice is rather a little heretic than a nice Sunday-school child. While all were at the table Alice's mother proposed that each should cite some particular thing for which he or she was thankful. Everyone was thankful for something. Finally the turn came to Alice, who studied quite a little time, meanwhile eyeing the turkey which her brother Ted had had quite a time in catching. "Oh," she finally broke out, "I am thankful that the turkey didn't get away from Ted," the most witty and, at the same time, the most sensible thing she could hav said, under the circumstances.

A boy of my neighborhood is quite a punster in his way. He has an older brother, who is known as Fred, and not quite as well-behaved a boy as I trust the children of the Corner are, and a sister who is just old enough to be very inquisitiv, who is known in the family circle as Toots. Toots asked her mother recently, "Mamma, what made you call Fred 'Fred?'" "I know, Toots," chimed in the young punster. "'Cause he makes ma Fret so."

This last, I think, will not be considered a very good pun, but when it is known that the boy can, as yet, neither write nor spell, his little witticism is entitled to be greeted with a good, hearty laugh, of which latter I hope all the children of the Corner are chock-jamfull. H. T.

Cosy Chats With Correspondents.

H. T., Leavenworth, Kan.—Money received and sent as directed. Thanks for the little gems.

DR. P. MILLER, Dak.—Our sympathies are with you in your bereavement. But the dead neither suffer nor sorrow.

ROSE A.—The Swiss Cross is a monthly magazine of popular science, published at 47 Lafayette place, New York city. It is clean and wholesome.

MARY BAIRD FINCH.—Thanks for all your kindness. You wonder how we get along with so many things. We are greatly aided by just such love and goodness as you and other dear friends so freely giv. Life can be measured in three words—giv and take.—ED. C. C.

CLARENCE S.—No, all are not worthy who call themselvs Liberals. You hav heard of those who steal the livery of heaven to serve the devil in. Make the application.

JOHNNY R.—Cigarets are said to be made largely of refuse tobacco, and are poisonous to the system. We would not like to think of our boys who read the Corner as using tobacco in any form.

W. C. A., Chicago, Ill.—Sorry you are sick. Take Spa Agna Herbalina. As a nerve tonic and blood purifier, it has no rival. It is a wonderful specific in liver and kidney troubles. For further particulars address J. Waters, West Sutton, Mass.

LILLA RAY.—It is philosophic to bear trouble as patiently as possible. The roses yield the sweetest perfume when trodden upon. What we call ills sometimes develop into rare blessings. Be brave and hopeful. The sun is behind the cloud.

J. N. BROWN, Bronston, Ky.—Your interesting article will appear soon. It is a fact that grown people are sometimes quite as apt to be led astray by myth and fable as children. It illustrates that Men are only boys grown tall;

Hearts don't change much, after all.

Correspondence.

LEBO, KAN., Feb. 3, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write to you, for the first time. I read the Children's Corner this morning for about the first time. My papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER right along ever since I can remember; but I hav not been old enough to read it and understand it, or I would hav written to you before. I hav three brothers and two sisters. My papa is a druggist in Lebo. I go to school every day. I am in the fourth reader. My teacher's name is Miss Kitty Jones. My age is eleven years. I will close for this time. ELBERT E. PENFIELD.

POCAHONTAS, ILL., Jan. 27, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am a little girl twelve years old. Pa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I like to read the Children's Corner very much. We get THE TRUTH SEEKER here on Saturday, so I can read it on Sunday. Mr. George H. Dawes gave three lectures here in December. Before the last night there was such rumor of trouble that the ladies did not turn out. There were only two ladies, and I was the only girl there that night. They did raise some disturbance, and some one threw a rock through the window, which went clear across the hall and made a large dent in the opposit wall. Pa says the throwing of that rock was the best advertisment for the cause of Freethought that could hav happened; for the churches hav held a protracted meeting since Jan. 1st, and closed last night with only one sixteen-year-old convert, while four or five years ago they got in the same length of time from twenty to fifty. My letter is getting so I must stop, though I would like to write more. As this is my first letter to the Children's Corner, I hope you won't throw it in the waste-basket. Yours truly, LIZZIE KLEINMANN.

The Fat Little Squirrel.

Where are the squirrels this winter? Fast asleep in their little beds waiting for springtime. Nature permits their blood to cool, so that they sink into torpor in the cold of winter, but they will be wide-awake again when the warm weather comes. In autumn, they get very fat, feeding on nuts, of which they are fond, so that they get some nourishment from their little layers of fat during their torpid slumber.

Did you ever notice how quick and spry they are, and how pretty and graceful are all their movements?

There are three species of squirrel that we know about that go to sleep in winter—the fat squirrel, the garden squirrel, and the cunning little dormouse. The fur is soft and of a lovely yellow-brown striped with black; the eyes are black and sparkling, and the tail is tufted and nearly as big as its little body. The Romans esteemed the flesh of the fat squirrel a great delicacy, and they used to fatten it for food. Its flesh is said to be not unlike that of the guinea pig. Squirrels may be tamed, and are susceptible to teaching. They are busy little creatures, and hide away quantities of nuts and fruit, seeming to hav foreknowledge of days when they may be hungry and not able to go out to find food, or when food will be gone. We call this faculty instinct. S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—What has become of the squirrels this winter? Are they actually asleep? What of their habits? their food? How many species of squirrels? Name them. Describe the general appearance of the squirrel. Are they useful for food? Can they be taught and tamed? What is instinct? Spell squirrel.

FAITH OR AGNOSTICISM?

Two Letters from Dr. Field, D.D., editor of the Presbyterian Evangelist, to Colonel Ingersoll, and two Replies thereto. Reminiscences of a Preacher,

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this they will probably do so at once.

Price, in paper, 50 cents; in cloth, 75 cents.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

Poetry.

The Common Lot.

Once, in the flight of ages past,
There lived a man: and who was he?
Mortal, howe'er thy lot be cast,
That man resembled thee.

Unknown the region of his birth,
The land in which he died unknown:
His name has perished from the earth,
This truth survives alone:

That joy, and grief, and hope, and fear,
Alternate triumphed in his breast;
His bliss and woe—a smile, a tear!
Oblivion hides the rest.

The bounding pulse, the languid limb,
The changing spirits' rise and fall;
We know that these were felt by him,
For these are felt by all.

He suffered—but his pangs are o'er;
Enjoyed—but his delights are fled;
Had friends—his friends are now no more;
And foes—his foes are dead.

He loved—but whom he loved the grave
Hath lost in its unconscious womb;
O, she was fair! but naught could save
Her beauty from the tomb.

He saw whatever thou hast seen;
Encountered all that troubles thee;
He was—whatever thou hast been;
He is—what thou shalt be.

The rolling seasons, day and night,
Sun, moon, and stars, the earth and main,
Erewhile his portion, life and light,
To him exist in vain.

The clouds and sunbeams, o'er his eye
That once their shades and glory threw,
Have left in yonder silent sky
No vestige where they flew.

The annals of the human race,
Their ruins, since the world began,
Of him afford no other trace
Than this—there lived a man!

Stray Scraps.

Some one has inquired. "What has got into the weather?' I inquire, "What has got into the ministers?"

Rev. J. W. Osborne, pastor of the Christian church, North Swansea, Mass., expired in his study January 4th, while writing his sermon.

On the same day Rev. Dr. Fielder Israel, pastor of the First Unitarian church, Salem, Mass, cut his throat in his study about 8 o'clock P.M.

Rev. F. N. Knapp, Unitarian, also died very suddenly in Plymouth, Mass., January 12th.

Two more cases of ministers' sudden deaths are recently reported; one of them dropping dead while preaching. All these were in New England, and four of them in Massachusetts within a few days.

And in New York state, the last week in December, Rev. Father Hecker died also.

And still later—January 12th—another case in New York state, the finding of the body of Rev. W. L. Parker on the shore of Lake Ontario a mile east of Oswego, who, on November 30th, "took the water route to death," rather than face his wronged creditors. He could face his God, but not man. He had, for thirteen years, been rector of Christ church (Episcopal) in the city of Oswego.

What do these sudden deaths and ministerial suicides mean? Were heretics thus suddenly to die and suicide, it would be termed by the Christian an evidence of God's wrath and the tendency of irreligion to self-destruction. Shall we, then, non-believers, attribute these sudden deaths and numerous suicides in the ranks of the clergy to God's judgments and the insufficiency of the Christian religion to enable a teacher from God to bear the ills of life, so that he "rushes off unbidden into the presence of his maker?'

The great Talmage asserts, "No Christian commits suicide unless he is insane." Suppose I should say, by the same rule, no Anti-Christian commits suicide unless insane. would Talmage admit my statement? If not, am I bound to admit his?

No, it will not do to attribute Christian and ministerial suicide to insanity, as has been done in these two cases, and hold heretics responsible for the taking off of themselves.

A hard silver dollar in the hands of a so-called Infidel will pay his fare over the railroad track to his destination as readily as will the same in the hands of a Christian, and the Infidel's suicidal death will no more prevent his passage to the eternal realms of bliss—if there are any—than will the Christian's suicide annul his passport. If the cause of the latter is always to be rated insanity, non-believers hav the same right to plead insanity. Hav Christians taken out a patent-right on the dodge, insanity? Hav we, the wicked world's people, the heretics, blasphemers, and scoffers, not as good a right to be insane as God's holy, chosen teachers on the walls of Zion? Let us not despair while ministers drop dead in their pulpits and suicide oftener than others, if one of our Liberal lecturers should expire in the desk, or strangle himself with a rope in a fit of desperation, called insanity by the Christians when one of their number finds it inconvenient to liv longer and bear the weight of his own deeds.

Obituary.

MR. EDITOR: It is with sad heart that I pen these lines, stating the death of Mr. I. J. Brown, which took place Aug 28, 1888 He was a kind and devoted husband, besides a kind and affectionate father. He leaves a wife and five children, four boys and one girl, to mourn his death. No better man ever lived. He was kind to the poor and needy. and acted honestly to his fellow-men. If he had lived he would hav taken your paper, for he liked it very much. MRS. I. J. BROWN.

Silex, Ark., Jan. 29. 1889.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I herewith send you funeral notice and eulogy of James D McKnight, a prominent Freethinker and a subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The address was made in the cemetery at the head of the grave, and was delivered in a masterly manner, completely electrifying the large audience present.

Mr. Ensor is a highly educated and very prominent attorney of Savannah, Mo., and as an orator has no equal in that part of the state.

The forcible and pleasing manner in which it was delivered elicited many compliments from those who heard it.

J. H. SHAMBERGER.

DEATH OF MR. J. D MCKNIGHT.

From the Democrat, Savannah, Mo., Jan. 18, 1889.

Mr. James D. McKnight, one of Andrew county's most prominent citizens, died at his residence in Savannah, Mo., Friday morning, Jan. 11, 1889

Mr. M Knight was born in Geneseo, Livingston county, N. Y, Jan. 4, 1824, being at his death 65 years and 7 days old. At the age of twelve years he emigrated with his parents to Wisconsin, where he lived till the close of the war, when he moved to Andrew county, Mo., on his farm east of Savannah, where he has since resided except the last two years, during which time he has resided in Savannah. He was married forty years ago January 4th last, the anniversary of his birthday, and leaves a widow and four children, two sons, John and Paul, young men still living at home, Mrs Brooks, wife of Mr J. C Brooks, circuit clerk, and Mrs. Seaman, wife of Samual Seaman, now living in Arkansas.

Mr. McKnight had always been a very active man, and had been prosperous, leaving his family a good estate. His remains were interred in the cemetery here Saturday afternoon last, being followed to their last resting-place by a large concourse of relatives and friends. Before his death, Mr. McKnight requested that Mr. T. H. Ensor talk for him to those who might attend the funeral. Before the remains were lowered in the grave, Mr. Ensor stepped to the head of the coffin and pronounced the following eulogy:

EULOGY BY T. H. ENSOR.

One of the last requests of my friend and neighbor, while living, who now lies motionless before us, was that when his friends should assemble on this occasion to pay their last sad respects, I should for him greet them and giv them his fare well parting. Although a painful duty for me to perform, the request is one I cannot decline to grant. If our conditions were changed, and I had made the same request of him, I know it would hav been willingly and cheerfully granted. He was our neighbor. I knew him intimately; I knew his thoughts, I knew his impulses. Endowed by nature with more than ordinary intelligence, he was always industrious in the pursuit of knowledge. He loved the truth, and was a zealous advocate of right. His was a positiv nature, courageous, honorable, and manly; independent in thought, action, and speech He knew the rights of others and always respected them. He knew his own rights and dared maintain them. The loftiest encomium that can be pronounced over his lifeless form is, that his many acts of kindness are sacredly enshrined in the memory, hearts, and affections of his friends; that the world is better by his having lived in it; that those who knew him best loved him most. He was charitable, generous, and kind. Any distress of others always awakened his kindest sympathies and enlisted his earnest efforts of assistance. He lived and believed in this life. He believed there was much good in this world. He could hear music in the harmony of nature and see grandeur and sublimity on every hand. He believed that the performance of duty and not the pursuit of happiness was the aim of this life. He died as he had lived, hating hypocrisy, frowning on falsehood, and despising deceit. Insincerity was an unknown element of his nature; sincerity a crowning feature of his every act. He loved life, and this world to him was a stern reality. He did not look on life as a drowsy dream nor death as an illusiv fantasy, but each as a philosophic fact. Yet, philosopher as he was, seeking facts, not fancies, his sympathetic, throbbing heart was thrilled with the enchanting ecstasies of rhythmical nature and the beauties and pleasures of life. He was courteous and pleasant, fair and honorable in his intercourse with fellow men, and no more truthful inscription can mark his last resting-place than, "Here lies an honest man." His affections were strong, and his death makes an aching void and an unhealing wound in the hearts of all who knew him. His family loses a kind husband and loving father, Andrew county an activ, upright, enterprising citizen, the city of Savannah one of our kindest-hearted and most intelligent neighbors. His lips are sealed in solemn silence. His eyes are closed forever. Friends, our neighbor, James D. McKnight, has gone to sleep.

Savannah, Mo., Jan. 25, 1889.

DIED.—Dec. 9, 1888, James McDonald, near Hackett, Ark., in his fifty-first year.

I hav been intimately acquainted with the deceased six years. He was a stanch Freethinker, a kind husband, an affectionate parent. At his burial, no Freethinker being present to officiate, nothing was said, as his family knew it was not his request for a clergyman to make an address at his burial. He was a man who was not afraid for the world to know he was an Infidel. A good Freethinker is gone, but his works still liv. His family are Liberal and intelligent, and will follow in his footsteps. The eldest daughter is an outspoken Liberal, and her influence in that vicinity will hav its effect.

Pauline, Ark. DR W. R. BACHELOR.

DIED—At Glenwood Col., Jan. 9, 1889, of stomach and bowel trouble, Tillman Everett, aged 71 years 2 months and 5 days; born in Christian county, Ky., Nov. 4, 1817.

Obeying one of the requests of my dying father, I send the above notice to THE TRUTH SEEKER. A few days before he died he called me to his bedside, and asked me if I would write an article to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

He said: "I want it distinctly understood that I die an Atheist. The idea of philosophers recanting on their deathbeds is all bosh. I am not much philosopher, but after reading after such men as Holbach, Huxley, Tyndall, and others, I cannot believe the doctrins of so called Christians. Christianity is simply paganism revamped. I hav no faith in this thing called 'Spiritualism,' neither ancient nor modern. I hav no fear of death, no more than going to a party or something of that kind."

Although he suffered considerably, the last day he passed gradually into unconsciousness and died easily. We placed him to rest in the beautiful cemetery upon the mountain, a few hundred feet above the city, where, with the silent rocks and the evergreens, he sleeps the placid sleep of nature, eternal as the grand old mountains that environ his sepulchral abode.

Though he was not as original as some men, his individuality was marked. He was a deep thinker, a good reasoner, and a constant companion of books of philosophers, ancient and modern. Voltaire and Paine were special favorits. He threw off the shackles of superstition in early manhood He had very little poetry in his soul, preferring dry facts, untouched by the tinge of poetical fervor.

THE TRUTH SEEKER was his favorit journal. He has been a subscriber almost from the first issue. Its founder with him was not only a martyr, but one of the greatest of modern heroes.

To rest beneath the evergreens,
Where peace o'er death doth bend,
Where the roar of distant waters
With the mountain echoes blend.

Sleep, sleep! all-soothing sleep!
Life's balm and final bourn.
Unladen now, all peace is thine,
And only the living mourn.

THOUGHTS ON SCIENCE, THEOLOGY, AND ETHICS.

BY JOHN WILSON, M.A.

The object of the book, as expressed in the preface, is to giv a correct sketch of the main lines of modern thought in small compass, and in language simple enough to be easily understood. In other words, it is a condensation of more voluminous writers, and classification of their definitions of science, theology, and ethics, and a statement of what belongs to each. As a text-book to clear thinking and logical reasoning, and a guide in forming scientific conclusions, this book is invaluable. The Literary Guide ranks it as "one of the foremost works of the present century;" while the Freethinker, in "heartily recommending it" as "simple and lucid in style, correct in thought, and ample in information," declares that it "is just the thing to put in the hands of a plain man who desires the best ideas on evolution in relation to science and ethics in a moderate compass."

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

ECCLESIASTICAL domination in Mexico is rapidly being superseded by civil rule, and Atheism is spreading.

THE New York Sun points out that by 1900 the number of Catholics in this country will be twenty millions.

MANY eminent Protestants, among whom is Canon Farrar, express concurrence in the pope's encyclical enjoining humility.

THE Indiana senate has made White Capping riotous conspiracy, punishable with two to fourteen years' imprisonment.

THE Presbyterian Journal says that the fight with Catholics over the schools is a "question of the national religion," and that "America is Protestant."

AT Pierre, Dak., recently, a coroner's jury rendered over the body of a boy a verdict of death from willful neglect caused by faith curers or Christian scientists.

REPUBLICANISM is spreading in Brazil, and there may be an attempt to prevent the accession to the throne of the fanatical Donna Isabel or her husband, Conde D'En.

THE pope's latest encyclical anathematizes "those who say that everything in the world is corporeal, and that men and beasts hav the same origin and similar natures."

FORTY clergymen called on Harrison on the 4th, and said that they "rejoice that the chief magistracy is to be intrusted to one who holds all Christian interests in sacred regard."

AN obstacle to the adoption of an educational qualification for suffrage is the liability of such action to charges of political design, as most negroes would be disfranchised.

THE "British Catholic Directory" gives the number of Catholics in the British empire: Ireland, 3,913,000; England and Wales, 1,360,000; Scotland, 327,000, and others making the total 9,730,000.

A. C. BOWE at New York city recently ran to the roof of his boarding-house shouting that the devil was after him, and was committed as insane. The others who believe in that sort of thing are still at large.

A CATHOLIC speaker givs as a reason why Catholic girls marry Protestants, that "they complain that Catholic young men do not make so faithful husbands, but spend too much time and money in saloons."

THE Catholic church, having held untaxed the site of their old seminary at Troy, N. Y., until land prices hav risen so that they hav sold it for $300,000, will add $100,000 to that sum and erect a new $400,000 edifice at New York city.

BUDDHISM, the religion most similar to Christianity in doctrins of antinaturalism and renunciation, seems meeting favor with some clergy here lately. The renunciation means renunciation of our worldly goods in favor of the priests.

THE LAST OF BALAAM.

And they slew the kings of Midian, besides the rest of them that were slain; namely, Evi, and Rekem, and Zur, and Hur, and Reba, five kings of Midian: Balaam also, the son of Beor, they slew with the sword.—Num. xxxi, 8.

Gems of Thought.

THE descent of Spain, once the first among monarchies, to the lowest depths of degradation, the elevation of Holland, in spite of many natura disadvantages, to a position such as no commonwealth so small has ever reached, teach the same lesson of the inimical influence of the Roman Catholic church. Whoever passes in Germany from a Roman Catholic to a Protestant municipality, in Switzerland from a Roman Catholic to a Protestant canton, in Ireland from a Roman Catholic to a Protestant county, finds that he has passed from a lower to a higher grade of civilization. On the other side of the Atlantic the same law prevails. The Protestants of the United States hav left far behind them the Roman Catholics of Mexico, Peru, and Brazil. The Roman Catholics of lower Canada remain inert, while the whole continent round them is in a ferment with Protestant activity and enterprise. The French hav doubtless shown an energy and an inteligence which, even when misdirected, hav justly entitled them to be called a great people. But this apparent exception, when examined, will be found to confirm the rule for in no country that is called Roman Catholic has the Roman Catholic church, during several generations, possessed so little authority as in France.—Macaulay's History of England.

FOR the nations of the Latin races, the chance of salvation offered by the Protestant revolt had come too late. The poison of antinaturalism had fastened upon their souls. They had lost not only their liberty, but their desire for liberation. The systematic murder of all avowed Freethinkers had emasculated the national mind. They had ceased to despise mental prostitution. They had come to enjoy the ceremonies and wretched mummeries of their church. Spain and Portugal hav sunk to the level of the East-Buddhistic nations. Ireland, southern Germany, and southern France still sleep; and Greece will awake no more.—Prof. Felix L. Oswald, in The Secret of the East.

PHILOSOPHERS are detestable in the eyes of the church. The rascals hav the impudence to warn the people that while they are looking up to heaven, as they are told to do, the strings of their purses are being cut here below.—Voltaire.

A THEOLOGIAN has the same hatred and fear of science as one has of a wicked dog by which he has got terribly worried.—John Wilson, M. A., in Thoughts on Science, Theology, and Ethics.

THE church has the malice of the caught, the hatred of the exposed.—Ingersoll.

WELL does religion suit with tyranny! and well hav all tyrants known the fact!—Robert Dale Owen.

THE king made laws, the priest made creeds. With bowed backs the people received the burdens of the one, and with wonder's open mouth the dogmas of the other. If any aspired to be free, they were slaughtered by the king, and every priest was a Herod who slaughtered the children of the brain. The king ruled by force, the priest by fear, and both by both. The king said to the people: "God made you peasants, and he made me king. He made rags and hovels for you, robes and palaces for me. Such is the justice of God." And the priest said: "God made you ignorant and vile. He made me holy and wise. If you do not obey me, God will punish you here and torment you hereafter. Such is the mercy of God." The history of intellectual progress is written in the lives of Infidels. Political rights hav been preserved by traitors—the liberty of the mind by heretics. To attack the king was treason—to dispute the priest was blasphemy. The sword and cross were allies. They defended each other. The throne and the altar were twins—vultures from the same egg. It was James I. who said: "No bishop, no king." He might hav said: "No cross, no crown." The king owned the bodies, and the priests the souls, of men. One lived on taxes, the other on alms. One was a robber, the other a beggar.—Ingersoll.

Odds and Ends.

THE stars of a ballet form the constellation of the Great Bare.

"I HEAR Parson Putup talking in the parlor." "No; that is our new minister." "New minister! Why, it is the same old voice!"

HE: "Become mine, Louise, and through life I will treat you like an angel." She: "That means nothing to eat and nothing to wear. I don't like the idea."

HUSBAND: "Well, yes; I—I think it is." Wife: "Well, the next time I catch you talking to the girl, I'll discharge her and do the cooking myself." That cured him.

TOMMY: "I wouldn't want to be the preacher's little boy." Aunt: "Why?" "Oh, he's got hundreds and hundreds of slippers. They are scattered all over the house."

How shall we giv our boys a taste for elevating and refining books? Buy a few more Sunday papers with full descriptions of Whitechapel murders and comic actresses, and talk over the things in their presence.

AN excited clergyman wrote to a Washington editor asking if it was true that there would be dancing at Harrison's inauguration. "Yes," replied the editor, "and you had better engage your partners now. Ther'll be a rush."

THE minister (with severity): "And so you do not believe everything you learn at Sunday-school, Richard?" Richard: "No, sir; not everything." The minister: "My little boy does." Richard: "Yes, sir. I suppose your little boy has to."

AT a hugging bee for the benefit of a church along the upper Hudson a few evenings since, a man, while blindfolded, hugged his wife for several minutes without knowing who he was hugging. When he did find out he wanted his fifteen cents back.

THE Rev. Mr. Behindthetimes: "Emily, will you please send out and get a Sunday paper? I am—er—preparing to preach a sermon against Sunday newspapers, and I must hav one to examin."

Wife (to daughters up-stairs): "Girls, if you hav finished looking through the bargain announcements in that paper, bring it down. Your father wants it."

LAWYER: "Will your honor put the usual question to the witness as to his religious belief?" Judge: "Witness, do you believe in the existence of a supreme being that controls the affairs of men?" Witness: "Yawohl, shudge, dot vas my wife, Katrina. Dot voman vas der boss!"

"VELL," said Mr. Isaacstein to his clerk as he took off his coat, "how vos peezniss vile I vos oud?" "I sold a two-dollar pistol," replied the clerk. "Dot vos goot, Jacob—goot." "De shentleman wanted it to blow his brains oud," continued Jacob. "Oh," said Mr. Isaacstein, dubiously, "dot vos bad, very bad. He vould haf paid five tollars."

UNCLE 'RASTUS (who has caused the arrest of his wife for assault): "I want yo' ter gib it to her, jedge; gib her de limick ob de law. Dis ain't de fust time she 'saulted me." Judge: "I'm afraid, aunty, I'll hav to fine you $10." Aunty: "Well, yo' honah, I ain't got ten cents." Judge (to Uncle 'Rastus): "It'll be $10, Uncle 'Rastus." Uncle 'Rastus (handing over the money with a bewildered look as who should say, This may be right or this may be wrong): "All right, jedge; dere's de money." (To wife as they leave court together): "Dar, ole woman, I trus' dis yer sperience'll l'arn yo' a lesson what yo' won' forgit."

THE lights were burning low, and the room was filled with a mysterious, all-pervading air of serene contentment. The clock ticked on unheeded, its silvery chimes ringing out at intervals undisturbed. It seemed as though the earth were wrapped in a cloak of happy, joyous bliss, so perfect was the sense of pleasure unalloyed. Suddenly, from a corner of the room, came a voice stealing over the joyous stillness of the air like the sound of distant music. "Dearest, don't you think it's growing late?" "Ye-es, George, love." "It must be after ten o'clock, my angel." "Ye-e-es, George, dear." "Hadn't I better go, sweetheart?" "No! no! no!" And then over them all fell a cloud of sweetness so heavy that it might hav been borne away in a scoop-shovel.

To the Senate of the United States:

We, the undersigned, adult residents of the United States, do hereby respectfully but earnestly petition your honorable body NOT to pass any bill in regard to the observance of Sunday, or any other religious institution or rite.

We also petition you NOT to adopt any resolution for the amendment of the national Constitution that would by instruction in public schools or in any other way give preference to religious principles over the views of religion held by non-religious persons, but to keep the government strictly secular, and the separation of church and state complete.

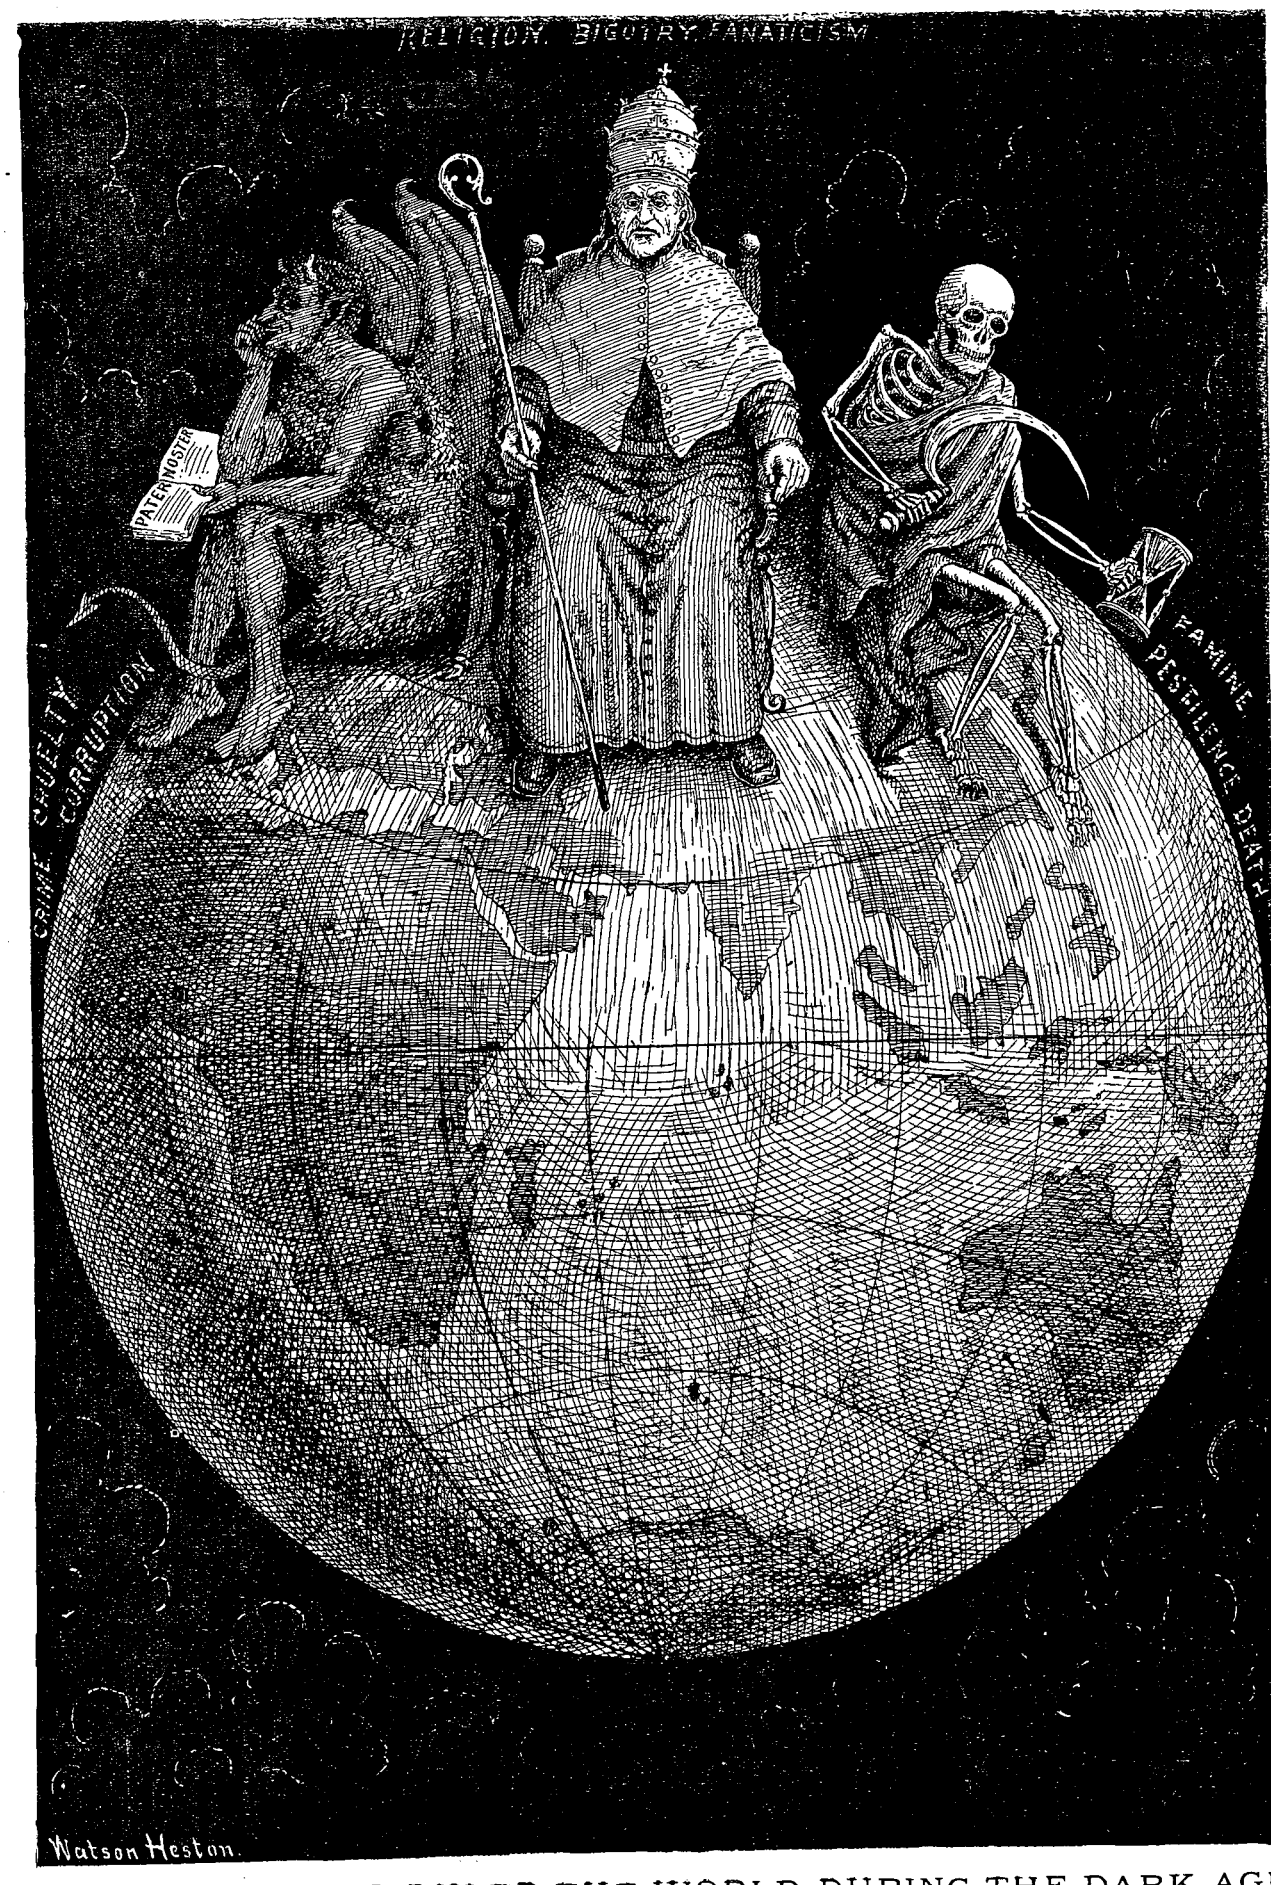
Notes and Clippings.



A MINISTER of one of Trinity church's parishes estimates that fully twenty per cent of the inhabitants of this town are "professed unbelievers, who under no ordinary circumstances can be induced to attend church."

REVIVALIST HARRISON told a Sun reporter that he gets $100 a week and expenses. Mr. Ackerman, of Brooklyn, wrote to say that Harrison was a humbug. The Sun comments: "There are many other religious people who hold the same opinion, but it seems to us that the word humbug, which means deceiver, is too rough. We hav no doubt that Brother Harrison believes in his own sermons and has faith in his peculiar methods of revivalism. It is his mercenary spirit, as described by himself, to which we object. The terms which he demands are beyond all reason for such work as he does."

AVERAGE Egyptians and the residents of the Isthmus of Panama look at isthmus canals from very different standpoints. The people at Panama believe the great De Lesseps ditch will add boundlessly to their prosperity if it is ever completed, and the troubles of the late canal company hav been a source of great anxiety to all dwellers on the isthmus. The Egyptians believe, however, that the Suez canal is at the bottom of all their evils. They say it not only cost the lives of many hundreds of their people during the excavations, but it also helped to bankrupt the country by the debt it imposed, and diverted from their railroads thousands of tons of freight. Their great grievance is that while property worth millions passes through their country in the canal, not a penny of it helps to enrich the land, and they think the canal has been a curse instead of a blessing to Egypt.

THE evening Telegram of the 7th inst. said: "It is sad to think that when Col. Robert G. Ingersoll leaves this 'mysterious life to enter the equally mysterious hereafter,' there will be no one in this world, which he loves so well, who can be called upon to speak at his grave with the same profound eloquence with which he has so often moved people to tears. Colonel Ingersoll's funeral oration at the bier of Mary Fiske was a garland of beautiful words wrought with an eloquence that was of the music of angels. It charmed the ear, while it moved to tears many who hav stood beside graves time and again without giving vent even to a sigh."

A BILL has been introduced in the Michigan House of Representativs to protect unsophisticated citizens against the wiles of adventuresses who may attempt to marry them for their money. It provides that all the real and personal estate of every male acquired before marriage by gift, grant, inheritance, or in any other manner, except a homestead, shall be and remain the sole property of such male, and may be sold, mortgaged, and bequeathed by such male in the same manner as if he were unmarried.

THE TRINITY THAT RULED THE WORLD DURING THE DARK AGES.

A RECENT German statistical work estimates the total number of inhabitants on the globe at 1,435,000,000. The total of religions is 1,100. There are, according to this statistician, 432,000,000 adherents of Christianity. The Roman Catholics number 208,000,000; the Greek Orthodox church 83,000,000; the Protestant churches 123,000,000. Besides these there are about one hundred sects with 8,000,000 followers. Of the non-Christian peoples the Jews number about 8,000,000; the Mohammedans about 120,000,000, and there are fully seventy smaller sects. These constitute the monotheistic religions of the globe. The rest number altogether 875,000,000 souls. The strongest of the non-Christian religions numerically are Brahmanism with 138,000,000 devotees and Buddhism with 503,000,000. The other religions hav 135,000,000 adherents. In other words, there are on the globe more than 1,000,000,000 non-Christians.

UNIVERSAL peace among the Christian nations of Europe is still afar off. Seven nations —Germany, France, Russia, Italy, Austria, Turkey, and the Balkan states—says the Herald, show a war strength of 10,480,000 men. To this are added the second reserves, 8,335,000, and the final reserves, 9,195,000, in all 28,000,000 of Europeans, in the prime of manhood, liable to be exposed in the next war.

THE American Sabbath Union—which in spite of the word "Sabbath" is a Christian association—is moving briskly for the passage by Congress of a "National Sunday Rest" law. Exactly what Congress has to do with the matter, says the Detroit Free Press, beyond regulating or prohibiting Sunday work by employees of the federal government, the transportation of mails on that day, and a few matters of that kind, the Union does not say. But there will always be people and associations, probably, who will regard Congress as the proper body to do anything which they think ought to be done, without any regard to the purposes for which Congress was instituted or the limitations on its powers.

THE Catholics of Canada are still showing their superiority over the government. John A. Flanagan and Emma Murphy, Catholics, were married at Quebec by a Presbyterian clergyman under a license signed by the lieutenant governor. Three days afterward the bride was induced to leave her husband by relativs, who assured her that the marriage was invalid. It is claimed that under the French law, which governs such cases in this province, the marriage of Catholics by a Protestant clergyman is not binding or legal. The Catholic church is determined to make a test case out of the affair, with a view to legislation prohibiting the issue of civil marriage licenses to members of that church.

THE Living Church (P. E.) says: "Any contention between the 'Evangelical' and Catholic elements of the church is very much to be deplored. They ought to join hands in defense of the faith. The issue is not to-day between high church and low church, but between Christianity and Rationalism. It is not whether we may hav flowers and lights on the altar, but whether we may hav any supernatural at all in our religion. Oh, the pity of it, that bishops and standing committees should ostracise men whose great fault is reverence for the Lord in his holy temple, while there are clergy preaching the incarnation as a 'philosophy,' and treating the Pentateuch as a myth!"

Conspiracy Against the Republic.

BLAIR AMENDMENT TO THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION.

Too many amendments to the Constitution are contemplated, and it is not clear that too many hav not already been made.

The first eight amendments, which may be called the National Bill of Rights, were of doubtful necessity or utility. Alexander Hamilton, who, on account of his consummate wisdom, and because of his tact and skill in carrying the grand work through some of its most difficult stages, has been called the Father of the Constitution, thought, that as the very purpose of the Constitution was to secure the blessings of liberty, this declaration was a better recognition of popular rights than that contained in the elaborate declaration of rights in every state constitution. The same idea is embodied in the reason given in the Federalist, why the constitution had not given a bill of rights; because the reservation of powers without a bill of rights was larger than a reservation of powers with a bill of rights.

Several of the states, however, were fearful that too much power would be claimed and exercised by the new government which was being formed. They insisted upon amendments, which should guard the rights of the states and of the people against encroachments of federal power. Such amendments were proposed by several of the states, and though they were not made conditional to the ratification of the Constitution, there was a general understanding that those of them which were considered of most importance would be adopted.

In New York an effort was made to make the amendments conditional, and was only defeated by a vote of 31 to 27.

After the first eight amendments, constituting the Bill of Rights, had been tacitly agreed upon, it was feared that the very adoption of these might raise an implication that they contained all that the people would insist upon as against the government; hence a ninth was thought necessary, as follows:

> The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

To this was added a tenth, as follows:

> The powers not granted to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectivly or to the people.

These ten amendments were at various times, from 1789 to 1791, adopted in a body.

The eleventh amendment was occasioned by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Chisholm, Exr. v. Georgia, 2 Dallas' Rep. p. 419.

This was a suit brought by a citizen of South Carolina against the state of Georgia; and the question was, whether the Supreme Court had jurisdiction in case of a suit brought against a state by a citizen of another state.

The question was argued at the February term, 1793, and decided by five judges to one in favor of the jurisdiction.

The decision caused a good deal of excitement. Hence the Eleventh Amendment, as follows:

> The judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another state, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign state.

This was proposed by Congress in 1794, and was declared in force January 8, 1798.

The occasion of the Twelfth Amendment was the bitter struggle in Congress to determin who should be president after the presidential election of 1800. The excitement which had been caused by the long contest in the House, resulting in the election of Jefferson, had made apparent the necessity of a change in the mode of electing president.

The amendment was proposed Dec. 12, 1803, and proclaimed Sept. 25, 1804.

Then came a long period of quiet so far as Constitutional changes were concerned—a quiet which lasted over sixty years. Not until about the close of the civil war was there any further amendment.

The Thirteenth Amendment, proclaimed, ratified, in December, 1865, declared that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, should exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

The word slave was not in the Constitution, and though slavery existed in this country when the Constitution was formed, it was expected that the slave states would soon adopt measures looking toward gradual emancipation. The inconsistency of slavery with the fundamental law was felt and frequently adverted to. By general consent the Constitution was so framed that when slavery should be abolished, the charter of our government would be found perfectly adapted to the new order of things, and posterity would look in vain into the Constitution for any evidence that such a system as slavery had existed.

Such being the case, the Thirteenth Amendment, except as a sanction of the Emancipation Proclamation rendered necessary by the war, and as a guarantee that it should be carried into effect, would not hav been necessary.

The suffrage amendments introduced a new departure in the relation of the states to the general government.

The theory of our government in its organization was, that the regulation of the suffrage and the conditions upon which it should be exercised, should, with certain exceptions, be left to the control of the states. In each state the citizen may contend, and justly contend, that suffrage is a right of citizenship; that as a citizen of the state he is entitled to the suffrage as a matter of right, subject to uniform regulations in common with other citizens. But this contention is between him and the state government; between him and the electors in his own state. As a citizen of the United States, all the right he had previous to the war in regard to the suffrage was to claim the benefit of the second section of the fourth Article of the Constitution, and the right, under the second section of the first Article, to vote for Congressmen.

The Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments having been adopted as a part of the reconstruction measures rendered necessary by the war, introduced a radical change in this respect in our form of government. The Fourteenth, declared ratified in the summer of 1868, prescribes a penalty for denying the suffrage to certain classes of citizens, while the Fifteenth, proclaimed in March, 1870, substantially guarantees the electiv franchise to those classes in all the states, at all general elections, state as well as national.

From this brief history of the amendments made up to the present time, it will sufficiently appear that the first ten were substantially a part of the original Constitution, while the last five hav been made to meet certain exigencies in the history and administration of the government.

The civil war rendered necessary the exercise of extraordinary powers on the part of the general government for its own preservation. But it did not entirely change our form of government, nor did it destroy the autonomy of the Southern states. Their continued existence as states was implied in the very term Reconstruction.

No republic with a single government—what may be called a centralized republic—has ever endured for any considerable period of time, except San Marino, a republic of twenty-two square miles in extent, and containing about eight thousand inhabitants; and no federativ or non-centralized republic has endured for any great length of time; those now in existence being all of comparativly recent formation.

The republican form of government is, therefore, still upon trial.

Of the federativ republics which hav perished, the two most notable examples hav been the Grecian states under the Achaian League and the Hanseatic Federation. While other things contributed to the downfall of these republics, no candid inquirer can fail to come to the conclusion that one of the most potent causes was the difficulty of maintaining a proper balance of power between the general and local governments.

The fathers of our republic studied carefully this balance of power, and guided by the light of history, they placed such safeguards against encroachments of federal jurisdiction on the one hand, and against usurpation of power by the states on the other, that the mixed government thus established has for a hundred years commanded the respect and admiration of the world. There is every reason to believe that the perpetuity of the republic depends largely upon the preservation of this balance of power.

To say that the federal government is one of delegated powers, is simply to repeat what every student well understands. But the powers of the state government are inherent in the people of the state, and in the state legislature, as representing the people. There are certain limitations placed upon the exercise of that power. Some of these limitations hav been established by the people of the United States in the federal Constitution—some by the people of the state in the state constitution—others necessarily result from a republican form of government. But within these limitations the states are sovereign. They possess what has been well designated by jurists as quasi-sovereignty; while as to foreign states or communities, the people of the United States, represented by the federal government, constitute the state.

This state sovereignty, except as limited in the manner described, should be sacredly respected. It is just as dangerous for the federal government to encroach upon the rights of the states as it would be for the states to usurp the power of the general government. Every disturbance of this balance of power is fraught with danger to our institutions.

The motto of Illinois is, "State Sovereignty—National Union." But the states can maintain their sovereignty only by acting in concert. Let, therefore, the motto of Kentucky be added, "United we stand—divided we fall."

Every Amendment to the Constitution is a change in our form of government; and every change tending to the centralization of power, is a blow at the liberties of the people. Under our form of government, the rights and liberties of the citizens can only be preserved by maintaining the rights of the states. Let the people once become habituated to surrendering the rights of their states to the general government, and they will soon reconcile themselvs to the surrender to the same power, of their rights as individuals.

The Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, taking jurisdiction over subjects which, under our system of government, were, with the exceptions stated, under the control of the states, could only be justified by the condition of the country after the war, and should not be regarded as precedents for the still further derangement of our federativ system.

The Blair Amendment, proposed in a time of profound peace, is a plain encroachment upon the rights of the states, and is not called for by any such emergency as gave rise to the other Amendments. The right to legislate upon the subject of education, is in that vast reservoir of rights which are reserved to the states, not only by the 10th Amendment but by our very form of government.

The original Constitution gave to Congress no power over the subject of religion or of education. The Blair Amendment proposes for the first time to giv Congress such power. Where is this encroachment upon the rights of the states to stop?

The joint resolution introduced by Senator Blair, proposing his Amendment, provides, that

> Each state in this Union shall establish and maintain a system of free public schools adequate for the education of all the children living therein, between the ages of six and sixteen years, inclusiv, in the common branches of knowledge, and in virtue, morality, and the principles of the Christian religion.

What are the principles of the Christian religion? If the question could be determined by reference to the teachings of Christ, there would be less difficulty attending the matter. But Jesus had far less to do in establishing the Christian religion than Paul; and Paul said, "If anyone preach any other gospel unto you than that ye hav received, let him him be accursed." Is this one of the principles of the Christian religion? It was the hypocrits whom Jesus denounced; but Paul denounced also those who honestly differed with him in opinion.

In some respects Paul was one of the most remarkable men that ever lived. In his moments of enthusiasm and of spiritual exaltation, he gave forth some of the grandest utterances recorded in the pages of history. Nevertheless he was a persecutor, by temperament and practice. Before his conversion he had persecuted the Christians, making havoc of the church, entering into every house, haling men and women and committing them to prison (Acts viii, 3), pursuing them relentlessly, even unto death (Acts xxvi, 10).

There is sufficient reason to believe that in this respect his nature, after conversion, was essentially the same as before. He hurls his anathema at heretics, not only in the passage cited (Gal. i, 8, 9), but in various others. In 1 Cor. xvi, 22, he says, "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be anathema maran-atha." In 2 Thess. i, 8, he pictures the Lord Jesus as "taking vengeance" on those who obey not his gospel. In 1 Tim. i, 20, he says that Hymeneus and Alexander, who had departed from the faith, he had "delivered unto Satan." In 2 Tim. iv, 14: "Alexander the coppersmith did me much evil; the Lord reward him according to his works." In Titus i, 11, referring to those in the church who were unruly, and vain talkers and deceivers, he declares that their "mouths must be stopped," and in Gal. v, 12, he says, "I would they were even cut off, who trouble you."

An attempt has been made to break the force of this passage, by claiming that the apostle meant only that the offenders should be cut off from the church; but that he had power to direct. This is something which he "would" could be done. The Greek verb is apokopsontai, from kopto, "to strike, smite, cut." Apokopto, "to cut off, to hew off." It is manifest that the words "I would that they were cut off," had a deeper significance than mere expulsion from the church, coming as they did from one who had been accustomed to persecute even unto death those holding a different religious faith from his own.

This disposition of Paul must hav been well understood by the author of the story related in Acts xiii, 8–11, where the apostle is represented as punishing with blindness that "child of the devil," Elymas, who withstood Paul, seeking to turn away the deputy from the faith.

The Inquisition, which did its bloody work for so many hundred years, like everything else, had a cause. It found at least some excuse in the fierce denunciations of heretics by Paul, and in the reported killing of Ananias and Sapphira at the word of Peter. As late as the middle of the present century, an approved Catholic historian commented upon this transaction in the following terms:

The sudden death with which they [Ananias and Sapphira] were smitten at the feet of the prince of the apostles, demonstrated to the faithful, that they could not with impunity deceive the ministers of the Lord" (Darras, Hist. Cath. Ch. vol. 1, p. 31).

The History of the Church by Darras was indorsed by Pope Pius IX, August 8, 1855.

The Inquisition found still further support in a document in general circulation in the early ages of the church, and then considered of high authority. It was called the Epistle of Clement to James; and a translation of it may be found in the 17th volume of the Ante-Nicene Christian Library.

In this epistle Clement describes his ordination. He says when Peter was about to die, the brethren being assembled (at Rome), he laid his hands on Clement, as the bishop, and communicated to him the power of binding and loosing, etc., and as to him who should grieve the president of the truth, after declaring that such a one sins against Christ, and offends the father of all, Peter proceeded as follows:

Wherefore, he shall not liv; and therefore it becomes him who presides, to hold the place of a physician; and not to cherish the rage of an irrational beast.

When, afterward, the church, having grown strong and dominant, found itself possessed of civil power, or safe from interference, what more natural than that it should undertake to rid itself of those making trouble in the church by employing the means for which it found such sanction?

The Spanish Inquisition of the fifteenth century was the successor of the Dominican Inquisition of the thirteenth century. This in its turn was the legitimate outgrowth of the papal and episcopal persecutions of the preceding ages, which had been continued, with but little interruption, from the edict of Constantine in 316, against the Donatists, and that of Theodosius, in 382, against the Manichæans, who were punished with confiscation and death. Thus has persecution been a handmaid of the church for fourteen hundred years, commencing at a period but little removed from the time of the apostles. No other religion, in the history of the world, has been attended with so much persecution.

Nor has it been confined to the Roman Catholic church. Nearly every sect of the Christian religion has sought to defend and strengthen itself by persecution, whenever it has found itself armed with the sword of civil authority. The bloody persecutions of the Catholics by Protestants in Great Britain and elsewhere, are well known to every student of history. Equally well known are the persecutions of the Baptists, Quakers, and others in this country.

Among the laws of Connecticut of 1650, are the following:

If any man or woman be a Witch, that is, hath or consulteth with a familiar spirit, they shall be put to death (Ex. xxii, 18; Lev. xx, 27; Deut. xviii, 10, 11).

If any man, after legal conviction, shall hav or worship any other God than the Lord God, hee shall bee put to death (Deut. xiii, 6; xvii, 2; Ex. xxii, 20).

Among the laws of Massachusetts (General Laws of Plymouth, published in 1658), is one reciting that "of late time the Quakers hav bine furnished with horses, and thereby they hav not onely the more speedy passage from place to place, to the poisoning of the inhabitants with theire cursed tenetts, but alsoe therby hav escaped the hands of the officers that might otherwise hav apprehended them;" it was therefore enacted that the horses furnished them or which were brought into the country by them should be forfeited to the government (Brigham's Compact, etc., of New Plymouth, Boston 1836, p. 127).

If any person should permit a meeting of Quakers in his house, he was to be publicly whipped or pay £5 (Ibid. p. 131).

The ministry were supported by taxation (Ibid. p. 186).

The following may be taken as a specimen of the laws enacted under a religious rule:

If any man had a stubborn or rebellious son sixteen years or more of age, he or the mother could bring him before the magistrates, and "such a son shall be put to death" (Deut. xxi, 20, 21). See Connecticut Blue laws of 1650.

Here was a cruel and inhuman enactment of a distant land, thousands of years old, brought to this country and put into the form of law, because it was found within the lids of a religious book. Could anything more vividly illustrate the danger of religious legislation? And having once accomplished the divorce of church and state, shall we now take the back track with such beacon warnings before us?

In the "establishment of civil government by the free planters of the colony of New Haven," June 4, 1639, it was enacted,

That Church Members only shall be free Burgesses, and they only shall chuse magistrates, etc. (Conn. Code of 1650, p. 18).

What guaranty hav we that this law of suffrage will not be reënacted, if the church gets control of the state?

That we hav no such guaranty is manifest. Listen to an exponent of the National Reform religion, writing in the Christian Statesman of Nov. 1, 1883:

What effect would the adoption of the Christian amendment, together with the proposed changes in the Constitution, hav upon those who deny that God is the sovereign, Christ the ruler, and the Bible the law? This brings up the conscience question at once. . . . The classes who would object are, as THE TRUTH SEEKER has said, Jews, Infidels, Atheists, and others. These classes are perfectly satisfied with the Constitution as it is. How would they stand toward it, if it recognized the authority of our Lord Jesus Christ? To be perfectly plain, I believe that the existence of a Christian Constitution would disfranchise every logically consistent Infidel.

In the Statesman of Feb. 21, 1884, Mr. J. C. K. Milligan, writing upon the same subject, said: "The worst result will be to disfranchise them."

Those who are endeavoring to establish a national religion do not admit that they are working for a union of church and state, but at the same time they advocate the supremacy of the church over the state. They avow their purpose to bring the whole land under the control of a religion the principles of which would hav to be authoritativly determined.

President Seelye, of Amherst College, in an article published in the Forum for July, 1886, entitled, "Should the State Teach Religion?" (a question which he answers in the affirmativ) after stating that religious instruction of a people is indispensable, and that the family would not and could not provide it, also that "the church is confessedly not doing this work, and unless you giv it the ubiquity and power of the state, the church neither will nor can do it," said:

The state should provide for instruction in the gospels for its own preservation. If the conscience of its subjects approve, well; if not, the state will be cautious, but courageous also, and if it is wise, it will not falter.

The word "subjects" was well chosen by President Seelye to designate the citizens of a free country, whom he proposes to bring under his religio-political despotism.

In a speech in Kansas City, Sam Small, a prominent worker in this movement, said:

I want to see the day come when the church shall be the arbiter of all legislation, state, national, and municipal; when the great churches of the country can come together harmoniously and issue their edict, and the legislativ powers will respect it and enact it into laws.

In March, 1884, Rev. J. W. Foster, in the columns of the Christian Statesman, said:

According to the scriptures, the state and its sphere exist for the sake of and to serve the interests of the church. . . . The expenses of the church in carrying on her public aggressiv work, it meets in whole or in part out of the public treasury.

What is this in fact but a union of church and state, except that the church instead of the state is to be in the ascendency? The change of conditions would be far from being an improvement.

The editor of the Statesman does not advocate union of church and state, but says:

It is the duty of the state as such to enter into alliance with the church of Christ, and to profess, adhere to, defend, and maintain the true religion.

The spirit of the Inquisition is not yet extinct, nor are its methods entirely foreign to the purposes of many of those engaged in this religious crusade against the Constitution. Their hearts are filled with bitterness and hatred toward those who differ with them in opinion in religious matters. They would fain strike them to the earth as Peter was supposed to hav struck Ananias and Sapphira.

Rev. E. B. Graham, one of the vice-presidents of the National Reform Association, an organization whose special object is to secure an amendment to the Constitution, making Christianity the national religion, said in an address delivered at York, Neb., reported in the Christian Statesman of May 21, 1885:

If the opponents of the Bible do not like our government and its Christian features, let them go to some wild, desolate land, and in the name of the devil, and for the sake of the devil, subdue it, and set up a government of their own on Infidel and Atheistic ideas; and then, if they can stand it, stay there till they die.

At Lake Side, O., in August, 1887, Dr. McAllister said:

Those who oppose this work now will discover, when the religious amendment is made to the Constitution, that if they do not see fit to fall in with the majority, they must abide the consequences or seek some more congenial clime.

In a speech in a convention of the same National Reform Association, held in New York in February, 1873, Rev. Jonathan Edwards, D.D., said:

We want state and religion—and we are going to hav it. It shall be that so far as the affairs of state require religion; it shall be revealed religion, the religion of Jesus Christ. . . . The Atheist is a dangerous man. . . . Tolerate Atheism, sir! There is nothing out of hell I would not tolerate as soon. . . . Atheism and Christianity are contradictory terms. They are incompatible systems. They cannot dwell together on the same continent.

The spirit here exhibited is the same as that which left its footprints in the "Blue laws" of several of the American colonies. It is inherited from the Inquisition, and turns for its justification or excuse to the teachings of those who founded the Christian religion.

Those animated by this spirit can even coolly contemplate the contingency of a war to be prosecuted for the establishment of the Christian religion. Said Rev. M. A. Gault, in the Statesman of April 1, 1886, "It cost us all our civil war to blot slavery out of our Constitution, and it may cost us another war to blot out its Infidelity."

In reference to this phase of the subject, a timely warning was given by Mr. Abbott, editor of the Index, in a protest against the movement, which he was permitted to present at the national convention of the National Reform Association, held in Cincinnati in 1872. He said:

I make no threat whatever, but I state a truth fixed as the hills when I say that before you can carry this measure and trample on the freedom of the people, you will hav to wade through seas of blood. Every man who favors it votes to precipitate the most frightful war of modern times.

To accomplish their purpose, the fanatics who are engaged in this enterprise are willing to unite with those whom they and their ancestors hav been abusing for centuries—the Roman Catholics.

"Whenever," said the Christian Statesman of Dec. 11, 1884, "they [the Roman Catholics] are willing to coöperate in resisting the political progress of Atheism, we will gladly join hands with them."

In the Statesman of August 31, 1881, Rev. Sylvester F. Scovel said:

We may be subjected to some rebuffs in our first proffers, and the time has not yet come when the Roman church will consent to strike hands with other churches as such; but the time has come to make repeated advances, and gladly to accept coöperation in any form in which they may be willing to exhibit it. It is one of the necessities of the situation.

Said Dr. A. A. Hodge, of Princeton, in an article in the Princeton Review, for January, 1887:

All we hav to do is for Catholics and Protestants—disciples of a common master—to come to a common understanding with respect to a common basis of what is received as general Christianity; a practical quantity of truth belonging equally to both sides to be recognized in general legislation, and especially in the literature and teaching of our public schools.

Said the Christian Union, of Jan. 26, 1888:

It is quite possible that the time may come when the real issue will be between the Theist and the Atheist. . . . Whenever that time comes, the Protestant and the Catholic will stand side by side in a common defense of those common beliefs which hav been their mutual possession these many centuries.

At the Saratoga National Reform meeting, Aug. 15–17, 1887, a motion was adopted requesting the National Reform Association to undertake to secure a basis of agreement with the Roman Catholic authorities. And these newly made friends are already working together in Washington to forward the religious legislation there pending.

Now, who are the Atheists, who, by this grand religio-political combination of orthodox Protestants and Roman Catholics, are to be driven from the country?

Cousin, the eclectic philosopher, maintains, with a good deal of force, that properly speaking, there can not be, in the last analysis, any such thing as Atheism. He says:

It is sufficient for you to hav the idea of the imperfect and the finite in order to hav the idea of the infinit and the perfect, that is, of God; though you may not thus name him; though you may be able to express in words the spontaneous convictions of your intelligence, or for want of language and analysis, they may remain obscure and indistinct in the depths of your soul (Hist. Mod. Philosophy, vol. 2, p. 420).

This simple and beautiful explanation of Cousin, who, imbued with the spirit of charity, would deny the possibility of Atheism, is not acceptable to the religionists of the day. They must hav Atheists, and they must hav the privilege of defining an Atheist. An Atheist is one whose idea of the infinit is different from theirs. Or, an Atheist is one who does not believe in a personal God. Or, an Atheist is one who does not accept "Our Christ." Whatever may be the definition finally agreed upon—and it would hav to be settled eventually by a Supreme Court chosen in the interests of the national religion—an Atheist, thus defined, is to be placed outside the Constitution; is to be no longer entitled to the benefit of its provisions. He is to be disfranchised and outlawed, and driven from the country. Even those who did the most in founding our government, would not, if living, be permitted to participate in its blessings.

It is time the people arouse to a sense of the danger which is menaced to their free institutions, and realize the attempt which is being made against their liberties.

Some of the religious journals oppose the movement; among others, the ably conducted American Sentinel, published at Oakland, Cal. The only considerable national organization which is effectually making opposition, is the American Secular Union.

It is a question that interests the so-called Atheists not only—it interests all classes. For no sooner will the Constitution be placed under the control of the Christian religion by the combined forces of Protestants and Catholics—and it can be done in no other way—than the question will immediately arise, which of the allied armies best represents the Christian religion? The Catholics hav the older title, having themselvs made the Bible, and it may turn out that they will vindicate their right to control the Constitution. In that case those who originated the movement may find themselvs called upon to drink of the cup which they had prepared for the Atheists.

If, on the other hand, the Protestants should prevail, the next question will be, which branch of them, or which denomination, or sect, or combination of sects, is best entitled to speak for the Christian religion, and therefore best entitled to say what shall be taught in the public schools under the amended Constitution?

It is no answer to say that the Blair Amendment provides that no public money shall be expended for instruction or training in the doctrins of any religious sect, and that such peculiar doctrins shall not be taught. The fact would still remain, that one sect or combination of sects might say what should be taught, and with such power in their hands, this provision of the Amendment would be of but little practical value.

Nor does it essentially detract from the dangerous character of the proposed Amendment, that the author has the inconsistency to declare, in the first section, that "No state shall ever make or maintain any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." This is a mere subterfuge. What more efficacious law respecting the establishment of a religion could its votaries desire, than an Act requiring the principles or doctrins of that religion to be taught at the public expense; thus compelling those who do not believe in such religion to pay for promulgating its doctrins to the youth of the country?

The ecclesiastical power has already lost its hold upon the reason and conscience of the masses. This attempt to get control of the Constitution is a desperate effort to bring the aid of the civil power to the support of a "lost cause."

The attempt should meet with a prompt and merited rebuke. Let church and state remain forever separate. Let us heed the maxims and warnings of the founders, the defenders, and the preservers of the republic—of Madison and Hamilton, of Washington and Paine, of Jefferson, of Lincoln, and of Grant. Let not a spirit of persecution worthy only of the Middle Ages find sanction and encouragement under the stars and stripes which hav been dedicated to liberty. Let the Constitution remain what our fathers intended it to be, the common heritage of a great, a generous, and a free people.

CHARLES B. WAITE.

A Petition for Ministers to Sign.

From San Francisco Freethought.

To the Honorable, the Senate and House of Repre entativs of the United States of America:

GREETING AND BENEDICTION: Your honorable body (or bodies) is (or are) doubtless aware that a bill under the name and title of the "Blair Sunday Rest bill" is now pending before your honorable body (or bodies) providing for the prohibition of all secular work upon the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday.

Now we, citizens of the United States, having reached (and some of us passed) the age of discretion, would solemnly move that the said bill be amended, before passage, by striking out the word "secular."

And for the following reasons: We, who comprise a large body of citizens (forming a profession), known as priests, preachers, dominies, sky-pilots, and ministers of the gospel, by the provisions of the said bill, as it now reads, would be wholly deprived of the blessings of the proposed legislation.

It is notorious that we, members of the aforesaid sacred profession, numbering some eighty thousand, many of us moral, are now, habitually, in a most shameful manner, compelled by our employers to perform services upon the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, in the way of preaching, praying, and reading hymns, to the utter disregard of the Lord's day, to the total demoralization of the community, and to the manifest peril of our souls.

On that day when all nature sleeps, when rivers forget to run down to the sea, when mankind rest (and womankind if they get a chance), when the gin-mill is accessible only by means of the side entrance, shall we, respectable (and often moral) citizens of this republic, be forced by a tyrannical congregation to work ourselvs into a copious perspiration hammering the cover off the word of God? In the name of home and foreign missions, we protest.

Let us hav a United States Sabbath, when no citizen under the bright shadow of the ship of state and the broad ægis of the American fundamagoozlum shall be compelled to earn the sweat of his brow by labor performed upon the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday.

We are excited and we mean business. Giv us a rest, and pray that we may giv you one.

In the bowels of Christ, THE CLERGY OF THE U. S.

For Missionary Work.

From Pittsburgh Truth.

"Was Jesus Insane?" This is a pamphlet of twenty pages by one of the most brilliant Freethought writers in the country, L. K. Washburn. In attempting to prove that Jesus was insane the author givs numerous passages from his teachings, among which we find the following: "Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day; and he saw it, and was glad. Then the Jews said unto him, Thou art not fifty years old, and hast thou seen Abraham? Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Before Abraham was, I am." "Imagin a man making the statement," says the author, "that he had been living for fifteen hundred years!" Mr. Washburn uses strong argument all through to show that Jesus was non compos mentis. The pamphlet will do good missionary work, and should hav a large sale. Price, 10 cents. For the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL and "Was Jesus Insane?" address the Truth Seeker Company.

Mr. Shaw's Opinion of the Pamphlet.

Mr. Washburn does not admit that any such person as Jesus is supposed to hav been ever existed; or that any such language was ever employed or deeds performed as are reported of him in the gospels of the New Testament. But as long as others accept the story as true and reliable, and teach that to so accept it is a virtue, he deems it worth his while to examin it according to rational processes of investigation. It is an interesting tract, as is everything Mr. Washburn writes. It is published at the office of THE TRUTH SEEKER, 28 Lafayette place, New York, where it can be had for ten cents.

Friends of the American Secular Union hav reason to rejoice at the noble record of generous contributors confronting them in this month's Roll of Honor, names yet to be revered as bright stars of the morning in the approaching dawn of liberty. The Footes are facile princeps. Quiet, unostentatious, even modest, they are of the heroic mold, never having abandoned the outposts of freedom even when our forces hav been overwhelmed by superior numbers. Theirs is not a momentary, effervescing enthusiasm, but a stern, persistent, and consistent purpose, which crowns as a sacred cause every effort when carried on purely for a just principle. The above amounts represent their minimum annual contributions. The Drs. Foote strongly commend our course in the Feehanville fight, and, as usual, do so by deeds, not idle words. If a few more had the cause of Secularism as much at heart as the Drs. Foote, we would soon rout the priestly brigands, "horse, foot, and dragoons." Let their example stimulate to emulate, for all we need is funds to make our Union feared by all the agents of ecclesiasticism, and respected by every honest American. The junior is fast following in the footsteps of his father, and is bound to be one of the brightest leaders in the field of reform. May the doctors continue in as vigorous health as their Monthly, and continue to spread "Common Sense" for the physical, as well as secular, redemption of priest-ridden people.

The Hon. Abram Schell, a life standard-bearer of the Secular cause, from his mountain vinyard forwards evidence of unflagging zeal in our attempts to raise the priestly boycott. His able articles in the Secular publications prove his culture and trenchant logic—perhaps not gained from college, but acquired in the greater university of experience, where one does not hav to unlearn more than half he's been taught.

Vice-President Goodell, of Sacramento, sends his annual contribution and a letter full of noble aspirations and desires. Our venerable friend is concluding a well-spent life, and still his good works make possible the career of the "angels of progress." He is doing his best to get people to think, for if they will think they will leave the old rotten hull of "the ship of Zion," and take refuge in the new, commodious, and fast-sailing clipper Secularism, remarking that it is "made of the sound and strong timbers of common sense, reason, and justice."

Friend Washburn forwards from Vice-President Photius Fisk another donation in addition to what has already been received from our venerable sage of Boston, whose almost boundless charity has been a benison of human love to thousands of the aged, poor, and persecuted of earth. His history is filled with pathos and romance. Born where a plague swept away all his kindred, and the Greek boy was brought by a patron to be educated in the ministry. Photius Fisk has been on the retired list of the United States navy chaplains for over twenty years, and the only sermon this patriarch preaches is "Love thy fellow-man."

Sappho loved and sung,

Scarcely less distinguished is the honorable record of another of the Few immortal names

That were not born to die

while Secularism livs—that of our sturdy adherent at Paineville, O., Vice-President Joseph Sedgebeer, who, while bent with years, still refuses to bow at the beck of superstition, though completely surrounded by orthodox influences.

One of those individuals who do good by stealth and

Blush to find it fame,

and who are somewhat rare in this age, sends $20, merely saying he is a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and his donation is to help redeem Girard College. Though that fund is not, we are informed, in need of assistance just now, he may rest assured that the money will be placed where it will do the most good to advance the cause of Secularism.

To our thoroughgoing Liberal friend K. Hellenthal, of Pittsburgh, who conscientiously redeems his pledges made at the last Congress, we heartily extend the hand of fellowship. He is a high-minded gentleman and a fearless Freethinker.

Vice-President Redfield, of Stanley, Ia., manifests his faith by his works—one of the bravest officers of the Secular army, having valor, influence, and integrity, and still carrying aloft the oriflam of liberty. In short, the vice-presidents this year are showing themselvs worthy the occasion, justifying by their devotion the wisdom which placed them in the position they fill with credit and honor to the cause. The zeal they display cannot fail to send dismay to the enemies of the Union, whether still lurking in the ranks of Liberalism or out of it.

George Hendee, while sending for a diamond badge to Brother Wettstein, considerately incloses a V for the Union. Hendee is one of our rough diamonds and proposes to be incinerated, as the orthodox hav "sent him to hell anyhow." Hendee keeps a standing offer of "$500 for a Christian. They want the money, but they can't fill the contract."

George N. Hill, of Boston, founder, I believe, of the "Era of Man," is one whose motto is, "Who would be free, themselvs must strike the blow." He writes:

DEAR SECRETARY: A hundred thousand thanks and cheers for that glorious injunction! "Now is the winter of our discontent made glorious summer" in very truth. You deserve the largest kind of a testimonial of appreciation from every right-minded person.

Cordially yours, GEORGE N. HILL.

This is just a little previous, as will be seen elsewhere.

B. F. Hyland, of Oregon, never failed to carry the flag at the head of the center column, and symbolizes on his stationery "Our flag above the cross." He has sent for Wettstein's beautiful badgepin, a suitable decoration for so stanch a Secular soldier.

A. J. Kraft contributed to the conference, as also did Brother Lespinasse. To Miss McElsander, Friend Luce, and the rest of our friends and fellow-workers named above, who contribute to our noble cause, we extend our thanks, not only for their contributions but for their expressions of sympathy and encouragement. We are glad to feel and know that they are with us, and that their influence is extending itself in many directions, silently, and, perhaps, imperceptibly, but none the less surely, securing for Secularism a firm place in the minds and hearts of the people.

CANNOT BE RESTRAINED.

The injunction obtained in the circuit court some time ago by the American Secular Union to prevent the county board from paying money out of the public fund to St. Mary's Training School at Feehanville was set aside to-day by Judge Horton.

In rendering his decision the judge said: "The bill is upon the theory that the St. Mary's Training School is a school conducted by a church or sectarian denomination, and that, therefore, no appropriation or payment from 'any public fund' can be legally made to or for any school; that such appropriation or payment would be in violation of section iii, article 8, of the constitution of the state.

"The bill also states that said school, while incorporated under the general law of the state, has presented a claim to the county board amounting to the sum of $2,313, and has applied to said board to renew a contract with said school for further payment for the care of boys sent to said school by orders of court. The complainants believe that said claim will be allowed and the contract made by said board unless restrained.

"There is no averment that any warrant has been drawn upon the county treasurer, or any appropriation made by the county board which he might pay if so disposed. While there may be room for argument as to whether the bill in this case sets out facts sufficient to sustain the averment that this is such a school as that payments of public funds made to it would be in violation of said provision of the constitution, yet this court is of the opinion that the averments of the bill are sufficient to present a prima facie case as to that point. But that is not sufficient to sustain the temporary injunction issued upon this bill, nor to sustain the bill itself.

"This court has no right or power to enjoin the county board from exercising the authority and discretion vested in it by the constitution and laws of the state, nor can this court, upon the allegations in a bill that the complainants believe that they will do so, assume or presume that the board, in the exercise of such authority and discretion, will do an illegal act. In other words, the county board is, in a certain sense, a co-ordinate branch of government and this court cannot interfere to direct or control as to what action it may take in the future in regard to any matter with which it is by law vested with discretionary power or authority.

"Neither is there any reason apparent in this case why a court of chancery should restrain the officers of this school from presenting a claim to the county board. To make such action by the court necessary or proper it must be presumed by the court that the county board will do an illegal act; that it will allow and order paid out of the public funds a claim which the constitution of the state provides shall not be so allowed. This, as stated above, the court cannot assume. Besides, there is no special inhibition against the presentation of a claim which the party presenting may contend is legitimate. Nor can I see any necessity in this case for holding that any citizen can enjoin another citizen from presenting a claim against the county."

As to the county treasurer, Judge Horton said no warrant had been drawn upon him. "To enjoin him, therefore, was to assume that the county board intended to do an illegal act. If an allowance which was illegal should be made by the board and a warrant should be drawn on the treasurer and he should pay it his bondsmen would be held liable for the amount."

The injunction, the court held, was premature. Whether a court of chancery would enjoin the county treasurer from paying a warrant drawn by the board for the benefit of a sectarian school, and in violation of the constitution, Judge Horton said he had not considered or determined.

Attorney Charles F. Russell, who represented the complainants, prayed an appeal, and the matter will be taken to the appellate court at once.—Chicago News.

HORTON "HAD TO."

I was told that when Judge Tuthill made his silly decision a year ago in a similar case, a legal friend was so surprised that he confidentially inquired why on earth he had made such a fool of himself. The Judge's testy retort was, "I had to," and he hastily broke away from his questioner. The Romish church works in such mysterious ways "its wonders to perform" that evidently Horton also "had to."

If this decision is a criterion of the court's legal acumen, we should conclude he did not know enough "to pound sand in a rat-hole," as it were.

Horton assumes the injunction was premature, as the board had not acted upon the bill—had not a chance to "exercise its discretion." Yet they (the county board) had for years contracted with St. Mary's Training School, and the bill in question was for the last quarter's payment under the contract for 1888. Making a specific contract was not exercising "discretion," by the county board, according to Judge Horton, oh, no! The board were not very "discreet" in violating the constitution, we admit, and perhaps Horton ironically wanted to giv them an opportunity to use "discretion." As the bench is not the place for jokers, we must conclude that Horton meant it seriously, although before the temporary injunction was granted the county board had instructed their attorney to prepare a new contract for 1889, and he had done so. Then this wise and noble judge clothes the county treasurer with extraordinary judicial functions. He pretends to assume that the treasurer must decide what is a legal or illegal bill whether passed by the county board or not, and if he pays an illegal bill, his bondsmen would be liable for the amount. Buncombe and bosh! If a bill is properly audited by the board and no injunction lies against it, the county treasurer has about as much authority over its legality as the mythical man in the moon. Should the supreme court decide this a sectarian institution, then the bondsmen are liable for all the authorized expenditures of the county board to this school and others of like character. Under that rule of law nobody would be very anxious for the treasurership.

We hav taken the case to the appellate court, where, on account of the composition of that court, we can reasonably look for another "bluff," but Judge Russell intends to earn a solid and substantial victory in the supreme court of this state, where it would hav to be a wonderful subterfuge that would change their recent decision in this matter.

Certain indications make me sure the Romanists feel "shaky." One is that the grand jury, for the first time on record, were solicited to visit St. Mary's Training School and indorse a column of whitewash as to the excellence of the accommodations of that institution, which was duly printed in all the papers. While there are, I believe, two sides to this story of accommodations, that is not the question at issue. It is whether there is any binding force of this state or not. Our only regret is that the rules of practice would not permit us to take the case to the supreme court direct, where we feel confident we shall be sustained. E. A. STEVENS.

An Open Letter

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE LEGISLATURE OF PENNSYLVANIA ON IMPARTIAL TAXATION.

GENTLEMEN AND FELLOW CITIZENS: The subject of a new revenue law is soon to come before your honorable body, and I venture to call your attention to a few points bearing upon this subject.

Thirty-eight years ago the commissioners of the county of Philadelphia, aided by the city solicitor, presented to our state legislature a memorial upon the subject of the laws exempting certain property from taxation. The amount of property then exempt in this county, at a very low nominal valuation, was set down at $10,586,415. According to well-known figures, found in official reports of the United States, regarding the average annual increase of the value of church property, these figures would now probably reach $50,000,000 or more. The amount of property now exempt from taxation in our entire state probably exceeds $200,000,000, and might reach $300,000,000. I hav no official figures on this subject from our commonwealth, but I notice that in New York the state board of assessors estimate the amount of property in that state exempt from taxation as exceeding $500,000,000, and in Pennsylvania the figures cannot be very much less.

Allow me, gentlemen, to call your attention to the following suggestions:

I. Our existing laws exempting church property from taxation undoubtedly conflict with Section III of our Bill of Rights, which provides that "no man can of right be compelled to attend, erect, or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry against his consent."

The exemption of church property from taxation virtually compels taxpayers to support, against their consent, all places of religious worship so exempt. True, this is done indirectly, but the result is the same as if the taxpayer were compelled by direct legislation to support churches with which he may hav no sympathy, and whose dogmas he may abhor. He is compelled to contribute to church support just as much as his own tax is increased in consequence of the exemption of church property from taxation. If these unjust tax laws are continued, taxpayers should carry their grievances to the courts for judicial relief, and sooner or later it will be done.

II. Our present laws exempting certain property from taxation are unjust and oppressiv, and should be repealed. They impose a tax on the many for the benefit of the few, and practically, in some instances, on the poor for the benefit of the rich. It is said that property exempted from taxation is public property devoted to the public good. This is only in part true. Moreover, multitudes of taxpayers believe that the dominant churches teach not a sound morality, but instead certain dogmas of the Dark Ages which logically hav an immoral tendency.

The Rev. Dr. Wayland, in his "Political Economy," well says:

> All that religious societies hav a right to ask of the civil government is the same privileges for the transacting their own affairs which societies of every other sort possess. This they hav a right to demand, not because they are religious societies, but because the exercise of religion is an innocent mode of pursuing happiness. If it happen accidentally that others are benefited, it does not follow that they are obliged to pay for this benefit. It cannot be proved that the Christian religion needs the support of civil government, since it has existed and flourished when entirely deprived of this support.

If the old American axiom be true, "that where there is no representation there should be no taxation," it is equally true that property exempted from taxation is not entitled to protection. As has been shown, taxpayers are not only "compelled to support" institutions and societies which pay not a dime for the maintenance of municipal and state authorities, for preserving life and property, but they are liable to a further special tax to pay to exempt property-holders for property destroyed or injured by a mob or riot. Of this injustice Philadelphia and Pittsburgh hav had more than one example.

No system can be just based upon a principle of injustice. A religion that is true does not need pecuniary aid from the state, directly or indirectly. The church would grow in public esteem if it would voluntarily practice justice and right and refuse to accept state aid through tax-laws which violate every principle of equity and honesty.

Senators and Representativs of this great commonwealth, the question of the taxation of church property has got to be met soon, and you might as well deal with it now while you are wrestling with the important subject of taxation.

President Grant, in his message (1875), thus treated this subject:

> In connection with this important question, I would also call your attention to the importance of correcting an evil, that, if permitted to continue, will probably lead to great trouble in our land before the close of the nineteenth century. It is the acquisition of vast amounts of untaxed church property. In 1850, I believe, the church property of the United States, which paid no tax, municipal or state, amounted to $87.000.000. In 1860 the amount had doubled. In 1870 it was $354,483,587. By 1900, without a check, it is safe to say, this property will reach a sum exceeding $3,000,000,000. So vast a sum, receiving all the protection and benefits of government, without bearing its proportion of the burdens and expenses of the same, will not be looked upon acquiescently by those who hav to pay the taxes. In a growing country, where real estate enhances so rapidly with time as in the United States, there is scarcely a limit to the wealth that may be acquired by corporations, religious or otherwise, if allowed to retain real estate without taxation. The contemplation of so vast a property as here alluded to, without taxation, may lead to sequestration without constitutional authority, and through blood. I would suggest the taxation of all property equally.

President Garfield put on record a similar voice of warning. In Congress, June 22, 1874, he said:

> The divorce between church and state ought to be absolute. It ought to be so absolute that no church property anywhere, in any state, or in the nation, should be exempt from equal taxation; for if you exempt the property of any church organization, to that extent you impose a tax upon the whole community.

The old Democratic party, true to the principles of Thomas Jefferson, declared in its national conventions of 1876, 1880, and 1884 against everything looking to a virtual union of church and state, and the Republican party has explicitly and repeatedly done the same thing. Will not our statesmen of all political parties in our grand old Keystone commonwealth examin this subject of impartial taxation and promptly wipe out the public wrong of the exemption of church property from equal taxation with other property? The people are ready for such a reform, and if it is not voluntarily made by our legislature, the vox populi will soon be heard in no uncertain tones. RICHARD BRODHEAD WESTBROOK.

The Cosmian Hymn Book.

When Mr. L. K. Washburn kindly sent me a copy of his new "Cosmian Hymn Book," I am sure he did not realize that he was casting pearls—that is to say, that he was—that I am not a musician. I hav said once or twice, I think, that I once had a white-haired German music-teacher who used to pace up and down the floor with frantic strides and fling his arms about in wild despair, exclaiming: "Mein Gott in himmel, but you will be the death of me yet!"

He was still alive the last I heard of him. But then he did not teach me very long, and, I may add, he did not teach me very much, either. I should like to display a wide knowledge of music and say any number of nice things of Mr. Washburn's work (which, I am sure, must be good, judging from his writings and lectures, which are always a pleasure and profit to read or hear), but how am I to write or talk about demisemiquavers when I would not know one if I saw it coming up the street? I do know this, however, that the Liberals needed a good book of songs, and I don't doubt Mr. Washburn has given them one. When a lot of people get together to hear a lecture or sermon or talk they like to take a hand themselvs. They like to "Pull for the shore" and "Read their titles clear" and all that sort of thing. They don't care to sit perfectly silent all the evening and let the man on the platform hav all the say. They want to sing if he is to do the talking. I feel that way myself often, and if I ever get a chance when I think the result may not prove fatal to too large a number of people, I am going to try Mr. Washburn's "Hymn Book." Meantime I'd like to hear how it works where it has a fair chance—with people who can sing without endangering the lives of their neighbors. HELEN H. GARDENER.

The Roman Church to Make Her Own History.

The Rev. Professor Townsend, in a speech in Tremont Temple, gave the following history of past dealings with some school-books in Boston:

"At one time, ten or twelve years ago, if we remember the date correctly, Dickens's 'Child's History of England' was introduced into some of our schools to the great delight of the scholars, and remained in use until the clerical expurgators of this city discovered something distasteful in it, and at their dictation it was dropped. In 1879 Miss Thompson's 'History of England' was introduced by order of the committee into the Boston schools, but subsequently, being objected to by the Inquisition, it was dropped.

"Not long since an excellent school history of England was prepared by one of the masters in our public schools. Efforts were made by his publishers to introduce it into the schools of our city. It was, however, like other books, submitted to the Inquisition. It was returned with twenty or thirty alterations. The publishers, anxious to hav the work adopted, applied to the author to accede to these Roman Catholic expurgatorial demands. This he did, and the book, as altered, was again submitted to the priests, who again returned it with a demand for further alteration. The contortions of history, however, would hav been such, had these additional priestly requirements been acceded to, that the book would hav belied the history it pretended to record. The author refused to make these alterations; he could not make them and retain his self-respect. The result was that the school committee declined to adopt the book.

"Standard histories, ornaments to literature and accepted authorities in the world of letters, are not allowed by Roman Catholic priests to be used in the schools of Boston; and Boston you are accustomed to call the birthplace of American freedom. The history of Macaulay, and that of Green, that of Knight, as text-books or as books of references, are excluded from the public schools of this city.

"Indeed, henceforth Rome herself proposes to write the world's history. She alone has the right. By the dogmas of the Roman Catholic church, as laid down by Cardinal Manning, the pope is the judge of what history is. If the pope says that a thing did not exist, notwithstanding the world knows it did, the church is bound to believe him. 'History is a wilderness into which infallibility will allow no one to wander of his own appointment without guilt, and it denies to every man the right to exercise his own reason or common sense in separating the true from the false' ('Papacy and Civil Power'). 'The only source of revealed truth is God; the only channel of the revelation is the church. No human history can declare what is contained in that revelation. The church (the pope) alone can determin its limits, and therefore its contents. And when the pope, acting for the church, does determin what are its limits and contents, no difficulties of human history can prevail against it. The church is its own evidence, anterior to its history and independent of it. Its history is to be learned of itself' (Cardinal Manning, 'The Vatican Council and Its Definitions,' p. 121). Therefore Macaulay, Green, and Knight hav no business to write history."

Transportation for the Million.

There is no question now of more import to the people than the one concerning cost of railway transportation, and yet there is hardly one man in a hundred thousand who has anything like a clear idea of the cost of building roads and equipment, and moving trains. The charges for travel are so very high that they prevent six-sevenths of us from enjoying it. It is the truth that women, children, and poor men are by the high rates excluded. Cannot the rates be made so low as to induce the great masses to travel for pleasure? Labor can be had at one place as well as at another. Once arrived at a destined point the poor family might be even better off than they were where they are residing. Why may not the rates for the ordinary passengers be reduced to something on a par with cheap postage, street-car travel, cheap publications? Let us see. The roads charge for carrying hogs a small sum, comparativly. They carry them on slow-moving trains, load and unload, feed and water them. They make money by doing so. Why not carry us on the same terms on fast trains, and therefore at less cost to them, letting us wait upon and feed ourselvs? They can do it if they will, and beyond all doubt would make more money than they do now. Would the people travel? Undoubtedly. Even now, whenever there is a break in rates and they carry us from the Missouri river to the Pacific for $10 they cannot begin to accommodate the travel, although they do all they can to prevent it by exacting an overcharge to be repaid (called a rebate) and limit the time. The rebate is imposed lest the hundreds of thousands who would like to go part-way will take advantage of the low rates. Still, it is not the people who crowd the trains then—only those in comfortable circumstances, mostly citizens of villages and towns. I venture to say that if one road would thoroughly prepare itself with cars and engins, and throw down the rates at something like ten or twenty cents per head per trip of one hundred miles or less, it would open their eyes. Could they afford it? Suppose a train all made up at Topeka for the Pacific, what will it cost extra to carry one car more? At the outside, not over $12, including every conceivable thing. Call it $20 (the cost of moving a car from New York to San Francisco). Sixty persons is a carload, the distance is two thousand miles—sixty multiplied by $2 equals $120. But as innumerable persons would be on and off, taking short trips, the receipts would be greatly more. As there would be several carloads of first-class passengers at higher rates, there can be no question as to the profits to inure to the roads.

It would be well for people to investigate the question of cost to the roads of moving trains, including cost of road beds, management, everything, and not allow themselvs to be deluded any longer. The roads now stand in their own light by charging too much, and by permitting their profits to be juggled from them by various means—rings within rings, express companies, fast lines, palace cars, etc. A few great manipulators are gathering up millions, while often the roads may suffer. Common sense tells us that men may be carried as cheaply as hogs! These are matters for people to study, and as there are thousands of stockholders among them, perhaps their influence may revolutionize the maladministration of the railways in this respect.

The writer can remember when the street-cars, then called "horse-cars," were a novelty, and when under a similar narrow policy one car was driven along each half hour, with one or two passengers, fare twenty-five cents. What fool first advised to "charge three cents and start a car every minute?" How the conservativ mind despised the lunatic! And yet that was the policy that made street-car stock the best in the world. You see, the competition of the public's legs drove the companies into low rates for the millions. Unfortunately for the world and for the railways, there is no competition. Still, the high charges compel invention to set about finding substitutes. More cars could hav been used to supply the demand for ice down South than are now used in the whole traffic, but the high rates compel the resort to artificial ice and refrigeration. A chronic coal famin existed in Kansas, Nebraska, and Dakota on account of the high charges for carrying. A straw and trash burning stove is coming into general use—so convenient, so cheap, that every family and business house that uses it declares it would not use coal now if it were given to it gratis. Millions and millions of bushels of apples are left to rot in this region because it does not pay to move them a couple of hundred miles where none can be grown. Necessity will create some invention, perhaps, which will limit the carrying of apples. Thus in a thousand ways this great invention, the railway, is hindered from expanding commensurate with the growth of man's desires and necessities.

Is not the Pullman Car Company wealthy? It is now one of the most powerful corporations on this planet. Originally it was obliged to pay the railways for hauling its cars a sum equal to its proportion on the cost of the roads and services done. Every car costs four or five times as much as ordinary coaches. On every palace car was one conductor, a porter, and two brakemen. Rarely was a sleeper more than one-third full, and the Pullmans charged not over one-third or one-fourth as much for the same service as did the railway companies. For instance, you paid the roads about $18 for a day's ride, but gave the sleepers $5 to do the service. And the coaches of the railway companies were nearly always crowded. Yet the roads grew poor while the sleeper company became rich, and they actually did all the service in a more costly way, paying the roads their proportion of the cost. It is easy now to see why, although the inventor of the sleeping car system had an awful time to convince tallow-brained managers that it would pay. At the outside, including every expense, in did not cost the Pullmans over $10,000 per year to operate a coach, allowing interest to be seven per cent. Twenty passengers per day paid $100, and $100 per day are over $36,000 per year receipts as against $10,000 or $12,000 for expenses. Here is a subject for reflection, and here I take leave of it.

Our London Letter.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Dr. Parker has possibly found that he is likely to slide into the background unless he introduces new "wheezes" into his pantomime, and his latest dodge is giving weekly addresses to workingmen (artisans), who are invited to come in their dinner hour, and smoke their pipes during his discourse. He invites them to put questions, and those that hav been asked he finds it more expedient to waive than answer direct. A few pointed queries from intelligent, unbelieving artisans will cause him to drop the game before long. He made a very reckless statement a few days back, to the effect that the men who hav denied the godhead of Christ or the reality of the supernatural hav never been able to draw within their ministry those who are known as the common people. By naming one or two well-known Unitarian ministers, it would seem that he referred to the Unitarians, but as they do not deny the reality of the supernatural, his remarks could not properly refer to them, but to the Atheists, where he is again wrong, for the National Secular Society is composed largely of those whom Parker would term the "common people."

The "learned doctor" is a poor thing, and occupies the same intellectual level as Spurgeon, Booth, Moody, and Sankey, whom he professes so much to admire.

"A Friendly Correspondence with Mr. Gladstone About Creeds," by S. Laing, has excited a considerable amount of attention in the religious world, and articles hav appeared in some of the sectarian papers criticising the pamphlet. Mr. Laing's article is thoughtfully and carefully written, and givs the Agnostic creed from his own point of view, but it does not follow that all Agnostics will hold to his opinions in their entirety. It appears to me that his school of thought is greatly inclined to mysticism, if not supernaturalism to a certain extent, and are so far in opposition to the Materialistic school, generally distinguished as Atheist. Mr. Laing appears to be a deep reader, and well versed in scientific facts, as far as they are known, which he has well digested, and given out again in a very lucid manner in his "Modern Science and Modern Thought," which is a book worth reading. His theory that "polarity is the great underlying law of all knowable phenomena," I do not quite follow in the paragraph regarding it in his letter to Mr. Gladstone, but that may be owing to my obtuseness. Perhaps I shall get a better understanding when I hav found time to read his "Modern Zoroastrian," which contains a detailed account of the theory.

He shows himself to be a conscientious writer, one who thoroughly believes in his own ideas, and his works are worth reading carefully, even by those who are opposed to the spiritism to which he evidently clings. Such writers do good service, as their tendency is to make for Freethought, and show the fallacy of the Christian religion to those who would never think of reading the more robustly written works of more militant Freethinkers. Mr. Dawes and His Home Preacher.

Notwithstanding the truth of the saying that "a prophet is not without honor save in his own country," I lectured here in Pittsville, Monday night, January 28th, to a fair-sized audience. This was the first lecture on Liberalism ever delivered in this place, and it has given the preacher something to do. I gave anyone who desired an opportunity to reply, hoping to drive the minister into a public discussion, but he was too wary for that. He simply arose and said he would review my lecture in his Sunday evening sermon. Of course I attended, hoping he would offer me a chance to preach awhile, as I had given him a chance to talk at my meeting, but he was not that courteous. The preachers are very brave when they know they can do all the talking. We Infidel lecturers say nothing of importance, but he talked an hour and a half, and then said he would continue the subject the next Sunday night, to reply to my lecture of about an hour and a quarter.

Had he offered me thirty minutes, I think I could hav set him right in all he said. I should like very much to continue to giv our minister something to preach about, but I can hardly afford to be responsible for hall rent and lecture for nothing, though the church fails to draw an audience again for a year.

When I was in Illinois this winter, I sent a challenge to the preacher to engage in a public debate of not less than six nights. The challenge was sent to the paper for publication, but the editor very considerately showed the challenge to the preacher, and the good guardian of the Lord's flock begged that the challenge be thrown into the waste-basket, and it was done accordingly. The editor, however, gave me a very fair notice in the Pittsville Independent. He said:

Mr. Geo. H. Dawes gave an interesting lecture on Liberalism, at Cotey's Hall, Monday evening, to a fair-sized audience. The lecturer is an easy, fluent speaker, evidently having a good understanding of his subject, and handling it in a confident and studious manner.

When the preacher can find nothing more to preach about, and his audience drops off so that he has to turn the meeting into a "season of prayer," I will once more say something that will again fill the old gentleman's church. GEO. H. DAWES.

Christian Clams at Shenandoah, Ia.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Evidently the Christians of Shenandoah were not willing to leave the results of the debate between one of Iowa's greatest preachers, Elder D. R. Dungan, and myself, to rest on the arguments on both sides. Freethinkers, of course, made capital out of the fact that their Christian opponents sent for Wendling to appear one week from the close of the debate. But the Christians assured us that Mr. Wendling had been engaged two months before in the lecture course. Mr. Wendling himself publicly stated that there was no change in the lecture with reference to a "recent event."

Now, this may be all; but the announcements in the newspapers of the week before had a singular sound. Here are extracts from the Post:

Hon. George R. Wendling, America's greatest orator, in his famous lecture, "Voltaire," in the Opera House, Friday evening, January 25th. A fitting climax to the great discussion, "Christianity vs. Freethought." In presenting the second in our course of entertainments we are justly proud of the man and of the subject. This subject is presented by special request of the ministers of our city, who are especially anxious for this subject at this time, because of the great amount of good it is bound to do. The exposition of the life and aims of the great French writer, Voltaire, and the effect of his writings on modern Infidelity, are handled in a masterly way by Mr. Wendling.

Wendling has talent, he is an excellent declaimer, a fine elocutionist, and his lecture is thoroughly memorized. Out upon that littleness, in either Liberal or Christian, which blinds us to merit in one of opposit belief. "America's greatest orator." Ingersoll must be content with second place, if our Christian preachers are willing he should hav even that honor.

By special request of the ministers of our city, who are especially anxious for this subject at this time.

Yet, for ten two-hour sessions their cause was ably represented by a gentleman of great learning, of wonderful skill as a polemicist, and truly a silver-tongued orator. This did not satisfy the "ministers of our city." They know perfectly well that Christianity is damaged by joint oral debate. Hence, they were "especially anxious" for a one-sided effort by the "greatest orator in America." This one-sidedness is peculiar to faith.

Liberal lady: "Did you hear Mr. Wendling last night?"

Christian lady: "Yes. It was fine."

Liberal lady: "I presume you will go and hear the reply to-night?"

Christian lady: "No, indeed."

Liberal lady: "I should think you would want to hear the other side?"

Christian lady: "There is but one side!"

It is this spirit that, more than anything else, will kill Christianity. A source of strength now, this one-sidedness, it will eventually prove its destruction.

I want to hold such debates everywhere Liberals will arrange for them, for I will meet any opponent indorsed by any Christian denomination. Let us crowd Christians into debates. The more the merrier. W. F. JAMIESON.

In Memoriam.

The morning paper of Rochester, N. Y., January 30th, contained the following notice: "Died at her residence, 56 Sophia street, last evening, Mrs. Amy Post, aged eighty-six years." Then followed a column giving a synopsis of her life and life's work. The obituary was very good, but not as comprehensiv as the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER are entitled to receive, and so with saddened spirit and trembling fingers I write this notice of my dearest friend's departure from earthly life.

Mrs. Post was one of the notable women of this century. Born in 1802, of Quaker parentage, she early learned of the persecutions which that people received from the Puritan Christians of Massachusetts as late as the time of her birth, and doubtless inherited from her good parents a hatred of oppression in every form. So in the early days of antislavery agitation she, with her husband, the late Isaac Post, who was always a coworker with her in every good cause, became almost as noted Abolitionists as Mr. Garrison. I doubt if there were one thousand of the fifty thousand escaped fugitivs who were not familiar with the names of Isaac and Amy Post. The eldest daughter of these people, Mrs. Mary Hallowell, after we returned from the burial of the dear mother, said that she remembered well, one Saturday evening, when the shadows of night hid from the public the criminal act of harboring a slave, the penalty of which, for each one thus protected, was imprisonment one year and a fine of $100, a light tap came upon the window. Mr. Post went out. At his door stood a covered wagon, the driver of which informed him that in that wagon were twelve fugitiv slaves, and as the "sacred" Sabbath was upon them, and no more crossing the lake till Monday, the query was, What to do with them? Isaac Post went back into the house and repeated the question to Mrs. Post, the loving and trusted wife. She answered, "Why, thee bring them in," and Mr. Post with cheerful look but softened voice said, "I hoped thee would say so." And so all through the night, and the long hours of the "Christian" Sabbath, while in the pulpits of the many churches of the city the people were admonished to worship as God Jesus of Nazareth, the outcast from Judea's church nearly nineteen centuries ago, this husband and wife watched over these despised and hated slaves, and saved them from the clutches of the law and the gospel. Such, dear readers of our TRUTH SEEKER, was the woman of whom I write, "instant in season and out of season" to work for humanity. Mrs. Post was a "woman's rights woman" when that term applied to a person meant obloquy, contempt, insult. And if there be any other words which mean more than those I hav written, substitute them; they will be in order. But space forbids that I shall tell you of her work for all reforms; she helped in them all, but the truth seekers will most wish to know what she was to the cause of Universal Mental Liberty. She was one of the first members of the Liberal League, and always true to the Nine Demands. She gave bonds for one of the three arrested at Watkins for selling "Cupid's Yokes." Mr. Bennett was her personal friend, and she was his. She felt that the working to obtain the right to think, to speak, to print, and to circulate one's thoughts was emphatically the work of the present hour, and that the right settling of the labor problem, in which she was earnestly engaged, must follow rather than precede that reform. Mrs. Post was a firm and activ Spiritualist, saying often to me, "It is not belief, it is knowledge. I know death is only an awakening to a higher life." Such was my friend of more than forty years. Her name can never die. She is immortal, not in my belief living a continued individual life, but in and through her work for humanity. 'Tis hard to write the word farewell. Oh, how often, almost daily, some friend departs! Will the present generation be able to take up the unfinished work of these departed and departing friends? I am glad to know that the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER will do all in his power to benefit humanity.

The Statue to Giordano Bruno at Rome.

A noble life-sized statue of Giordano Bruno is to be erected in May next in the Campo de Fiori at Rome, on the very spot where he was burnt alive by the order of the papal Inquisition on the 16th of February, 1600.

The completion of this undertaking, which has had the general support of the Liberals of Europe, has been delayed for several years by local opposition in Italy, but finally the consent of the Roman municipality has been obtained by an overwhelming majority, and the monument to the great proto-martyr of Freethought, modern science, and philosophy will be inaugurated in May with a becoming celebration.

We hav been appointed for the United States of America upon the International Committee, and requested to assist in raising funds to secure this noble act of historic justice. Already $400 hav been contributed through this Committee by Liberal Americans, but we desire to send a much larger sum, and hav promised at least $1,000, which will be about one-tenth of the total cost.

The Committee will be pleased to hav the number of subscribers as numerous as possible, so that subscriptions of $1 will be appropriate, though larger sums will be gladly received. All contributions will be publicly acknowledged and forwarded. The time is short, and the necessity of immediate action is urged by the Committee at Rome.

Please to subscribe and send at once to our Treasurer, T. B. Wakeman, 93 Nassau street, New York city.

COLONEL INGERSOLL OPENS THE NEW SUBSCRIPTION.

LAW OFFICE,
ROBERT G. INGERSOLL,
40 WALL STREET,
} NEW YORK, Feb. 8, 1889.

T. B. WAKEMAN, ESQ., Treasurer of the Bruno Monument Committee:

My Dear Sir: It givs me great pleasure to inclose my check for one hundred dollars ($100).

I shall never be quite satisfied until there is a monument to Bruno higher than the dome of St. Peter's.

Yours very truly,
R. G. INGERSOLL.

A Story of James Lick.

Miss Ada Ballou at the San Francisco Paine Celebration.

The speaker said that in the Centennial year, when the celebration was about to take place in San Francisco, a committee of gentlemen called upon her and asked her to paint something suitable to display on the line of march. The time was limited, but she painted a portrait of Thomas Paine. The committee were afraid. They thought if it were exhibited on the street it would provoke expressions of disapproval and the picture would be shot at. "I went down in the morning," said Miss Ballou, "and with the help of a friend got the picture in the street. I went to the committee and returned their money, and said, 'This picture is mine now, not yours, is it not?' They answered, 'Yes.' I then waited upon James Lick, who lay gasping on what proved to be his dying bed. I stated my case—that the picture of the man whose motto had been 'The world is my country, and to do good my religion' could hav no place on the street that day. He asked me to hav it brought up that he might see it. Upon its being brought he, with tears in his eyes, eulogized the patriot of the past, and he himself ordered that the picture be placed where the thousands of people must see it. I need not say it was not fired at, nor did it provoke any expressions of disapproval; and when the procession marched through Montgomery street, those who would not look at this picture of a patriot were obliged to march under it."

New Stories About Colonel Ingersoll.

From the Star.

At a recent meeting of the Boucicault Club here Mr. Ingersoll spoke upon the "Art of Acting." Among his hearers was a nephew of Cardinal Newman, a man whose special forte is dramatic criticism. "I thought I knew something about the subject," said he; "I surely thought I had heard the best upon it, but till to-night has it been reserved for me to hav the veil lifted before the true inwardness of dramatic art."

"So you are the man who has been trying to abolish hell?" remarked a minister of strong prejudices, upon being introduced to the great Freethinker; "but ah, my good sir, you can't do it; you can't do it." "Well, if I can't, sir, I am afraid that when you come to die you'll be—sorry I did not," was the quick retort.

"I want to know, colonel, if you really believe your grandfather was a monkey," said another to him. "Whether I do or not, sir, I believe your grandson will be," returned the colonel.

His daughters unite the most intelligence with charm of any girls in the city, perhaps. Their knowledge is vast, their accomplishments varied; but there is not a trace of "scholarship" or pedantry in the sweet ladylike adaptability with which they receive their guests. The whole morning of each day is spent by them in study.

Trusts.

From the Monte Vista, Col., Journal.

During the past few years we hav heard much about trusts, combines, and corporations. The object of these is to control the markets and advance prices. Instead of prices being governed by the natural law of supply and demand they are to a large extent governed by artificial laws unknown to our ancestors. The supply of nearly everything is regulated by large combinations and is kept so near to the daily consumption as to enable the combinations to fix their own prices and thus extort from the consumers all that they will bear. Of late years labor has combined and fixes the price to the same extent that trusts do, namely, all that can be charged under our present conditions. The latest is the preachers' and priests' combine, by which they are now seeking to hav passed by Congress laws for the better observance of the Sabbath. They hav to their petitions eleven million signatures asking Congress to pass such laws. In these latter days only a small percentage of the American people attend church regularly. It is hoped that if all secular work, including railroading and Sunday newspaper work, is prohibited, larger congregations may be secured. Such laws are contrary to the spirit of our institutions, and if not, such laws are reserved for the states and do not come within the province of the general government. We believe that providence has ordained that at least one day in seven should be set aside for the use and contemplation of spiritual things. But no law can make a man tired or determin how or when he shall rest. Neither can laws turn men's attention to sacred things or prescribe rules for worship. Some men are born tired and desire constant rest. while others hav a desire to be constantly on the move. Some men are endowed with large veneration and spirituality and are by nature worshipers of the supernatural, the Great Unknown and Unknowable, while others are almost entirely devoid of spirituality and are not given to worship or credit anything which cannot be seen or measured by the senses. The latter as a rule are endowed with as much morality as the former, and should not be forced by the law to conform to the ideas of the spiritual-minded. So far as the peace and good of society is concerned, the clergy must advance with the times. To draw larger congregations they must not attempt to force men into their churches by laws restraining them from secular work or reading "profane" literature. They must vie with places of amusement and not condemn them if they would better succeed in preaching the gospel to the world.

Editor Pixley's Conversion.

From the San Francisco Argonaut.

Religion caught like an endemic disease from contact with those who pretend to hav it, does not last. It catches, but it does not stick. We speak from experience, because we hav been converted several times in our youth, and, save in our own opinion, we are no better now than some who passed successfully through the trying ordeal. A youngster educated in the sternest Presbyterianism—and from his days of childhood taught to look upon God as a holy terror and hell as only avoidable by a miraculous interposition of divine providence—is a brave boy if he can withstand the thunderings of an eloquent divine who, in the basement story of a meeting-house on a dark night, pictures to him the enduring torments of the damned. We recall our earliest conversion as distinctly as though it happened yesterday; it lasted only one night, and passed away with the bright morning sun that burst in its glorious radiance over the church, the village, and the farm. We were caught in relaxed mental condition; we were in love, and the black-eyed, curly-haired little maiden of our first adoration was present. She caught it first, and somehow when her susceptible feelings were touched and she went forward to the anxious seat to be prayed for, we sheepishly followed, not so much for the "love of Jesus," as for the love of the maiden. We do not pretend to say that we were not frightened. The Rev. Dr. Burchard was the divine, and he was eloquent beyond any man we ever knew; his voice was musical as a lute, and he could roar like the red dragon with seven heads and ten horns, represented in Revelation. The time was night and dark, the place an underground room in the village church; upon the dais where the preacher stood were two tallow dips, and on the walls sconces or tin reflectors that seemed to make the darkness visible; there was no gas in those times; the theme was hell; the audience all the pious people of the congregation, all the devout deacons, all the trembling old maids, and here and there some wicked ones gathered in from curiosity. The Rev. Dr. Burchard afterward became president of Oberlin University in Ohio. There were no stenographers in those days but we recollect the discourse, for it was branded in upon our soul as with an iron heated in the inner furnace. Extending his hand toward the lighted candle, he said: "Now, my beloved sinners, should I place my little finger in this burning taper and hold it there for one moment, you can conceive the pain I must endure. Now, with this little finger compare the human body, with its complex and marvelous organization, its nerves, sinews, ligaments, bones, and muscles, its sensitiv vital organs, the brain that thinks, the heart that beats, the blood that courses through the veins, and with this dull taper, its simple wick of cotton, its envelopment of tallow, compare the intense heat of the sulphurous fires that burn and surge in the lowest depths of eternal hell; consider their capacities of torture and the torment of the revolving billows of flame as they envelop not only the human body but the human soul, and remember that in this flaming torture you must struggle and writhe as the worm that never dies; for unending ages you must endure the torture that never ends, the fire that never consumes; for, if you pass this opportunity, you may hav lost the only chance of conciliating an offended God, and when once the decree of punishment is pronounced, the penalty can never be annulled and forgivness can never be considered. I despair of conveying to your minds the duration of eternity; but if all the waters of all the rivulets, rivers, streams, lakes, and oceans, all the mountains of ice that are piled in polar seas were melted and gathered in one great reservoir, and this liquid ocean was turned to ink, and on its brink sat the recording angel who, once in ten thousand times ten thousand years, should dip his pen to make his mark on some enduring, endless scroll—when this vast reservoir was exhausted eternity would hav but just begun." And then he invited us to come forward to the anxious seat, and while we were coming up, he sang, in gentle tone, some sweet hymn that thrilled our inmost souls. Does any reader, who knows our prudence, doubt that we hastened to the front, and that, on that anxious seat, we were most anxious? Does anybody doubt that we repented ourselvs of sin and were entirely willing to be pardoned of all our transgressions? The same careful prudence that makes us invest in masses, and that has purchased and paid for eleven millions of chances for purgatorial relief, induced us then to hedge and dodge the divine wrath by permitting the Rev. Dr. Burchard to pray that our sins might be forgiven.

"The Limitations of Toleration."

The edition of THE TRUTH SEEKER in which this discussion between

Colonel ROBERT G. INGERSOLL,
Hon. FREDERIC R. COUDERT, and General STEWART L. WOODFORD, appeared is exhausted, and we hav put the matter into pamphlet form. It makes a handsome appearance with cover, and can be had for TEN CENTS PER COPY.

It should be extensivly circulated, as it teaches the doctrins of Liberalism on the most important subject of the world—the right to think and speak and write. The superiority of our doctrins on Liberty over the creeds of Catholicism and Protestantism was never better set forth, and must be manifest to any Christian who possesses the power to reason.

THE argument in this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER against the Blair amendment to the Constitution by C. B. Waite, entitled "The Conspiracy Against the Republic," is from advance sheets of the Chicago Law Times. It will also be printed in pamphlet form by the American Secular Union, and can be had of the secretary, E. A. Stevens, 16 Union Park place, Chicago, Ill., for five cents a single copy; ten copies, thirty cents, forty copies for a dollar. Mr. Waite's argument should be read by everybody.

The Sunday Rest Bill.

When the presiding officer called for petitions and memorials in the United States Senate on Tuesday of last week, Senator Palmer of Michigan obtained the floor first, and put in a petition for the Sunday rest bill. Iceberg Edmunds of Vermont followed with another. Standard Oil Payne of Ohio had one, too, from churches in his state. Senator Cullom of Illinois had one from both sides. Senator Wilson of Iowa put in one for the churches, and the other Wilson from Maryland did the behest of the pious in his state. Half a dozen prohibition petitions accompanied the memorials in favor of the Sunday rest bill. Senator Cullom presented the only protest against Blair's Sunday bill.

The churches, it seems, are much more activ than their opponents, but this we presume is because they got the start in the matter. For a year or more they hav been pushing their petitions quietly, and are now all ready to dump them on the senatorial desks. Very few people knew about the proposed law, and Senator Blair as chairman of the committee having it in charge did all he could to prevent any knowledge leaking out. Mr. Wolff, the Secular Union's representativ in Washington, had the hearing sprung on him unexpectedly, and was given but an hour or two to prepare his argument against the specific provisions of the bill. Now that the matter is before the country, we trust that the Freethinkers will do their duty and send petitions to their senators in large numbers. Mr. Wolff says that he shall challenge "the whole crowd" of advocates of the bill to a public discussion.

The time, however, is getting short. Only a few days of this session of Congress remain, and whatever is done must be done quickly.

The Statue to Bruno at Rome.

Now that the common council of Rome has removed the prohibition against the erection on the Campo de Fiori of a statue to Giordano Bruno, the friends of that great Atheist should promptly provide the sum necessary to put the statue in place. The design is chosen, the statue sculptured, and it only remains to place it on its pedestal and dedicate it as a tardy act of justice to one of the noblest of the many victims of Roman Catholic intolerance.

All Freethinking Europe is contributing to the fund necessary to accomplish this—England, France, Germany, Italy, and even in Spain there are found some Infidels who will aid in the work. As will be seen by the communication from the committee in another column, America is asked for one thousand dollars. About four hundred dollars was raised a few years ago, when the project was young, and with the one hundred dollars given by Colonel Ingersoll this month one-half the amount is in hand. In the letter accompanying the communication, Mr. Wakeman, the treasurer of the fund, says the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, and other Liberal papers hav done their share, and he asks that this, the second appeal, shall be spread before another constituency, which we shall take pleasure in doing. There may, however, be several readers who hav come into the family since the first appeal was made, who may be anxious to enroll their names on the honorable list of those who are vindicating one of the great characters of Freethought from the cruel hostility of religion. To such we suggest that they send their contributions direct to T. B. Wakeman, 93 Nassau street, New York city.

It has taken nearly three hundred years to move public opinion in Rome to the point of allowing this statue to be erected. But it is now to be placed on the very spot where Bruno's life went out in flame and smoke, surrounded by brutal priests and howling devotees of the most slavish faith ever invented by men. To-day, the Roman church protests against it, and only a few days ago a prominent Catholic wrote to the Sun, sneering at the act and insinuating a doubt "if Bruno was ever burnt at all." Only a year ago the council refused permission to place the statue, but those councilmen who were the tools of the pope hav been retired to private life. The government of Rome, like the government of Italy, is not now the puppet of Leo XIII.

The inauguration of this statue next May means a good deal. It means that not only does the intelligent part of Italy condemn the murder of Bruno, but that it has determined that the arrogant power of the Vatican is at an end in the very city where its most hideous crimes hav been committed, and where it thought itself intrenched forever. When the St. Bartholomew massacre was accomplished Gregory XIII. celebrated the event and ordered a commemorativ medal to be struck. This statue vindicates a victim of one of Gregory's successors, and commemorates an event as important for the world of freedom as the Bartholomew massacre was infamous in the history of religion. That event is the overthrow of the power of Rome.

A New Christ.

Out in Minneapolis, Minn., there is a new sect. Its chief creedal article is that Christ has returned to earth. He is a reverend, of course, living at Rock Island, Ill., and he has an apostle named Whitney who preaches at Minneapolis. The Christ's name is J. Schwemfurth, and he writes letters to Mr. Whitney, which the latter uses as sermons. A reporter attended one of Mr. Whitney's services. The apostle read the fifty-fourth chapter of Isaiah, and said that it referred to a woman who should giv birth to the new Christ. He said twenty years ago he met Mrs. Beekman in Kansas, and was convinced that she was absolutely filled with the spirit of the Lord. She fulfilled all the provisions of the prophecy contained in the chapter read. He asserts, therefore, that the son she gave birth to (Mr. Schwemfurth) is the second Christ. Whitney said that the Bible, when it speaks of the bride and the groom, meant Jesus Christ as the groom and the mother of the second Christ as the bride. The Bible, when it speaks of this matter, certainly means that some one person is the bride, and that person must be a woman. The woman must be absolutely filled with the spirit of the Lord. He says that that woman is Mrs. Beekman. He says that she has spoken before eminent divines, and they all say they hav never heard such words out of the mouths of men. There were several persons present, whom Mr. Whitney mentioned as having received benefits from the new Christ. One, a Mrs. Thrall, he said, was one day riding down-town with him in the street-car. He had been exhorting her for three days to accept the new faith, but she resisted all his efforts. Her mind was tortured with doubt, so that she suffered bodily as well as mental agony. Her face was distorted with pain. Mr. Whitney said to her: "There is no reason for all the pain you suffer; believe in the new Christ," and left her. Such an instant change came over her that some ladies in the same car remarked to her: "What did that man say to you? Your face looks like an angel's."

Mr. Schwemfurth, the Christ, seems to keep largely in the background, and let his apostle Whitney do the advertising. Mr. Whitney promptly performs the necessary miracles, and givs the new Christ the credit. This is modest, anyway. The lady in the horse-car is another St. Veronica, without the handkerchief, and no doubt the whole story is as true as its prototype.

But if they had this new Christ over in New Jersey they would shut him up in jail for six months. It's fortunate for Jesus that he died before New Jersey was discovered.

"Christian Science."

During the past few weeks the "Christian Scientists" hav received several severe setbacks through the death of the victims under their treatment. The latest, and a peculiarly sad case, is reported from Pierre, Dakota, where the "scientists" are liable to find themselvs haled before a legal tribunal, if it has not already been done.

The story of the evil effects of Christian superstition is briefly as follows: W. G. Nixon and wife were until a few months ago prominent members of the Methodist church in their vicinity. Mrs. Nixon's father is Bishop Andrews of Washington territory. Last August the Nixons lost a young son. The boy was treated by regular physicians until, despairing of its recovery by ordinary means, a telegram brought from Des Moines a man who professed to cure by faith or by "Christian Science," but the child died. Since that time Mrs. Nixon has brooded over the subject so much that she became a monomaniac and an ardent believer in Christian Science, and Mr. Nixon also adopted the new faith. Mrs. Nixon, after the death of this son, went to Des Moines.

A few weeks since Mrs. Nixon returned from Des Moines, and with her a Miss Campbell, a disciple of Christian Science, and a little later a Mr. Elliott, also of Des Moines, arrived on the scene, and since that time a regular class has been conducted in Christian Science and alleged cures hav been effected and a number of converts made to the faith. The last week in January another child fell sick, but no doctor was called. The disease was inflammation of the bowels. The inquest brought out the facts that the child had hardly ordinary care, no effort being made to treat it except by faith and prayer, and it was permitted to suffer tortures and die a victim to superstition. Inquiring neighbors were constantly told that the child was all right and well. Hours after the child's death this statement was made repeatedly. The evidence shows that the concealment of the death was due to the "Scientists," who were trying to resurrect the child, even telegraphing Mr. Nixon, who was in this city, to see Mrs. Eddy, of Boston, to hav her bring the child back to life.

When the child's death became known, Coroner Sprague, of Hughes county, summoned three jurors to hold an inquest. A post mortem examination was also held. The verdict of the jury was as follows:

"An inquisition holden at Pierre, D. T., in Hughes county, territory of Dakota, on the 26th and 28th days of Jan., A.D. 1889, before C. C. Sprague, coroner of the said county, upon the body of Eddy Nixon, son of W. G. Nixon, there lying dead, by the jurors whose names are hereto subscribed; the said jurors upon their oaths do say that from all information and evidence obtained at the inquest, do declare and believe that the disease from which the child died was inflammation of the bowels, and that there was no physician called to giv medical attention as prescribed by law; that the child probably died through ignorance and medical neglect caused by the influence over the parents of the following persons: Mr. M. A. Elliott and Miss M. R. Campbell, of Des Moines, Ia., who profess to be Christian healers.

"In testimony whereof, the said jurors hav hereunto set their hands, the day and year aforesaid.

"B. C. Ash,
"P. W. Comford,
"William H. Gleckler. } Jurors.

"Attest: C. C. Sprague, coroner of Hughes county."

A Dakota paper, discussing the case, says: "Mrs. Nixon has the sympathy of a greater portion of our people, for they think her mind weakened, and that she has been but putty in the hands of designing people. They are severe on Mr. Nixon, for on him they lay the blame of first introducing Christian Science in the family and arguing in its favor. On these parties from Des Moines who hav been the leaders of the movement here there is nothing but the severest censure, and had it not been for consideration of Mrs. Nixon they would hav been driven from the place at once. The case is extremely sad, but it is only a repetition of many similar cases reported from other states, brought on by the same doctrin. It might be summarized as murdering a child (for it is little less) and driving a good woman insane. In view of these facts is it any wonder that our best citizens met and held indignation meetings? Is it any wonder that society demands protection? Is it any wonder that men look at these revelations with fear, not knowing where the next blow will fall, or who will be the next victim? Let us be charitable, let us be just, but let us protect the young, the innocent, the weak."

It may be necessary yet in civilized countries to make legislation to protect the poor victims of superstition against the machinations of their leaders—against the strong brains which delude the weak, against the designing who deceive the ignorant and lead them into crime. The Christian religion is, directly and indirectly, the cause of this child-murder and the insanity of its parent. Directly, because the "Christian Scientists," the faith curists, are only preachers of another superstitious sectarianism; indirectly, because, had not the minds of the parents been prepared by acceptance of the Christian religion to believe the miraculous, the supernatural, the impossible, they would not hav allowed the "Christian Scientists" to inveigle them into the senseless course of conduct which terminated in the practical murder of their child.

It is a very difficult question to handle, but a law to punish parents for allowing a child to die without doing for it all that human skill can accomplish is not violating any right of conscience. Such neglect is a positiv act against humanity, and comes perilously close to murder.

Catholic America.

The following two paragraphs we find in juxtaposition in a Catholic journal:

"On December 6th the sisters were compelled to leave the Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, in Paris; and on the 8th of February they will be compelled to quit the Asylum for the Youthful Blind. And this in spite of the protests of the most eminent physicians of Paris."

"As an illustration of how the old order has changed in New England, it is stated that in the entire district of South Boston included in the large parish of Our Lady of the Rosary there are only four non-Catholic families. New England has become New Ireland, and the prestige of the Puritans is at an end."

As the anticlericals of France are steadily abating the influence of Catholicism there, it seems to be waxing strong here. But is it really gaining strength in general here? From the increasing success of its corrupt schemes, from its advancing boldness and dictatorial doings, from its extending inroads among our common schools, from the growing silence, subservience, and connivance of politicians as to its proceedings, we must pronounce that—what? That it is growing? Yes. And that those who love their children, their homes, their country, must awake, and act.

A Corporation for Worshiping.

There is one bluntly honest churchman in this city. The great cant cry of the average Christian is that the churches make all welcome—in fact are just aching to grasp the stranger by the hand and lead him to Christ without money and without price, and with no thought of his previous condition. But Mr. Benjamin W. Williams, chief lay manager of the St. Thomas Episcopal church, at 53d street and Fifth avenue, entertains different sentiments, and was not at all backward about expressing them to a Sun reporter one day last week. He said:

"We havn't any room in our church for people who havn't paid for their seats. Our trouble is not to find places for strangers, but to keep them out. We don't ask them to come and we don't want them. If they come, they are in the way, and we hav hard work to get them out of the way; but we manage to do it nevertheless. We hav to watch them, but sometimes they elude us and contrive to find seats somewhere. Then we hav to tell them very plainly to get up and go out. And we make them do it."

Then he explained the plan the church is run on at length and with commendable frankness. As sexton and business manager of the church he has no theory on the subject of free pews for impecunious worshipers. "It's plain business. The church is a corporation for worshiping, and when the members of the corporation come to church they want the places they hav paid for. Free salvation is all sentiment. It won't work in this age, and it won't do in such a congregation as that of St. Thomas. We don't ask people to come, for we don't want them. We don't advertise in the papers, 'Strangers welcome,' as some churches do. Free salvation! Umph! If we were Methodists we might hav our ushers standing at the door and go out and grab people, and say: 'How are you, brother?' 'Glad to see you, sister.' 'Bless the Lord; come in and hav some salvation.' But we are not that kind. It wouldn't work even on a small scale in this church. It would be queer to see the pewholders of the church, when they observe some stranger standing in the aisle, rise and throw their arms around the stranger's neck, and greet him with that same exclamation of 'Bless the Lord, I am glad to see you in church. Come in and sit with me.' It is a mistake to suppose that that is what St. Thomas's is for. No. I am not looking for souls for the pews. It's the dollars that are wanted. I don't consider the question of Christianity. It's none of my business whether the people that hav seats are Christians or pagans. As for the theology of the question, I don't hav time to think of that. The minister is hired to look after such matters. There are always people who havn't money to pay for salvation. Take our church, for example. In the morning, when we hav our congregation fully occupying the pews, the collection will be $2,000. In the afternoon, when the strangers are there, how much will the collection be? It may be $40. That's all. So that proves that the outsiders are not profitable."

Mr. Williams is straight business from the beginning. To him the question has no theological aspects. It is simply so many dollars for his corporation, and he proposes to adjust his tariff on salvation according to what the traffic will bear. Each pew to him represents so much cold cash, if a rich man gets in it, and so much less cold cash if a stranger occupies it who will limit his contribution to a dollar or two. Mr. Williams possesses a great brain for business.

There are a good many more fashionable churches in this city which pattern after St. Thomas's church, but their business agents are not so brutally frank as Mr. Williams. If they were, the effort to make these corporations for worshiping pay their taxes would be nearer success.

For the Benefit of New Zealanders.

A New Zealand correspondent sends us these questions:

1. What constitutes the political difference between Republicans and Democrats?
2. How is the president nominated?
3. Is the Senate the local state government? Is a Senator by virtue of his election to the Senate a member of Congress, or as we would put it, a member of the general assembly?

For the benefit of the New Zealanders, in whose behalf Mr. Harwood writes, we answer: 1. The difference between the two dominant parties is mainly one of men to fill the offices. In our last campaign the Republicans made an issue of high protectiv tariff duties as opposed to the Democratic advocacy of a tariff revision which should put raw material on the free list, and lower the duty on many manufactured articles. Broadly speaking, also, the Democratic party stands for state rights—home rule—as against a strong central government which the Republicans hav favored more by acts than by talk.

2. The president is not voted for directly, but is chosen by electoral colleges from each state, meeting at the capital of each state, and sending a certificate of their choice to the president of the national Senate. These electors are not bound to vote for the man chosen by their party, but of course they always do. The country would be too warm for them if they did not. The parties proposing to run candidates for president, a few months before the election, send their delegates to a national or general convention—these delegates are chosen in each state by their respectiv parties—and they nominate the man who shall be their party's standard-bearer. Then in each state each party nominates men as candidates for the state electoral college, and the men so nominated who get the most votes in their respectiv states vote in the electoral college for their party's choice, as expressed in the convention.

3. We hav two kinds of senators—state senators and national senators. Each state has two legislativ bodies—assemblymen, or representativs, and senators. The national Congress is also composed of a House of Representativs and a Senate, like the House of Commons and the House of Lords. The state assemblymen, or representativs, and the state senators are voted for by the people directly. The congressmen, as the members of the national House of Representativs are commonly called, are also voted for directly. National senators are chosen by the state legislativ bodies—a joint ballot of senators and assemblymen, or representativs. Each state has two national senators regardless of population. A senator is a member of the body to which he is elected, and helps make state or national laws according as he is a state or national senator.

Editorial Notes.

Notwithstanding repeated denials, the Christians are still circulating the story that Colonel Ingersoll's daughter Eva visited the Catholic cathedral, and was so impressed with its magnificence that she at once became a Christian. After circulating for fifteen or sixteen hundred years a gospel which is entirely false, we cannot be surprised that the lovers of the Christian religion should push along a little lie like this, but it is surprising that any Freethinker should hear "with half-believing ear this slander of a foe," and think a denial necessary. Liberals should hav more confidence in each other's integrity of purpose and mind, and especially should yarns about Colonel Ingersoll and his family be taken with a large amount of salt. It is safe to deny instantly and point-blank any story to their discredit, from whatever source it may emanate.

The American Museum of Natural History, on the west side of Central park, is now open Tuesday and Saturday evenings until 10 o'clock. The Museum of Art, on the east side, is not yet open evenings, lighting facilities not being complete. Electric light is necessary to display the paintings to the best advantage, while gas answers for the specimens of natural history. The Art Museum will, however, be opened soon. The evening exhibitions are the result of the compromise between the museum directors and the city officials as to Sunday opening. It is a step toward the latter, and the large number of evening visitors at the Museum of Natural History shows conclusivly that if the museums were open on Sunday they would entertain more people than now visit them on all the week days. For this concession of evening opening the people can thank the American Secular Union, which began the agitation. That they don't get more, they can blame themselvs. If every man who desires Sunday opening would write to his assemblyman and senator in Albany urging it, the doors would speedily be unlocked. If you want anything, you hav got to ask for it, and ask in no gentle tones when the ears of politicians and Presbyterians are to be assailed.

The Tribune of this city now employs a moralist who lingers in church porches and intercepts the hunks of virtue that fly out from the pulpit. He is an amusing as well as a necessary addition to the Tribune staff. Even "open and professed Infidels" can find a laugh in this which he found in some church porch on a recent Sunday: "It often happens that men of the world whose morals are notoricusly loose are most severe in their denunciations of intellectual unbelief. And the strange part of it is that they are really sincere in their repudiation of such unbelief. Down in the bottom of their hearts there is a profound belief in the code of Christian morality which in their daily lives they fail to follow, but which they vaguely expect some day to follow, when they hav exhausted all the pleasures of life. I am neither defending nor justifying these men in their inconsistent attitude toward religion, but merely refer to it as an interesting phase of human nature which manifests itself in every age and country. The roués of the court of Charles II. of England were, as a rule, sturdy believers in God and the church, and to-day the libertins and roisterers of the capitals of Europe would, almost to a man, refuse to associate with an open and professed Infidel. And the fact is to be regarded, not as an argument against Christianity, but as an unintended tribute paid to it." If Christianity finds comfort and consolation in such support as that, we think the "open and professed Infidels" will not seek to deprive her of it.

A Happy Hit.

From the Independent Pulpit.

The Truth Seeker Annual for 1889 has attracted considerable attention. It turns out now that the Symposium of opinions on Liberalism was a very happy hit.

Letters from Friends.

AVERY, O., Jan. 12, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5.25 for paying up, a renewal, and your ALMANAC for 1889. I am Spiritualist, but hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER nearly from its first issue. Reason why—because it is a Freethought paper, and Liberal enough to publish all sides. MRS. E. R. WILLCOX.

NEW YORK, Jan. 19, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just read Dr. Westbrook's excellent article; its wisdom and sound, good sense show us plainly the way for our actions, especially his recommendation to set out a prize for a plain manual for the instruction of all mankind in the "purest principles of morality" in accord with the laws of nature. Yours truly, FRED. KOEZLY.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., Jan. 12, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: In scanning the contour of Balaam's form in your issue of January 5th, the impression is created that he was cradled on a barrel, and for this reason I think he must hav been born in Canada. But a doubt rises as to his nativity when I look at his feet, for they giv unmistakable evidence that he was a bogtrotter from Ireland. Hav you authoritativ information as to the birthplace of this illustrious character?

ANSON COBURN.

FREDERICK, MD., Jan. 12, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I write you these few lines to let you know that I will be an applicant to the president of the United States for postmaster in Frederick, Md. I hope you may become interested in my behalf. If I can get the office, with my standing in society, and the money which it will bring, Freethought will be permanently established in Maryland.

Please send me the FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC.

Yours respectfully, AARON DAVIS.

COVINGTON, IND., Jan. 14, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3.50 to pay as follows: $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER; twenty-five cents for your ALMANAC; and twenty-five cents to giv Watson Heston as a treat from an old man seventy-seven years old on April 14th next. It is one of the proudest thoughts of my life to think that I hav never got on my knees before the altar of superstition, and prayed to a God who is deaf, dumb, and blind to all prayers.

Yours respectfully, ELISHA RODGERS.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., Jan. 13, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: The New Cambria Literary Society is run strictly on a Liberal basis now. It virtually accepts the Liberals' motto, viz., "Think for yourself and express that thought: Freethought will giv us truth." This change of affairs was brought about by A. Williams, W. A. Murphy, and Wm. McLaughlin, of the above address. Much credit is due Mr. Williams for drafting a new constitution and by-laws for the society strictly on a Liberal basis. I am sorry I cannot attend their society. JOHN W. ABBOTT.

OSHKOSH, WIS., Jan. 20, 289.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find twenty-five cents in stamps for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1889. Will giv you one or two more subscribers in April, if nothing happens. We hav had a detachment of the Salvation Army here for the last two months, and some of our churches hav been holding revivals, but none of them has got a single convert up to date. And that makes me feel splendid. I am more than pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER and the cartoons.

Yours muchly, GEO. M. HARE.

UPPER MATTOLE, CAL., Jan. 15, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $5 to apply on subscription, and twenty-five cents in postage stamps for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. We are about entering on a new era of prosperity. Already business is improving as a result of the intelligent action of the voters in the last election. The nativ-born voters of the state of New York hav shown that they cannot be misled by free trade sophistry, even if it comes from a New York president. As to the European vote of New York city and Brooklyn, it went as it always goes, for Europe and against the interests of this country.

Yours truly, A. A. HADLEY.

WHITEHALL, ILL., Jan. 16, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: The distinguished Secularist, Charles Watts, of Toronto, Ont., delivered three lectures at Union Hall, in this place, on the 13th, 14th, and 15th inst., which, in spite of inclement weather, were attended by large and appreciativ audiences. The subject of his first lecture was "Secularism," in which he answered the question, Wherein is it better than Christianity? His second subject was "Christianity," in which he examined its alleged evidences as a supernatural religion. His third subject was "Religion and Science," in which he showed their relation to civilization. He evinced a thorough knowledge of his subjects, using language eloquent and arguments logical, without being offensiv to the religious portion of his hearers. While laboring to dispel belief in the superstitious teachings of religion, he strenuously advocated the observance of ethical principles—which is the only true course to disarm adverse criticism and make converts to the Secular philosophy. Mr. Watts left here this morning for the West, to fulfill engagements in Kansas, Colorado, and Utah. On his return East, in March, he will deliver two more lectures in this place, providence permitting. J. H. HILL.

LE MOORE, CAL., Jan. 16, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Must hav the ANNUAL. Please find inclosed stamps to pay for the same; also, twenty-five cents for the Casey fund of the "Children's Corner." You are not the one to trouble about these things, but it is handy to inclose to-day, and hav ever trusted to your obliging manhood all our means and business relations with Truth Seeker Company in books, papers, or charity. Excuse and hint as much if we ask too much at your hands. Our means are limited, but in small things we can help some. The illustrations in THE TRUTH SEEKER are marked educators. Oh, that the world could be made to study them! SARAH GREGG FOX.

CHALK LEVEL, MO., Jan. 17, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I am well pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER, and although in time past, through the agency of St. Paul, I was enabled to "see through a glass darkly," at present, by the aid of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I am enabled to behold things face to face. I never saw Paul to a greater disadvantage than in Heston's picture of him as a member of a school board. The lady teachers of our land should be very thankful that those of us who occupy the position of school director are not of Paul, nor Apollos, nor of Cephas, or they would be sent about their business of drudgery with the information that, "I suffer not a woman to teach." In your endeavor to ring out the old systems of religion and ring in the new, you hav my best wishes for success. W. O. LEWIS.

CHICAGO, ILL., Jan. 10, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Following is a piece of poetry which was repeated to me by a man who said he had learned it about forty years ago. He knew not who was the author. I think it is worth saving:

Would you both please and be instructed, too,
Watch well the rage for shining to subdue.
Hear every man upon his favorit theme,
And ever be more knowing than you seem.
The lowest genius may afford some light,
Or giv a hint that had escaped your sight.
Resist not, therefore, with your utmost might,
But let the weakest think he's sometimes right.
He, for each triumph you shall thus decline,
Will giv ten opportunities to shine.
He sees, since once you owned him to excel,
It is his interest you should reason well.

I think it would be well for every Freethinker to commit those lines to memory. It might do us all good.

JOHN HUDSON.

MCCUNE, KAN., Jan. 14, 289.

MR. EDITOR: I write again to let our truth-reading friends know we are yet alive. This is a lively little town of about eight hundred inhabitants. We hav the usual number of churches for such a place (three), Methodist, Baptist, and Presbyterian, all in good running order. I take no part in church matters, and yet I must say that the Christian people treat me well—as well as they do each other. Please find inclosed fifty cents, for which send me the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1889; also, Ingersoll's defense in the case of the people of New Jersey vs. C. B. Reynolds.

I am well pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER. I commenced taking it when D. M. Bennett was in prison, and hav read every number since. It seems to me it gets better all the time. Those pictures are splendid. And to those that talk politics I want to say I am a Republican, because that is the party that saved our flag, and I want R. G. Ingersoll for president. Yours, for a free country, M. S. GOWIN.

SALEM, O., Jan. 19, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I received the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1889 on the 11th of this month. When I first opened it I did not know who Giordano Bruno was, for I am a real ignoramus, but after examining our cyclopedia I knew the statue quite well, and think it is a beautiful picture. When I turned over a few pages through the calendar, I thought it was going to be only a repetition of last year's ANNUAL. I quickly changed my mind as I noticed it closer. As we, my husband and myself, are interested in astronomy, telescopes, and observatories, and as we are Liberals also, you cannot imagin how well pleased we were when we turned to the Lick Observatory. We had seen cuts of it in scientific papers before, but we did not enjoy it as we did when we saw it in your Liberal ANNUAL.

We hav a three-inch telescope of our own, and it is mounted on an equatorial stand. We hav spent a great many pleasant evenings studying the stars and planets.

Since we commenced the study of astronomy the Bible has fallen eight or ten degrees or more lower in our estimation, and it was low enough before, "dear knows." We think that there is no science that will so make the Bible ridiculous as astronomy.

With a mere smattering of reason and a little study of astronomy we cannot imagin how one can call the Bible the work of God.

With our three-inch telescope we cannot expect to see everything, but we are ready to swear that Joshua never stopped the sun, and we hav not yet seen the stars, or even the one star, that an image like man could hav thrown into space. We hav seen objects far grander, far more sublime. As I turned on through the ANNUAL I thought I never could read anything better or more interesting than the "Symposium." It was quite a treat for us. And when I read the gems through I thought I never read a better selection of gems. I enjoyed the ANNUAL all through very much. It is the best I ever read. MAME FRENCH.

WYKERTOWN, Jan. 19, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: You wish to know why I stop your paper. I hav several reasons: First, I am a little stingy; second, I hav not time to read it, unless I neglect some other reading matter that I ought to attend to; third, I want a little rest from that kind of literature. I do not want you to think for a moment that I am changing my views. I am an Agnostic from birth, and expect to die in that belief. Being such, I am not zealous as young converts are, and do not expect to see the world all come to my way of thinking, and I am not ready to abuse my friends because they do not think as I do. While, as a rule, your editorials are excellent, and there is always some good reading in THE TRUTH SEEKER, at the same time there is much space given up to correspondents that ought never to hav space assigned to them in any paper. Hoping your paper will grow with the times and do much good, I remain, Yours truly, F. B. NORTHUP.

SMITHVILLE FLATS, Jan. 7, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I hav long wished to tell you of a smart little boy in this county, whose speech ought to appear on the back page of your paper—little Master Hazard, son of ex-Sheriff Hazard, of Sherburne. Some two years ago while his father lived in Norwich attending to his office, this little lad was seven years old and went to school there. The boys at school finally succeeded in making him understand that his parents put the presents in his stockings instead of Santa Claus. He could not believe for some time that his father and mother would lie so about such a little matter, but he was finally convinced. The last of the week his mother told him he was playing so much in the street she feared he would not hav his Sunday-school lesson ready. "Well," he said to his mother, "old Santa is played out, and I guess this Jesus story will be before long!" M. M. T.

DEXTER, MO., Jan. 13, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 for payment of my subscription for 1889, which I send cheerfully, as I hav never taken a paper that suits me in every particular as well as THE TRUTH SEEKER with Heston's addition. I will try to get some new subscribers, though I think it will be hard for me to get one in this vicinity. I am now taking three Liberal papers—THE TRUTH SEEKER, Boston Investigator, and the Ironclad Age, and as fast as I read them I giv them to my neighbors, and some of them hav been converted, but it seems that the new spirit is not strong enough yet to get them to subscribe for a paper. Just as soon as I can get one I will nail him to the cross, hoping the day may come when there will not be TRUTH SEEKERS enough to supply the greater demand for them—and I do believe that that day will come, and in my time. I am now fifty-four years old, and, being an Infidel, I think I will liv fifty more; but as that is none of my business, I will not set the time.

A true Liberal, J. W. MCCALLUM.

CAMDEN, N. J., Jan. 16, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I had thought that the acme of judicial outrage possible under the Comstock laws had been reached when I was convicted by a jury chosen in my absence, and the first sight that met my eyes upon entering the court-room was the spectacle of the United States judge who was to try the case shaking hands and exchanging fervid congratulations with my prosecutor, or when, later, the government witness not being quite prepared to swear away the liberty of a neighbor in the glib manner expected of him, the same judge petulantly exclaimed: "This man is evidently a most unwilling witness." But I am not sure that a Philadelphia district attorney in his demand that Mrs. Sada B. Fowler shall surrender the plates and copies of her novel, "Irene," has not capped the climax of official insolence. What! Submit to be robbed of property and means of subsistence at one man's dictation, even though in the name of law and justice? Never! I am glad to hear the little woman pluckily exclaim that she will "take the prison bars first." But, seriously, Mr. Editor, and thinking men and women of America, where is this thing to stop? JOHN A. WILSON.

BURTON, MICH., Jan. 12, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I must continue the visits of the grand war-horse, THE TRUTH SEEKER, to keep me and others posted all along the line. The Blair bill, the God-in-the-Constitution party, the attack on the Sunday newspaper, the Catholic encroachment upon our common school system, the secret machinations of both Catholic and Protestant powers to secure some legal vantage-ground by which they can humiliate and crush all Freethinkers, must be watched with eagle eyes and scotched by lectures, debates, petitions to Congress, etc. Liberals, Secularists, Spiritualists, Agnostics, rally, unite, and fight if need be, for Universal Mental Liberty, or the Dark Ages with ostracism and persecution will soon be upon us.

To H. J. Ward, of Coaling, Ala., I wish to say: Dear brother, I feel you are honest to the core. Your article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 12th is a gem—clear, condensed, and candid. I sympathize with you. I hav been there. Some spirit strikes that clock, and that is all it can do for you until you make right conditions. Now send sixty cents to Colby & Rich, No. 9 Bosworth street, Boston, and get a planchet, postpaid. Then get, if you can, three males and three females, kind and loving, a medium if possible; sit round table at night, room dark and still, sing ten or fifteen minutes some Spiritual song or songs; all touch hands and some two lay their hands lightly on planchet, and ask that friend and others to come and talk through it. Ask question so answer can be by raps, three raps for yes, one for no, and two, do not know. Be calm and quiet one hour, so spirits can charge table, persons, chairs, electro-magnetically. Sit twice weekly, and your child will come, and friend and others, and your soul will be satisfied. Write me at Burton, Mich., and I will further aid you. Darkness is best for a few weeks. D. HIGBIE, M.D.

ELMSPRINGS, ARK., Jan. 8, 289.

MR. EDITOR: I know that the readers, and especially the publishers, of THE TRUTH SEEKER would like to know what has become of me. On the 16th of May, 1888, I, in company with my family, left our home at Cleopatra, Mercer county, Mo., traveling southeast over a great portion of that rough, mountainous country in Missouri. The majority voted to travel southwest, using the argument, "We shall find a smoother country," so the minority reluctantly turned the teams, and trudged up and down the mountains over the rocks, all the time after coming into Arkansas, with nothing to cheer up despondency but plenty of fruit and good water. Finally the majority got tired of traveling, and the minority went into camp near Felix post-office, ten miles south of this, about the last days of July, 1888. The weather was very dry and hot. I could not rent a house, so we remained in camp two months, the most of us comfortably covered with boils. At intervals we could eat peaches and pass around a sad-looking smile. Whenever I could, I would saddle a mule and venture out a few miles from camp. The 6th day of September the people here held their state election. After it was over some few of the nativs, Christian politicians, told me what great things they had done. They had elected a man to the legislature that was going to try hard to get a law passed to fine these Saturday worshipers. I replied that I thought well of Saturday and Sunday worshipers, but I liked Monday worship the best. Then they began to suspect something, but did not know with certainty, yet they treated me kindly, and went slowly on trying to get acquainted. I think the Christians here are about a fair sample of the stuff that it takes to make Christians even up North. I hav bought a home here of one hundred and sixty acres, rocks, hills, and small valleys; am trying to study the advantages of all around me. If any of my old friends and readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER should get started as I did for a change of climate and surroundings, and should come this way, they will find my latchstring out. I hav not been here long enough yet to tell them how I like all that is here. I hav been going slowly. There are a few around here that think the illustrations in my paper the best thing they ever saw. It may be that I shall be able to send you two or three new subscribers after they pay their tax. Watson Heston is a success in his business, and should be well paid. It will take him a hundred years yet to show up all the smart things that hav been done by Christians.

J. W. DAY.

HAZEN, ARK., Jan. 10, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to subscribe for several more Liberal papers, but don't know where they are published and can't get sample copies. If without inconvenience to yourself you can communicate this information to those publishers, please do so, as you will confer a favor.

This is a religion-stricken community, but THE TRUTH SEEKER, like a little David, has been slaying the Goliath of superstition in a surprising manner. In the little time that I hav been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER I hav made about ten converts.

A young man here was just ground through the Methodist mill and came out a full-fledged gospel-slinger. He preached last Sunday evening and succeeded in disgusting even his own members. He said that dancing was a sin per se, but didn't say why. He said the government was using the church wrongly—that the church ought to be superior to the government. He said that Prohibition was a grand thing, and that church and state should be united. An appalling disaster is just ahead unless we show a bold front to the enemy. Ignorance is a dangerous obstacle in our way, and shallow-brained ignoramuses like the above make ignorance doubly dangerous. Prohibition is an imposition. It is a lie, a cheat, a fraud, and a snare.

Just one thing more and I will not bother you any further. I notice some contributors to THE TRUTH SEEKER using extremely vehement language against Spiritualists. I do not think that is fair. I am not a Spiritualist and don't know anything about Spiritism, but I believe in fair dealing. Giv the Spiritualists a show, and if they can prove anything let them prove it. Edgar C. Beall, in his "Brain and Bible," speaks of Spiritualism as though there might be something in it, and a man of his sound reasoning cannot be a fool. D. M. Bennett thought Spiritualism might be true. If the Spiritualists can bring up an array of evidence to prove their position correct, so much the better. For sometimes when I am in good health I feel that I would like to etherealize, so that I could skip with the ease of a sunbeam from one world to another. No, sir, don't rule the Spiritualists out of your columns. Let them hav their say and giv them ample time and opportunity to prove if they can.

T. G. STIOKELL.

LEXINGTON, KY., Jan. 11, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: With regard to the school question, which occupies so large a share of public attention, the Protestants are evidently to blame for all the evils which beset the path of science. The churches ought to hav been the first to banish sectarian notions and to make their house a place so sacred to progress, to the welfare of the masses.

All the conservatism we need in this country, and all the religion necessary to make a heaven of the entire universe, could be comprised in two sentences, and these are already written upon the heart of every thinking being—I had almost said, of every dog also—first, the Golden Rule; secondly, "Honesty is the best policy." A constant appeal to such principles by the leaders of society should be made, instead of teaching to steal and lie genteelly. Antiquated notions should be laid aside; they tend to infuriate the minds of young and old, bringing on fierce conflicts between those who would otherwise be peaceful and friendly if left to themselvs. Even "Honor among thieves" is a better incentiv to morality than sensual, furious, misleading fanaticism. The simplest natural principles in favor of the right which are suggested and are on probation in the worst of places, these hav power to change the moral atmosphere as nothing artificial, supernatural, can. All positions in life invite culture, and such experiments could be safely tried everywhere.

Why do the Jews confidently expect another age of barbarism to darken the world and plunge the human race into degradation and misery? Because the present march of civilized society toward wickedness leads them to think that malevolent principles are in the ascendant, and will remain so, unless strong hearts arise at once in their power to prevent. Women expect science to shed light upon the unselfish path of morality. A principle so pure in their hands is bound to rule the world. Christian efforts are too weak to arrest the downward course of society. The religious delusions of the Protestant Inquisition, hoodooism and witchcraft, like the snake tattooing of the Figi islands, retard the progress of civilization—which, however, will continue to advance, in some degree, in spite of everything. Prohibition, that last dose of holy fervor and dangerous principles, is inferior to the simple temperance society. Religion conflicts with the moral philosophy of our schools, but the young mind, being sponge-like, imbibes it readily, so at last the world is governed by the lowest proclivity of which we are capable. Is it not necessary, then, for some one to break the spell of vague and vulgar stupidity, and save from ruin and oblivion those transcendent faculties already trembling in the balance?

Mr. E. C. Clark must remember that fixed laws prove the existence of a God, except those which grow out of necessity. Law first. Motion is in the direction of the least resistance. Second, the effect in contained in the cause. But who knows anything of the origin of motion or life, which seem to be vivid in proportion as they resist law? An organization rises superior to chemical laws, and then begins to liv. What law can teach you to feel and know? Fixed laws, or grooves for atoms to fall into, would turn the universe to marble if it were not for that great Anarchist, Electricity.

ALHAZA.

BELMONT STATION, Jan. 1, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: In the issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 17th, the frontispiece exhibits a belated traveler staring at a guide-post showing the ways to glory by several routes, each strewn with skulls, crosses, spear-heads, etc. If you find the following of any use, you are welcome to it:

ALL THESE ROADS TO GLORY LEAD.

Weary traveler, now beware!
Of your footsteps hav a care!
Of these routes be sure. Take heed,
For they all to glory lead.

See how they're with crosses strewed!
See the remnants of the dead!
Christian sword and broken spear,
Shackle, chain, and skull lie here.

All these routes to glory lead,
But each step has cost a head;
Many a skull fell here to bleach
Ere this glory it could reach.

Hollow mockeries are then
All these signs held up to men.
Each points out into the night
Of savage gloom—appalling sight!

All men see that each road leads
Out in track of heathenish creeds:
Not one points above the shades
Leading downward into hades.

Affrighted man! One broad road still Leads to camp of Infidel.
It points above the clouded tomb
Of glory's road which ends in gloom.

Its pathway leads in the gorgeous light
Of the glorious rays of reason bright.
Follow this road. Join the great host
Who're fleeing the presence of the Holy Ghost.

Courage, reason, and charity,
Is a creed the Infidel carries free.
If not emblazoned with holy grace,
The stamp of honesty is on its face.

J. N. LEE.

SAN DIEGO, CAL., Jan. 11, 289.

MR. EDITOR: The following language used by Colonel Ingersoll, and clipped from a recent number of your excellent paper, deserves to be repeated a thousand times over:

It would be hard to overestimate the good that might be done by the millionaires of New York if they would turn their attention to sending thousands and thousands into the country or to building them homes miles from the city, where they could hav something like privacy, where the family relations could be kept with some sacredness.

That millionaires are not given to such labors of love, we all know. The best thing to do is to enable people to get homes for themselvs. To those who would like to see a move made in this direction, I will say that I represent a company the object of which is to giv cheap homes to worthy Liberal people out here in this sunset land, where heaven and earth hav kissed each other, where the climate is always delightful, and the soil yields an abundance with but little exertion.

In the eastern slopes of the Cayamaca range of mountains, lying some sixty miles east of San Diego, there are thousands of acres of government lands, subject to entry under the homestead, preëmption, or desert acts, which only need water put upon them to make them among the best fruit lands in the world. Our company is preparing to irrigate these lands by damming the San Felipe river as it passes through a mountain gorge, and conveying the water in pipes onto the land.

The Cayamaca railway, now being rapidly built from San Diego in that direction, will afford a market for the oranges, lemons, raisins, olivs, figs, and other semi-tropical fruits which flourish there in rich profusion. We propose to found a Liberal town. The San Felipe valley, which contains thirty thousand acres of rich, level land, shut in from the outside world by snow-capped mountains, is the place for such a town. A fairer portion of the earth I hav never found. The scenery is grand, the air pure, the climate delightful, and Freethought indigenous to the soil. As this may sound strange, I will explain. The first Mexican Indian I hav ever met who is a Freethinker of the pronounced Ingersollian variety, resides in this valley. Catholicism almost universally holds this race in its deadly clutch. Ambrose Ruis—for this is his name—was reared in that faith, but emerged into the realm of Freethought from a close study of the Bible. "It was all the book I had for years," he said, "and it made an Infidel of me." I am inclined to think, however, that the pure air and fine water of his beautiful valley home had something to do in developing his brain power, and giving him clear perceptions of truth and justice. There is something in the adage, "Blessed are the pure in liver," and one living in such a climate could but be healthy in mind and body. Mr. Ruis had the misfortune to hav his house burnt recently, and, having a wife and six children, is offering a part of his fine fruit ranch for sale in order to rebuild his home. His greatest loss, however, was a translation of all of Ingersoll's lectures and a part of Paine's "Age of Reason" into the Spanish language, which he was intending to hav published for free distribution in his nativ land, priestridden Mexico. This commendable undertaking was retarded by the burning of his house, but we trust not entirely thwarted. His intention is to write it over again, and if possible get it published for the good it may do amongst the benighted and enslaved of his own race.

Here is a good opportunity for Liberals to contribute their means for missionary work. What a pity it is that Liberals are not enthusiastic for their cause, like those who insure their souls against future fire by paying the priest! But so it is. We think the money can be raised to pay for printing these translations, even if it comes from the sale of some of the translator's valuable fruit lands. There are none better in our golden state, and he offers them as low as $25 an acre. I am not advertising the land, but the noble spirit of the owner, whose name should be immortalized next to the original authors he translates.

MARY A. WHITE.

BUNDYSBURG, O., Jan. 1, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: It is seldom I occupy any space in that sheet founded by the hero D. M. Bennett, but as I hav just finished reading one of the greatest books ever put before the American people, I desire to say just a word for it—"A Short History of the Bible," by Bronson C. Keeler, of Chicago. This work of one hundred and twenty-five pages shows up the origin of that book to the best effect of any work I ever read. It proves its claims by the best Bible scholars of the world, and by the Bible also. It is to be regretted, I think, that the author has not quoted more from authorities cited, instead of merely referring to them, as thousands of the poor people can never hav the opportunity of seeing one-tenth of the authors cited; but on the other hand, the expense would perhaps be too great. R. G. Ingersoll has spoken highly of the work in question. In "Is Darwin Right?" by Wm. Denton, the author has attacked some of Darwin's views in a straightforward and logical manner. Denton's ability is a sufficient guarantee that the work is of value to the scientific mind. Send to the widow of this champion of liberty and purchase a copy—Mrs. E. M. F. Denton, Wellesley, Mass. This heroic lady was raised within five miles of this place, and she has taught school in this district. There are many here who well remember her and speak praises to her name. Denton was a man whom the clergy did not care to tackle. In my judgment he was second to none as a debater on biblical matters. Peace to his ashes—everlasting remembrance to his name.

"Sixteen Saviors or None," by Kersey Graves. This is a sledgehammer on the head of John T. Perry, and no Freethinker can read it without laughing many times. He has completely demolished Perry's criticism of his former work, "The World's Sixteen Crucified Saviors," by citations from Max Müller and other unimpeachable authors. Send to THE TRUTH SEEKER and purchase a copy, and read it and lend to your orthodox neighbor. If we Freethinkers are to be forced into a combat with Rome, it is high time that we be doing something in the way of enlightening humanity. No better way than lend books that are easy of comprehension by the average reader. This is why Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" has been and is and still will be a matchless success in undermining the structure of Christianity. Many condemn me for my outspoken opinions. Can liberty and scientific knowledge be obtained otherwise? No! Think of Bruno, Servetus, and the millions that hav suffered death at the hands of the despots of faith. As humble as I am, I am about to cross swords with a Methodist divine in discussing the divinity of the Bible. I had a debate with him last winter on the same question as stated in the Underwood-Burgess debate when the former affirms. I also had one with him on Thomas Paine and John Wesley. Never shrink from your duty. In the language of Mr. Paine let us ever say, "Let us propagate morality unfettered by superstition."

No grander man than Thomas Paine was ever born. His writings contain a spirit of sincerity unequaled by any of my acquaintances. His writings are one of the main structures upon which this government rests. He was the author of the Declaration of Independence, but Jefferson got the honor. See the works, "Junius Unmasked" and "Modern Thinkers." Ingersoll is of the same opinion. See his introduction to the last work named. And see Wakeman's speech, published by H. L. Green, on Paine. He was the author of the celebrated Junius Letters of England that hav baffled the world for a century. It is to be hoped that Burr will write a new life of Thomas Paine, and giv to the world his discoveries on the man of three nations, disowned by all. His life cannot be written completely, as anyone can see by studying the matter as closely as the writer has, but Burr knows more of it than any other man I know of, and could do an act of justice for the dead if he would perform the task.

"History of the Christian Religion to the Year 200," by Waite, is a terrible blow to that religion. Waite has gone deeply into the matter, and like Keeler has shown up many things not generally understood. All Freethinkers should hav a copy to post up on, and to lend also.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Little Old Man Like Santa Claus.

A merry man like Santa Claus
Goes riding up and down;
His curling hair is streaked with white;
His eyes are sharp and brown;
His cheeks the hue of scarlet haws*—
This little old man like Santa Claus.

His honest face is round and bright
From pleasant thoughts within,
And all his mufflers may not hide
The dimples in his chin;
His coat and cap for some good cause
Make him a very Santa Claus.

And down and up the winding road,
To hill and plain below,
This little old man like Santa Claus
Does daily come and go;
His toil is such he may not pause—
This little old man like Santa Claus.

His wagon just a white and red;
His horse a bay or brown;
And many packs of many kinds
He brings from either town,
And like his heart they bear no flaws—
This little old man like Santa Claus.

From everywhere he brings the news
In mails of Uncle Sam,
Nor snow nor storm may e'er dispel
His strength of cheer and calm;
His boyish face fulfills the laws
Of every pictured Santa Claus.

Frenchtown, Neb. MARY BAIRD FINCH.

* Through the West the berries of the buckthorn are called "haws," though there is a different sbrub bearing a flat, black fruit resembling a watermelon seed which is known as the "black haw."

Santa Claus and Jesus.

There was an intelligent lady who was very conscientious, and noted for her great regard for truth. This lady was wealthy. She had a bright little daughter whom Santa Claus had never failed to visit on the night before Christmas from her earliest recollection, always bringing her a variety of presents that greatly delighted her. When this little girl was eight years old her mamma said to her: "My precious little darling, having such great regard for truth, I think that it is my duty to undeceive you in regard to Santa Claus, and to tell you the whole truth about him.

"My dear, there is no Santa Claus. The nice and valuable presents that you found on Christmas mornings in your stockings were all put there by your papa, myself, your uncles, aunts, or some of your friends. It was an innocent deception intended to please your childish fancy, but now at your age I think that you should know the whole truth about it." The little girl did not say a word, but walked slowly out of the room. She stayed so long that her mamma became uneasy and went out in search of her. When her mamma found her she was alone in the garden with great big tears running down her cheeks. Her mamma said: "My darling, precious little child, what is the matter with you?"

The little girl clasped her mamma around the neck, and with a sobbing voice said: "O mamma, mamma! I am so sorry that there is no Santa Claus!" Then after a pause of a minute or two, in which she became much calmer, she unwound her arms from her mamma's neck, and with tearful eyes looking earnestly in her mamma's face said: "Mamma, is it the truth that you hav been telling me about Jesus?"

Her mamma replied: "Oh, yes, my child! All that I hav told you and more, too, is true about Jesus. He suffered death on the cross that you might escape hell and gain heaven through faith in his name, and he is now in heaven on the right hand of God interceding for you. And more, he sees every act of your life and knows every thought you hav, whether it be good or evil."

The little girl remained pensiv for a while, and then said: "O mamma, I do hate so much to giv up Santa Claus!"

Little readers of the Corner, this story shows why so many good people believe in the story of the garden of Eden, Jesus and the cross, the resurrection and ascension, etc. Now, dear little readers of the Corner, I suppose that there is not one of you who is afraid to investigate and search out the truth. Did this little girl's mamma tell her the truth about Jesus as she did about Santa Claus, or is the story of Jesus an innocent deception to please children of a more advanced age? You know, little children, all of you who used to believe in Santa Claus, that your mammas told you all along through summer and autumn that you must be good children, that you must not quarrel, fret, or cry, or Santa Claus would not bring you a single thing on the night before Christmas; that Santa Claus loved good children but hated bad children, and would send Old Nick after them.

Now for the parallel. The preacher tells his flock (children) that God givs them life, health, strength, and everything that they possess; indeed, givs them their dear little children, and also takes them away; but if they will be good children, and love and obey him, everything shall work together for their good. He also tells them that they must pay the preacher—that the laborer is worthy of his hire; but if they do not do these things then God will turn them over to the tender mercies of the devil.

J. N. BROWN.

Why Freethought is the Best Thought.

The reason I think Freethought is the best thought is because we are free, and can do anything that we please, and are free from all churches and do not hav to believe in the Bible and other religious books that we do not care for. People that are not Freethinkers try to rule the whole world. I do not believe in that.

People that belong to churches do not read all kinds of books and papers, but it is one thing all the time; while Freethinkers may read all kinds of books and papers and decide for themselvs.

These are the reasons I think Freethought is the best thought. CLÉLIE JAMES.
Zaleski, O.

Freethought is the best thought because it is free; because it raises anyone's mind above the bygone dogmas of two thousand years ago; because it does not bind its upholders to any particular religion or creed; because it encourages inventions and science, which hav always been hindered by the church; because it improves the moral character.

I am glad that I liv in a time when people can think for themselvs, and such papers as THE TRUTH SEEKER and others of a Liberal character can be circulated without opposition. Yours for Freethought,

WALTER W. CLARK (aged 13).

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

Robbie (returning from school after a history lesson): "Mamma, was Charles II. an Episcopalian?" "No, my son. Why do you ask that?" "Well, the history says he did things he ought not to hav done, and left undone things he ought to hav done, and so I supposed he was."

"Go to bed, sir, in the closet there," said an enraged father to a son who had given him just cause for offense; "were it not that these gentlemen are present I would giv you a sound whipping, but you shall hav it before breakfast to-morrow, certain." The little rebel went to his crib with a heavy heart, and the enjoyments of the party continued until a late hour. Just when the party was about to break up the closet door was quietly pulled back and the young offender put out his head, requesting that the sentence might be put in execution. "Father, would ye just gie me my liks this night, for I canna sleep without them?"

"Mamma," said sweet Mabel, as she looked through the pane
At the beauties of Venus and Mars
And the other bright jewels that garnished the night,
"Can you tell me just what are the stars?"
Before mother could answer, a voice at her side
Called out in the tones clear and silvern
Of her four-year-old Frank, "Don't you know eben that?
The stars is the moon's little children."

Correspondence.

ZALESKI, O., Feb. 7, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I send an essay, "Why Freethought is the Best Thought." It is not a very long one. It is the second one I hav written for the paper. I hope this one is better than the first.

From your little friend, CLÉLIE JAMES.

PRESQUE ISLE, ME., Feb. 3, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I see quite a number of little boys and girls are writing to you, so I thought I would try and write you a letter, too, which I hope to see in print. I will be ten years old next April. My papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and we like to look at the pictures very much. We hav two horses, seven cows, thirty-two sheep, fourteen hens, and a rooster. One of our sheep is a pet. We call her Topsy. I will now close.

FRANK ASHBY.

WORCESTER, MASS., Feb. 5, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My papa takes four copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like to hav mamma read the Children's Corner Sunday night. I hav a little baby sister five months old, and she is real cunning. I hav a brother thirteen years old, and I am eight years old. We hav nice neighbors. It is nice sliding on the common in front of our house. Goodbye, with much love.

Your little friend, MABEL M. CLARK.

LOUISVILLE, KY., Feb. 8, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav written to the Investigator once, and this is my first letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like to read the Children's Corner very much. My papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, the Ironclad, the Investigator, and Freethought. We hav Colonel Ingersoll's picture hanging in our front room. We liv at 1,019 East Broadway. I am nine years old. I go to school every day when I am well and am in the Fourth Reader. I study reading, writing, spelling. arithmetic, geography, and German. I do not attend any Sunday-school now and never hav. My papa gave me "Apples of Gold" last Christmas, "The Story Hour" Christmas before last, and "All in a Lifetime" last summer. I like "Apples of Gold" very much, but I like "The Story Hour" the best. I like "All in a Lifetime" very much indeed. Even our Christian neighbors that I hav loaned your books to like your writings very much. I think "The Story Hour" is the best book I hav. I hav read it several times. I hav one brother fifteen years old. He goes to school also. I send ten cents for the Casey cow fund. Your Freethinker friend,

LOIS BLIGH CARTER.

[Money forwarded.—ED. C. C.]

FRENCHTOWN, NEB., Jan. 29, E.M. 289.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: I wish to thank you for the explanation, also the publication, of that beautiful poem, "A Hundred Years to Come." The words were set to music, and it was a favorit song of mine that I sang to my children times without number, but I never knew the name of the author. Every line is a gem that has enriched our literature and will surely be known many hundred years to come. The article of your own entitled, "The Aged," should be preserved in every home, and its precepts practiced. Nothing is more sad than to see old people looking weary and heart-broken, as they too often do. I hav sometimes wished for wealth, though not the "great wealth and power" that Jenny Lind sang of, but wealth that I might build homes, real homes for our aged ones. I was much pleased with your grand lecture delivered in Paine Hall, and would be glad if every woman in every land could hear it and be made free from the chains of orthodoxy, superstition, and custom. I hope you will hav health and strength to "lend a hand" for years yet. Though how you can do so much and carry on the work of the Children's Corner, which improves steadily and surely, is a mystery to me.

Yours for the truth, MARY B. FINCH.

P. S.—I hav not said a word in explanation of the inclosed lines, but it is a true picture of our kind little mail-carrier, who, sad to relate, was found dead in his bed last summer.

OSCEOLA, IA., Feb. 4, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It has been a long time since I wrote to you, so I thought I would write. The wind is blowing very hard to-day. I got a silk handkerchief, story book, and candy for Christmas. For New Year's I got a book, candy, and peanuts. I hav an organ and can play several pieces on it. My brother Pearl has a violin, and my brother Willie has a drum. Mamma got a silk muffler for New Year's, and papa a silk muffler. Brother Willie a box of ABC blocks, a toy horse, and candy. Pearl had the same as myself for Christmas. I hav a pet canary bird; it is a nice singer. Its name is Billy. My brother Pearl has a pet goat—her name is Ethel. We hitch her up to our little wagon and she will pull us all around the yard. Sometimes she runs off with us and upsets the wagon. We hav a good time playing with her. One morning, when we were going to school, she followed us half-way to the school-house. She would hav gone all the way with us if we had not driven her back. I guess she wanted to go to school to learn her letters. She will eat a piece of bread out of our hands. We hav no school now. Our teacher's name was Lorena Jones. I think she is a good teacher. I like her very much. She has taught two terms at our school-house. I attend literaries and debates at No. 1 school-house. I hav two recitations for next Friday. Well, I will bring my letter to a close.

Will inclose ten cents for the Casey cow fund. From your Freethinker friend,

JENNIE GIGRAY.

"I've got a boy for you, sir." "Glad of it; who is it?" asked the master workman of a large establishment. The man told the boy's name and where he lived. "I don't want him," said the master workman; "he has got a bad mark." "A bad mark, sir? What?" "I hav met him every day with a cigar in his mouth. I don't want smoking boys."

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay. and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them, The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this they will probably do so at once.

Price, in paper, 50 cents; in cloth, 75 cents.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The authoris also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

Poetry.

Our Bonnivard.*

Thou last and lonely Bonnivard,
We hear thy freeman's (?) chains afar,
And bow our heads in silent shame
That freedom prostitutes her name,
While yet her lamp is on the sea,
Proclaiming we "are free, are free!"
And luring thee from Polish plains
With welcome of our newer chains,
Where liberty with noisy clan
Delivers thee to a Caliban,
Thy sweet young dream of freedom sold,
And wrung thy homesick heart for gold.

No threshold bough with singing bird,
As some sweet soul with pity stirred;
No homelight beckons thee within;
Our unknown tongue but voiceless din;
No fair Edwina with her kiss
That filled thy Polish home with bliss;
No Marianne's baby hand;
No little Josef's future planned—
Thy sacred shrine and trinity
Where Russia's tyrant bigots be,
Siberia's shadow mocks to green,
And haunts with chains each summer scene.

Thy rent form wrecked with hunger's grief,
Though garneredst thou the golden sheaf;
And while the wintry winds are chill,
And snows hav mantled vale and hill,
Thy meager garments cling in vain;
Thy limbs are cold as that fell chain.
While weeping sadly and alone,
Thy captor's heart a thing of stone,
We feel that Russia could not be
More cruel than we've been to thee,
Where freedom's fitful voices are
Thy wrong and ruin, Bonnivard.

Into the market-place they bore
Him chained. Our kingly bird may soar,
And loudly shriek to sun and star
Of Lincoln, yet in Bonnivard
He plants the eyrie of his throne
'Neath waves that thunder of Chillon.
O Holyoke hills! what bond of shame
Dishonors thus thy early fame?
Outlines, ye stand at freedom's grave,
Whereon we read: "Here wept a slave,
Chained on these shores, long held to be
The home of freedom and the free."

Woe! woe! to thee, America,
When sleuth-hounds claim a human prey;
When exiles from a land of czars
Become our weeping Bonnivards;
And Leman, lying deep and lone,
Paints on the darkness our Chillon;
That builds a monument of chains
On Labor's blood and hunger-pains.
Chillon, that sits beyond the sea,
Thy Bonnivards they were but three—
Swift now thy dungeon gates unbar,
We bring thee yet a Bonnivard.

MARY BAIRD FINCH.

* TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Inclosed I send you a poem founded on an incident that occurred at Holyoke, Mass., not many months since. A man by the name of Parsons, I believe, a zealous church-member, if not a deacon, had the business in hand of hiring out newly arrived emigrants, and thereby turning many a *dis*honest penny. The Polish man referred to in my lines, becoming dissatisfied with the man he had been hired (sold) to at Northampton, ran away, whereupon Parsons followed, caught, and chained him in his wagon, and the wagon was then left in the rear of a store and Parsons went off on other business. People, seeing a man sitting so long in the cold, began to wonder, and finally went and asked why he stayed so long in the wagon. The poor creature was weeping bitterly, and replied by lifting the blanket that covered him, and disclosing the fact that he was chained, with the chain around his bare ankle. His clothing consisted of a collarless shirt and a pair of cotton overalls. To make his misery complete, he was famished with hunger. Parsons was sought for, and when found was marched off to jail. I hav heard nothing further from the case, and if you can inform me that he has had to pay a heavy fine besides his imprisonment, I shall feel that it is no more than a just retribution. Yours for humanity, MARY BAIRD FINCH.

The Great American Fraud.

From the Washington Sentinel.

Rev. W. F. Crafts, of New York, who is engineering the passage of the Blair Sabbath bill, and claims to hav presented petitions with nearly seven millions of signatures, asking Congress to pass that bill, has written us the following letter, which we publish in paragraphs, attaching thereto our answer:

EDITOR SENTINEL: You hav repeatedly attacked the petition for a Sunday Rest law, which has the indorsement of the Brotherhood of Locomotiv Engineers and the Knights of Labor, and Cardinal Gibbons and numerous Protestant churches, but you hav not yet specified just what sections of the bill you oppose. May I ask you to be more specific.

1. Do you object to the provision in the proposed law that the employees of the government in its military service, the soldiers of the nation, shall hav freedom from their usual duties on Sundays as the employees of other corporations usually do? How would such a law injure the liquor traffic?

We don't care whether the soldiers drill or not on Sundays any more than on week days; nor whether they mount guard in time of peace on Sunday. But we would like to hear the band play. If soldiers drill or are on duty they injure the liquor traffic more than if they are off duty, because they do not then imbibe.

2. Do you object to the provision of the bill by which the employees of the government in the mail service, more than one hundred thousand of them, shall be granted their desire to rest on Sunday from the utterly needless work of handling the mails? How would such a law injure the liquor traffic?

Yes, we do object, because we want our mail on Sunday, too. The government is rich enough to employ sufficient hands to do the work, and, if necessary, giv extra pay for it, so that everyone can hav his Sunday mail. If the employees don't work they injure the liquor traffic less than if they do, because when they do work they do not drink.

2. Do you object to that part of the bill by which railroad employees, half a million of them, shall be given their Sunday rest, as far as it can be done by stopping interstate trains, which are chiefly used by rich merchants for making long trips in palace cars, while seven-day toilers run the engins and work the trains? How would this suspension of Sunday trains injure the liquor traffic?

Hav no objection to stopping the rich merchants from making long trips in palace cars, but would like to see people use cars on Sunday to go to church, or on excursions, picnics, or wherever they think proper. The railroad companies are rich enough to employ extra hands to run the trains. Sunday trains rather injure the liquor traffic by taking the people away from the latter.

You then add:

The nation, of course, has no control over Sunday excursions, which are in the domain of state laws.

Well, if that is so, what is the use of asking Congress to pass the Blair bill? If state laws control Sunday excursions, they also control the railroads.

4. Do you object to those clauses in the law by which those in the liquor traffic are put on the same basis as other shopkeepers, in being obliged to close on Sundays that the merchant class may rest?

The liquor traffic (retailers) would not sell on Sunday if the merchant class and all other classes would not drink. Rest means not merely lying down and sleeping, but rather recreation; and for that reason the restaurants where people can restore their powers used up and diminished more or less during week days, are open at least half a day in all civilized Christian countries, except the Benighted States of America, where religious slavery of the medieval ages rules "the land of the free."

If the proposed law were passed, as far as the Sunday closing of the liquor stores is concerned, in what respect would the status be changed from what it is at present? The selling of liquor on Sunday is now illegal in nearly all, if not all, the territories and in the District of Columbia, and the proposed law has no application to the states, in most of which the selling of liquor on Sunday is not legal.

It would seem that this proposed Sunday Rest law has very little bearing on the liquor traffic.

Well, why then ask us whether the liquor traffic will be injured thereby, if you know already that it will not be?

Please giv an explicit statement as to your views of each of the main divisions of the law. Remember that the bill is to be changed by the wish of its friends and on consent of its author, in its title and close, where it speaks of "promoting the religious observance of the day," the word promote being changed to protect, as every legitimate institution of the people has a right to protection on every day. This was the only part of the bill which could in any way be considered as an effort to enforce religion or even to promote it by law. The aim of the law, we claim, is mainly to protect the Sunday rest of workingmen, who, in recent years, hav made numerous efforts to resist the increase of Sunday work. WILBUR F. CRAFTS,
Field Secretary, American Sabbath Union,
No. 320 E. Capitol street, Washington, D. C.

We regard the whole bill as simply a swindle that should be denounced by every liberty-loving American citizen! It is an outrage upon the civilization of the age, and a testimonium paupertatis of the American people of the present day, who will be looked upon by future generations with the same contempt and pity with which we now regard those "Christians," your predecessors, who, two hundred years ago, enacted the Blue laws, burnt the witches, tortured the Quakers, murdered the Indians, etc., and all that in the name of Christ, who daily taught, "Love thy neighbor as thyself."

The Seventh Day Baptists and Adventists and other advocates of religious liberty hav so completely destroyed your Bible claim for the Christian or "American" Sabbath before the Blair commission that you hav had to change your base and now clamor for "Sunday rest," which is no longer to "promote" but only to "protect" the "religious observance of the day"—not much difference after all, but a trick and subterfuge worthy of those gentlemen whom Christ so frequently eulogized as "whited sepulchers." But that change of title will not help you—it is Esau's voice.

Not rest, but slavery, you hav in store for the workingman! All your love for him is the love of the Pharisees who persecuted Christ for breaking the Sabbath! Remember that he told men just like you that the "Sabbath was made for man, but not man for the Sabbath," and as your title "reverend" indicates that you are a minister of the "gospel," go home to New York and pray to the Lord to forgiv you for having sided with the enemies of Christ, and let Senator Blair and his Unchristian bill alone. We want rest on Sunday both for soul and body, for the workingman as well as others, but it must be in harmony with the teachings of Christ and the views of the immense majority of Christendom, amounting to over three hundred millions, of whom you and your petitioners hardly constitute two per cent.

Go for Christ and not against him! Become his "field secretary," and let the American Sabbath Union go where it belongs. Go home!

P.S.—You hav forgotten to mention one class of "workingmen" who need rest on Sundays more than any other class; who rest during week days and make their living on Sundays, and as they work for money, are, according to your theory, the worst Sabbath-breakers in the country—we mean the overworked and worn-out "ministers of the gospel." They can perform their duties and earn their livelihood during week days as well as on Sundays! Why shall they be deprived of the benefits of your "civil day of rest?" Why should they be treated so cruelly?

THOUGHTS ON SCIENCE, THEOLOGY, AND ETHICS.

BY JOHN WILSON, M.A.

The object of the book, as expressed in the preface, is to giv a correct sketch of the main lines of modern thought in small compass, and in language simple enough to be easily understood. In other words, it is a condensation of more voluminous writers, and classification of their definitions of science, theology, and ethics, and a statement of what belongs to each. As a text-book to clear thinking and logical reasoning, and a guide in forming scientific conclusions, this book is invaluable. The Literary Guide ranks it as "one of the foremost works of the present century;" while the Freethinker, in "heartily recommending it" as "simple and lucid in style, correct in thought, and ample in information," declares that it "is just the thing to put in the hands of a plain man who desires the best ideas on evolution in relation to science and ethics in a moderate compass."

Using no word of argument, it simply permits the Bible to destroy all faith in the Bible, by giving chapter and verse—word for word—showing its palpable absurdities and contradictions."

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

MOSES'S ANXIETY ABOUT THE WOMEN.

And Moses said unto them, Hav ye saved all the women alive?—Num. xxxi, 15.

Odds and Ends.

THE man who is believed in everything he says is far luckier than the man who always tells the truth.

"No," said the actor, as he trod wearily over the railroad ties, "I am not looking for Jay Gould, but I've been on his track all day."

ST. PETER: "Here, hold on a minute! I havn't had time to question you yet." New spirit: "Oh, I'm all right. I'm a Biddle, of Philadelphia."

TOMMY: "I wouldn't want to be the preacher's little boy." Aunt: "Why?" Tommy: "Oh, he's got hundreds and hundreds of slippers. They are scattered all over the house."

MISS RAPPELL: "I think it's an awful shame to close the museum on Sunday. What shall we do?" Holbert: "Let's go down to the church and get up a rehearsal for next Thursday's comic opera."

"I WANT to see the wheels go round,"
Said little Tommy Green;
But father had a reason sound
Why the wheels should not be seen.

For mother sat beside him there,
And on the inside case
Of his gold watch was pictured fair
Another woman's face.

MISS KETCHON: "Did you knock at the door when you came to-night, George?" Mr. Tumblety: "Yes, Amy; why do you ask?" Miss Ketchon (shyly): "I thought perhaps you had come with a ring."

TEACHER: "What does Condillac say about brutes in the scale of being?" Seminary girl: "He says a brute is an imperfect man." Teacher: "And what is man?" Seminary girl: "Man! Oh, man's a perfect brute!"

"SIR," said the missionary to the departing legislator, "I wish you would do all in your power to reclaim the poor red man of the West." "I will," said the lawmaker, heartily; "I'll begin with their reservations first."

"Do you not know, Uncle Jason," said a gentleman to a darkey, "that you are trampling under foot as a worthless thing the sacred right of suffrage?" "No, sah," replied Uncle Jason; "it am not wufless. I got two dollahs for it."

"WE should never complain, whatever may befall us," said the minister. "The moment we grow dissatisfied we become unhappy." "Do you really think so?" she sighed. "Yes," returned the good man; "the first woman who complained of her Lot was turned into a pillar of salt."

FRIEND: "Surely, Textson, this out-of-the-way Kansas settlement has no advantages over your former pastorate in Massachusetts." Rev. Textson: "Advantages? It has a heap of 'em! To be sure, I don't get half as much salary; but you don't know the consideration I receive. Why, on my last birthday they did not giv me a single pair of slippers adorned with blue dogs with red tails and green ears. Instead, they even postponed for four days the running out of town of two trifling citizens, so that the interesting event might occur on that anniversary."

A DRAGOON, slightly drunk, was vainly trying to mount his horse, calling loudly on the saints: "Saint John, help me! Saint Peter, assist me! Saint Paul, come to my aid!" By a mighty effort he jumps clear over his horse, then, turning around: "Gently, gently, my friends," says he, "not all at once!"

REV. DR. LASTLY: "Sad indeed it is, brother, that your efforts should bring down such abuse upon your head." The editor-colonel: "H-m! I try to bear it with Christian resignation, doctor. It helps to bring the Wail of Distress before the eyes of the ungodly, and—really, you hav no idea how our circulation is increasing!"

Is marriage a failure? I fancy, if so,
It beats a success any bachelors know;
What 'tis to be wedded unknown is to me—
I hav a good notion to try it and see.
My sweetheart's so sanguin she ventures the guess
Our failing together would be a success!
I've nothing to lose, and I blush as I own
That I am a failure when taken alone.

HOTEL clerk (of the Tacoma House, with air of the cheerful and unabashed liar): "Why, yesterday there was such a demand for rooms here that we had a line of applicants from this office to the door." Commercial man (with a look of guileless innocence): "Really! that's nothing. I was in Seattle the other night, and there was such a line waiting to get into the Occidental that the four last fell off the end of Yesler's Wharf."

EASTERN man (in the West): "Beg pardon, sir. I came West in hopes of bettering my condition, but everything has gone wrong, and I am now entirely without means." Prominent citizen: "Seems to me it's queer ye can't find something ye kin do. Understand farmin', sheep-raisin' or cattle-herdin'?" "No, I am sorry to say I do not." "Up in gold and silver minin', maybe." "No; I know nothing about those industries.' "Huh! Go to storekeepin'." "I hav no experience and hav no capital." "Well, well! What kin ye do? Kin ye shoot?" "Yes. In the East I was the proprietor of a shooting-gallery." "Good! Try train-robbin'."

"YOU s-s-say you found li-li-liquor in this man's house?" "Yes." "W-w-what kind of liquor w-was it?" "Whisky." "Um! Now, h-h-how much w-h-h-hisky did you f-f-f-f-find?" "About half a pint, sir." "H-h-half a pint; yes. Now, g-g-g-g-gentlemen of the j-j-j-jury, I want you to take a good l-l-l-long look at my c-c-c-cli-li-lient." The jury took a good long look at him. He wasn't a very pleasant sight to see; his nose was a sort of purple vermilion, and considerably exaggerated in its proportions at that; his brows were low and shaggy, and his eyes bleared. "Now, g-g-g-g-gentlemen of the j-j-j-ju-ry," the lawyer went on, "I want you to t-t-t-t-tell me if my c-c-c-c-client looks like a man that would s-s-sell half a pint of whisky if it was all he had in the house?" The jury acquitted the man without leaving their seats.

Gems of Thought.

WHEN you wish to know if a man aspires to personal power, watch how he bears himself toward the church.—Edgar Quinet.

WHO can estimate what the world loses in the bright intellects who cower before popular prejudice?—J. S. Mill.

ROGER BACON was at last conquered by the church. He was imprisoned for fourteen years. At the age of eighty years he was released from prison, but death alone took him beyond the reach of his enemies. How deeply the struggle had racked his mind may be gathered from that last affecting declaration of his: "Would that I had not given myself so much trouble for the love of science!" Sad is it to think of what this great man might hav given to the world had the world not refused the gift. He held the key of treasures which would hav freed mankind from ages of error and misery. With his discoveries as a basis, with his method as a guide, what might not the world hav gained! Nor was the wrong done to that age alone; it was done to this age also. The nineteenth century was robbed at the same time with the thirteenth. But for that interference with science, the nineteenth century would, without doubt, be enjoying discoveries which will not be reached before the twentieth century. Thousands of precious lives shall be lost in this century, tens of thousands shall suffer discomfort, privation, sickness, poverty, ignorance, for lack of discoveries and methods which, but for this mistaken religious fight against Bacon and his compeers, would now be blessing the earth.—Prof. A. D. White, in The Warfare of Science.

WE almost all and almost always stand ready beforehand to combat what others say. Still, when anyone speaks, it is natural to suppose that he has been thinking on the subject on which he is speaking; and hence is in advance of us (unless we perchance hav been thinking the same), and it demands thought corresponding before we answer. Moreover, when anyone speaks, he, of course, does so for the purpose of stating something which he supposes will be new and interesting or useful to us; so it is hardly generous of us to attack what he has said, without great deliberation.—Evening Post.

I HAV never in my recollection written or spoken a word to an acquaintance, from indignation at the supposed wrongs he had done me, for which I hav not afterward been deeply ashamed, if not inconsolably sad.—S. P. Herron.

DESIGN represented as a search after final cause, until we come to a first cause, and then stop, is an argument, I confess, which in itself brings me no satisfaction.—F. W. Newman.

THE attempts which Paley and others hav made to solve this mystery [design in nature] by rising from the laws to the cause, are evidently futil, because to the eye of reason the solution is as incomprehensible as the problem.—Buckle.

THE old argument from design in nature, as given by Paley, which formerly seemed to me so conclusiv, fails, now that the law of natural selection has been discovered. We can no longer argue that, for instance, the beautiful hinge of a bivalve shell must hav been made by an intelligent being, like the hinge of a door by man. There seems to be no more design in the variability of organic beings and in the action of natural selection, than in the course which the wind blows.—Darwin.

WHAT claim has Christianity to be considered the source of moral ideas? Its central dogmas are, that man is a depraved being condemned by his maker to punishment, which may be escaped by believing that God himself was born of a virgin, suffered, was crucified, and ascended from his grave into heaven. So far from promoting morality, these ideas are all immoral in their tendency. To assure men that they are depraved is to induce them to act accordingly; and to teach them that a life of crime may be atoned for by a death-bed emotion of trust in Jesus, is to remove the strongest safeguard of morality, the assurance of the natural retribution of ill-doing. The conscience is satisfied by the worship of God; and immorality thrives best where the people are the most formally religious. . . . Religion is not the author of morality, for among civilized countries the most religious are the most immoral. Spain, Italy, and Ireland are the most devout, the most ignorant, and the most criminal among modern nations.—Robt. C. Adams, in Pioneer Pith.

ABSOLUTION is a most happy invention, well calculated to reassure certain timorous rogues who might be inclined to feel remorse for their shortcomings did not the Mother Church thus take the trouble to set them entirely at their ease on that score.—Voltaire.

IS it not immoral to teach that man can sin, that he can harden his heart and pollute his soul, and that by repenting and believing something that he does not comprehend he can avoid the consequences of his crimes? Has the promis and hope of forgivness ever prevented the commission of a sin?—Ingersoll.

RELIGIOUS TREASON THE RUIN OF THE REPUBLIC.

Notes and Clippings.

TEXAS BENDERS, a Colorado ranchman and scout, says of Colorow, the Ute chief who recently died, that nobody mourned his taking off. "He was the greatest villain that ever traversed our lands," says Benders. "When he died his followers killed thirty of the best horses in their possession and buried them with their old leader. They thought Colorow would hav a long trip in the spirit land, and so they provided a big string."

ARKANSAS, though a pious state, where they imprison men for working on Sunday, is not much in favor of Senator Blair's educational amendment to the Constitution. On January 22d the Arkansas senate passed the concurrent resolution previously adopted by the house, instructing senators and requesting representativs from Arkansas in Congress to use their utmost efforts to defeat this part of Mr. Blair's religious propagandism. The resolutions hav been adopted in both houses.

IT is related that when Pope Clement XIV. abolished the Society of Jesus in 1773 as being too diabolical to be endured by humanity, he said: "It will cost me my life, but I must abolish this dangerous order." A notice was placarded on his gate, a few days after the bull appeared, stating that "the see would soon be vacated by the death of the pope." He died of poison a few days afterward. That the Jesuits in Quebec should hav received a government endowment of $400,000, and that the Protestants should hav accepted $60,000 as hush-money, would seem to show, says the Toronto Secular Thought, that the statesmen and clergymen of to-day are not so patriotic or so enlightened as that Pope Clement of one hundred years ago; and Canadian Liberals must not shut their eyes to the fact that they hav before them a task of no mean difficulty to secure and consolidate their own liberties.

THE status of the effort in Oregon to tax the churches is given by San Francisco Freethought: "The petition to the legislature of Oregon, asking that the ecclesiastical property in that state be no longer exempt from just taxation, received about eight hundred signatures, and has been presented and referred to a committee. Mr. Laughlin, of Yamhill, has prepared a bill covering the ground of the petition. There is little chance, it is feared, that the bill will pass this session. The legislators know the power of the orthodox, but they hav not as yet become acquainted with the strength of the Secular element. Their action will be watched and recorded, and data will be gathered for proceedings at the next election."

ONE of the promoters of the Hindoo Congress recently held at the East Indian city of Allahabad, for the purpose of promoting the cause of popular liberty, was Amrita Lal Roy, a young Hindoo who was well known in this city a few years ago, and who is a scholar of rare attainments. Lal Roy is a man of high caste, but he worked as a printer for several years in this city, and while here became thoroughly imbued with the democratic-republican spirit of the American people. He is a graduate of an East Indian college, and reads and speaks the English language as perfectly as he does his nativ tongue. He studied Christianity, as well as politics, while here, but never surrendered his original faith of Buddhism. He is in every way, says the Sun, well fitted to be a leader of his ancient race in its struggles against the wrongs which it suffers under British domination.

THE Catholic Review says: "In the contest that is now being waged on the public school question, it is painful to hav to confess that the hearts of many Catholics are more with the opposition to parochial schools than with their own coreligionists. What is that but saying that they are not loyal to the church? It seems to hav no weight with them that the church has spoken in positiv and emphatic terms on the subject. They apparently overlook the fact that the church absolutely and unconditionally requires the establishment of parochial schools in every parish as soon as practicable, and that all the members of the church shall send their children to them and aid in supporting them. From their conduct one might infer that they felt at perfect liberty to judge for themselvs, and as they hav been educated in the public schools, and they consider them, as they say, 'good enough for them,' they do not hesitate to speak their minds and express their preferences freely, thus practically joining the ranks of the opponents of the church, and proclaiming to the world that on the school question at least their church is wrong and they are right, and they are therefore at perfect liberty to judge for themselvs, and refuse to obey her behests."

THE New York Press, after printing statements from the chiefs of police in several cities showing an increase of crime throughout the Union, sent reporters to prominent men to secure their opinions as to its cause and cure. The president of the board of education doubted the increase, and gave ignorance as the cause of crime and education as the cure. Gen. Clinton B. Fisk attributed the evil to liquor. Dr. Abbott of Plymouth church doubted the increase, attributing the increased number of arrests to development of police service, adding that if, however, there is an increase, it is caused by European immigration. Judge Moore affirmed that crime is decreasing though arrests are increasing. Colonel Ingersoll said: "It is to be expected that crime will increase when the rich are getting richer and the poor poorer. Poverty and injustice are the natural parents of crime. The wonderful increase in immigration and the exportation of paupers and criminals from abroad hav done much to add to the criminal record in this country. Most of this immigration concentrates in the large cities, where competition is strongest, and the natural result is that the weakest are pushed to extremities. The country is growing so rapidly that legislation cannot keep pace with development. It is not to be imagined that crime is more prevalent now than it has been in former times. The world is better to-day than it was a hundred years ago. There are more criminals now, but the population of the world is far greater and the proportion of good is larger than it was a century ago. It is impossible for us to hav an ideal world; that cannot be, but all things will right themselvs in the long run. Honesty and justice among those most favored in a worldly sense will do much to bring about the millennium. It is not well to be pessimistic because we find that there is a great deal of crime. It is better to be optimistic, and to believe that there is much good in the world yet."

The Future of Agnosticism.

From the Fortnightly Review.

The central and pressing problem that awaits Christianity in the future, if we are to trust its official and orthodox teachers, is how shall it overcome that paralysis of religious faith which passes under a convenient solecism as Agnostic. Agnosticism is a vague and elastic phrase to describe the state of mind of large and growing sections of all cultured and thoughtful minds. It is almost assumed that the philosopher, the man of science, the man of great practical experience, is more or less an Agnostic, until he declares himself a convinced Christian, and then the fact is widely proclaimed and heartily welcomed. I propose to ask whether a phase of mind so largely prevailing in the higher intellectual ranks is permanent, creativ, final. Is Agnosticism a substantiv religious belief at all? Can it grow into a religious belief? Can it supersede religious belief?

It is not at all necessary to frame an exact definition of Agnosticism, a task that is far from easy. It may embrace a variety of different opinions, ranging through many types of Pantheistic and humanitarian belief, to the religion of the Unknowable, and so on down to a convenient screen for cynicism or a simple state of mere indifferency. The forms of Agnosticism may be almost as many as the forms of Theism, for it includes in the widest sense all those who consciously avow Ignorance to be the sum of their reflections on the origin of the Universe, the moral government of the world, and the future of the spirit after death. In one sense this represents the conclusion of Auguste Comte; it was that of Charles Darwin, as he says, in a far less steady way; it is certainly that of Herbert Spencer, and of most of those who rest in a philosophy of evolution. An eminent politician who was once pressed by an equally eminent critic to formulate his views on these, as most think them, all-important problems, replied: "My dear fellow, those are matters whereon I never could feel the slightest interest!" But this is not the true faith of the Agnostic—indeed, this eminent politician counted himself a churchman. Thousands of busy men, men of pleasure, of ambition, the selfish, the vicious, and the careless, hav no definit opinion and no perceptible interest. But they are not properly Agnostics. To be undecided, indifferent, or callous, is not to be convinced of one's own ignorance. The Agnostic proper is one who, having honestly sought to know, acquiesces in Ignorance and avows it as the best practical solution of a profound but impenetrable problem.

Such is the mental attitude of a very powerful and growing order of intelligences; who, if far from a majority in numbers, include a heavy proportion of the leaders of thought. Is this mental attitude a religious creed in itself? Can it become the substitute for all other religious creeds?

The true Agnostic by conviction puts forward his ignorance as the central result of his views about religion. A man may incline to the agnostic frame of mind, or he may be agnostic with respect to given metaphysical problems, without being fairly and truly an Agnostic by profession. The Agnostic takes his stand by principle on ignorance, just as the Protestant takes his stand on protesting against the errors of Rome, and makes that the badge and test of religious belief. Many other churches, schools, and creeds abjure and reject the errors of Rome quite as much as Protestants can, without becoming Protestants. Deists, Atheists, Jews, Positivists, Buddhists, Mussulmans, and Brahmans reject the pope and all his works quite as thoroughly as any Protestant. But it would be ridiculous to class them as Protestants, because they do not make the differing from the church of Rome the central result of their views about religion. They are each properly described by the name which connotes the main body of their positiv beliefs and practices. The Protestant is a Christian who protests against the Roman Catholic form of Christianity. The Atheist is one who protests against the theological doctrin of a creator and a moral providence. The Agnostic is one who protests against any dogma respecting creation at all, and who takes his stand deliberately on ignorance. All these put some specific denial into the forefront of their deepest convictions.

But the Agnostic is far more distinctivly a denier than the Protestant. In spite of this unhappy name, of which large sections of the Protestant world are heartily ashamed, the term Protestant still means something substantiv, something more than one who protests. Protestant still means evangelical Christian. And so, the name Dissenter implies much more than one who dissents from the Established Church. In spite of all the gibes and flouts of a great Agnostic, the "dissidence of Dissent" marks those who hold to a biblical and Presbyterian type of Christianity, much as "the protestantism of the Protestant religion" includes all types of Christians who look to the Bible rather than the church of Rome as the source of faith. The Agnostic, as such, has no positiv religious belief apart from the assertion of his ignorance, for if he had, he would be named from such belief. He is rather in the position of the Atheist, whose religious position is based on a denial of God, or of the Anarchist, whose political aim is directed toward the suppression of all government, not the establishment of any new government, Socialistic or otherwise. The Agnostic, the Atheist, and the Anarchist concentrate their opinions respectivly on opposition to creeds, opposition to providence, and opposition to governments.

Whatever the logical strength of Agnosticism as a philosophical position, as a moral and social creed it must share the inherent weakness of every mere negation. In the realm of ideas, quite as much as in the realm of action, it is forever true—"he only destroys who can replace." The reaction in living memory against all forms of mere unbelief such as from Voltaire to Richard Carlile awakened the passions of our ancestors, shows no signs of abatement. The net result of the whole negativ attack on the gospel has perhaps been to deepen the moral hold of Christianity on society. Men without a trace of theological belief turn from the negativ attack now with an instinctiv sense of weariness and disgust. Just as even radicals and revolutionists look on the mania of pure Anarchism as the worst hindrance to their own causes, so all who hav substantiv beliefs of their own, however unorthodox, find nothing but mischief in militant atheism. Auguste Comte found not only mischief, but folly, in accordance with his profound aphorism, "Atheism is the most irrational form of metaphysics;" meaning that it propounds as the solution of an insoluble enigma the hypothesis which of all others is the least capable of proof, the least simple, the least plausible, and the least useful. And although Comte, in common with the whole evolutionist school of thought, entirely accepts the Agnostic position as a matter of logic, he is as much convinced as any Ecumenical Council could be, that everything solid in the spiritual world must rest on beliefs, not negations; on knowledge, not on ignorance.

So clear is this now that Mr. Herbert Spencer, the most important leader of the pure Agnostic school, has developed the Unknowable, about which nothing can be conceived or understood, into an "Infinit and Eternal Energy, by which all things are created and sustained." As everyone knows, he has tried to make out the Unknowable to be something positiv and not negativ, activ and not indifferent. So much so that his most important follower, Mr. John Fiske, of America, has declared that this Energy of Mr. Spencer's "is certainly the power which is here recognized as God" (Fiske's Idea of God, p. xxv). This, however, is a subject which there is no need to pursue farther, at any rate until some one has appeared on this side of the Atlantic to contend that Mr. Spencer's idea of the Unknowable is certainly the power which is here recognized as God. I shall not farther argue this point. But this abortiv paradox of an eminent thinker suffices to show how steril a thing he recognizes a bare Agnosticism to be.

What is the source of all religion? Religion means that combination of belief and veneration which man feels for the power which exercises a dominant influence over his whole life. It has an intellectual element and a moral element. It includes both faith and worship—something that can be believed and something that can be reverenced. These two are fundamental, ineradicable facts in human nature. And what is more, they are the supreme and dominant facts, which will ultimately master or absorb all others in the long run. For this reason what men ultimately believe and venerate—their religion—is very rightly assumed to be the characteristic fact in every phase of civilization. We talk of the Mohammedan, the Buddhist, the Catholic, the Pagan world; of the years of the Hegira, of Anno Domini.

Our deepest and our widest thoughts, our earliest and our latest, about human nature, life, and the visible world, bring us always back to this: "Here am I, and millions such as I am, surrounded, as it seems, in a huge universe of outward activity, distinct from it, but unable to exist an hour without it, able in many ways to act upon it, being acted upon by it in ways far greater and more constant. What is it? Is it well-disposed to me, is it ill-disposed? Is it disposed at all? Has it any will or any feeling at all? Is it the instrument of any being with will and feeling, and if so, of what being? What is that relation between Man and the World?"

Our hearts, like our brains, are ever stirring us with wonder, fear, love, admiration, and awe as we watch the forces around us, sometimes so cruel, so terrible, so deadly, sometimes so lovely, so beneficent, so serene. All we enjoy, and love, all we can produce, or look for, all we suffer and fear, pain, death, bereavement, life, health, and protection from torture, all alike come to us through the visible forces of the earth. Our entire existence, material, emotional, practical, depends on them. Do they seek to help us, or do they seek our ill, or are they absolutely indifferent? The individual by himself is as absolutely powerless in their presence as the minutest winged thing before the summer breeze which may gather into a tornado. But man in his helplessness and his blind terror or keen hope turns ever to the reason, and those who seem to reason best, saying: "Tell us something about this World in its relation to Man: tell us something of the living Spirit which is within it, or above it, or behind it: or if there be no such Spirit, tell us something about the workings of this world and how to get the good from it and avoid the evil."

There is, however, much more than the World. There is Mankind, the most powerful, the most numerous, the most noble, the most universal living force visible upon the planet, through whom and in whom alone real life is possible for an individual. The individual man, when we think out the real meaning of civilized life, is just as completely dependent on mankind for everything he has, or does, or knows, or hopes for, as the infant is dependent on its parent or nurse for every hour of existence. Withdraw them and it perishes in a day. Withdraw from the mightiest intellect or the most potent character, the coöperation of men past and present, and it sinks to the level of the fox or the tiger; and being neither so fleet nor so strong, would perish in less than a week. At every turn of human life, in activity, in thought, in emotion, there are always three powers perpetually in contact—the living soul which is thinking, acting, or feeling; the mass of the world outside man, touching him at every point; and between these two the sum of mankind past, present, and to come, through which alone he livs and acts. Whether the universe be itself living and conscious (Pantheism), whether it be self-existent and purely material (Atheism), or whether it be created and directed by a Supreme Mind (Theism)—all this is a matter of religious and philosophical speculation. But in any case there are always at least three elements—the man, mankind, and the world.

The most profound thought, like the experience of every day, always comes back to this, for it is a matter of morality and of conduct quite as much as of intellect and sympathy. Morality, the very possibility of morality, depends on this: that a man feels the pressure over him of conditions. There can be no true duty without the sense of the limits, possibilities, and aim of human life. Life is an endless caprice, where there are no definit lines of duty, recognized as set by the order of things, and a possible end which effort can reach. And so the bare knowledge of the laws of nature, with no supreme conception of what nature means, such as can fill the imagination, with no dominant idea whereon the sympathy and the reverence can expand itself, is mere dust and ashes, wholly incompetent to sustain conduct or to giv peace. The Agnostic is willing to trust to science as an adequate answer to the intellect, to ethics as a sufficient basis for conduct. He might as well trust in the rule of three and the maxims in a copybook to deal with the storms and trials of life.

All that has been said by preachers and prophets from Moses and Isaiah down to Keble and Cardinal Newman as to the importance of religion to life, as to the paramount necessity of a central object of reverence, devotion, and faith, is not by one word in excess of the truth. On the contrary, it is still lamentably short of the truth, for it has been based by all theological preachers on a very narrow and imperfect conception of religion. Not one word of all this has ever been shaken by the infidel or agnostic schools. It is true that they hav not only shaken to their foundations, but in our opinion finally annihilated, the particular type of religion which theology presents, the actual doctrins, the assertion of supposed historic fact, the gratuitous assumptions which theological religion teaches under a thousand contradictory forms. But criticism has never shaken, nay, has never even addressed itself to weaken, the dominant place of religion in life. For some two centuries criticism has exhausted itself in battering down the doctrins and methods of the current religion. But not a rational argument has ever been put forward to show that religion of some kind is less necessary than before, less inevitable, less dominant. Agnosticism says to the churches: "I decline to believe in your religion." But the necessity for some religion remains just as it did before. And until Agnosticism has told us what religion we are to believe, or why religion is henceforth superfluous, it will remain the private opinion of isolated and cultivated minds in more or less comfortable surroundings.

This explains the mysterious fact that, in spite of the hailstorm of destructiv criticism which is incessantly poured in every bastion, fort, and outwork of the churches, they still continue to reply to the fire of the enemy, and are still full of enthusiastic defenders. "He only destroys who can replace." And the agnostic position is ex hypothesi a pure negation. The profound instinct of all healthy spirits recognizes that a state of no-religion, of deliberate acquiescence in negation, of non-interest on principle in these dominant questions, is weak, unworthy, even immoral. It is in vain that the man of science and the man of affairs ask to be left alone, to do their own work in their own way, to leave these ultimate problems to those whom they concern, or to those who care for them. The instinct of all good men and women tells that a man without a genuin religion, a man to whom the relation of Man to the World, Man to his fellow-Men, is a mere academic question, a question to be put aside—is a source of danger and corruption to his neighbors and the society in which he livs; that selfishness, caprice, anti-social self-assertion, or equally anti-social indolence, are his sure destiny, and his besetting weakness. The appeals and reproaches of the older religious creeds as to the folly and danger of stifling the eternal religious instincts, are as true and as powerful now as ever, though every single dogma of religion were shivered to dust.

It would be idle indeed to attempt to repeat in the feeble tone of a far-away echo the arguments, the appeals, the yearning cry of the great religious minds for thousands of years as to the hollowness of life, the feebleness of man, without an object of awe and love. The sayings of an army of preachers crowd upon the memory as we think upon this, from Job, David, Solomon, and the prophets. "Happy is the man that findeth wisdom, and the man that getteth understanding. Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace." And so on, through the prophets to the words of the gospel and of Paul, of Augustine's vision of the City that cannot be destroyed, and down to Gregory and Bernard, A Kempis and Bunyan, Bossuet and Taylor, Wesley and De Maistre, from countless voices, Jewish, Christian, Mussulman, Confucian, and Buddhist, Protestant, Catholic, and Deist. However much they differ in the form, they all agree in this—the supreme importance of religion to man. Not a word of all this has ever been shaken: not a word of it has even been impugned. All that Agnosticism has done is to assert that theology has not solved the religious problem. It has not offered a shadow of a suggestion as to what the solution is, nor has it cast a doubt on the urgency of the problem itself.

Agnosticism is consequently a mere step, an indispensable step, in the evolution of religion, though, by its very nature, a step on which it is impossible to rest. Intellectually it is quite as impossible to remain an agnostic as politically it would be to remain an anarchist. And for precisely the same reason. Society is such that only the most vapid and uneasy spirit can permanently acquiesce in the negation of all government. And society is likewise such that only a dry mechanical soul can permanently rest in the negation of all religion. A thousand commonplaces hav shown that unless the first place in the imagination and the heart be duly filled, the mind and character are perpetually prone to improvise worthless ideals of love and reverence, under the force of which mind and character are liable to be violently carried away.

The orthodox and the agnostic view of religion are not at all the true antitheses one of the other. The only true antithesis to a religion of figments is a religion of realities, not a denial of the figments. The agnostic reply to the theologians is but half a reply, and a reply to the least important half. Orthodox theology asserts, first, the paramount need for religion, and next it asserts that this need is met by a particular creed and a specific object of worship. To the first of these assertions agnosticism has no reply at all; to the second it replies "not proven." The question is a double one, and no single answer can at all cover the ground. It is quite possible that the orthodox view might be partly right and partly wrong, and the agnostic view may be partly right and partly a mere blank. And this is just what has happened. The theologian is on ground unshaken whilst he contends that true religion is the sole guide of human life. The agnostic is on ground as firm when he contends that theology concerns itself with a world where knowledge is impossible to man. But the agnostic has yet to carry the argument to a world where knowledge is possible to man.

The positivist point of view thus stands midway between theology and agnosticism, recognizing the strength of each and offering to both a modus vivendi, a basis of conciliation. It not only earnestly maintains all that theologians hav ever urged as to the paramount place of religion, as to the universal part of religion in every phase of life, as to its power to transfigure the individual man and human society, large or small, but it vastly extends the scope of religion beyond the wildest vision of theology. On the other hand, it adopts without reserve the whole of the agnostic logic as against the theological creeds, very greatly reinforcing it by making this agnostic logic the outcome of a complete philosophy of science, and an organized scheme of morality and society. No agnostic reasoner can more inexorably insist on eliminating from thought and life whatever philosophy and science reject as "not proven." No theologian can more passionately insist on the wilderness that is left in the heart of the man and the life of society which is without the guidance of religion.

Strangely enough, it is this latter point which theology in our day most miserably neglects. It is so strictly absorbed in its own special creed, that it abandons the defense of the infinitly greater cause, the meaning of religion, the relation of religion to life, conduct, happiness, and civilization. All this is totally distinct from any particular creed, and may stand untouched by the downfall of a dozen creeds. So completely hav theologians identified this eternal truth with their own formularies, that the agnostic is allowed to suppose that when the formularies are disposed of the religious problem is at an end. And the result of it is, that the cause of religion as an institution is to-day seriously jeopardized by theologians, who are far more concerned about particular Books and sectarian dogmas than about the central principle of human life.

It is therefore quite natural, however much it may surprise some, that the first task of Auguste Comte was to show, how religion was a force, deeper, wider, and more omnipresent than theology had ever deemed it; what are the eternal bases of religion in the heart and in society; and what are the indestructible elements of religion, and function of religion. It is not in the least a paradox, but a truth capable of easy proof, that no theologian in ancient or modern times, neither Paul nor Mohammed, neither Aquinas nor Bernard, neither Bossuet nor Calvin, neither Hooker nor Butler, hav ever penetrated so profoundly into the elements, the function, and the range of religion in the abstract as does Auguste Comte. All this, his philosophical analysis of what religion can do for life and society, is entirely detached from any given religious creed, and it is quite as much applicable to Pagan, Mussulman, Catholic, or Calvinistic theology, as it is to the religion of the fetichists, Buddhists, or Confucius. It is so because Comte was the first who exhaustivly considered religion apart from any creed, on a social analysis of human nature and society, by the light of history and social philosophy at once. When so viewed religion is found to hav a meaning far more varied and certain than appears in the sacred writings of any confession, and to be capable of infinit applications to life, undreamed of yet by the most ecstatic mystics and the most ardent spirits of the Catholic or Protestant communions.

It is not, however, the purpose of this essay to put forward Comte's answer to theology, but merely to consider the Agnostic answer, and the future of Agnosticism. The question of the place of religion as an element of human nature, as a force in human society, its origin, analysis, and functions, has never been considered at all from the agnostic point of view. What eminent agnostic has ever attempted to grapple with the problem, except by the unmeaning phrase of Mr. Spencer, that the business of religion is with the consciousness of a mystery that cannot be fathomed? This meager formula about a very real and vast power is obviously only the flourish of a man who has nothing to say and who wishes to say something. Apart from this, what agnostic has ever told us what religion is, what it ought to be, what part it plays in life and in civilization? Agnosticism has not, in fact, carried out its own principles. Both agnosticism and atheism are still so completely under the glamour of the older theology and its creeds, that they take it enough has been done for religion when some definit assertion has been formulated about the central theological dogmas, even though that definit assertion be a negation, as the atheist contends, or a mere assertion of ignorance, as the agnostic contends. But when these hav been asserted, the whole question of religion still remains open as a factor in human existence. If the agnostic and the atheist would fairly face this problem from the solid ground of human history, social philosophy, and moral analysis, and would entirely put aside all further thought of smashing theology hip and thigh, they would come to see that everything yet remains to be said and done in the matter of religion, assuming their specific denials to be perfectly logical and finally proved.

In other words, agnosticism as a religious philosophy per se, rests on an almost total ignoring of history and social evolution. History and social evolution force all competent minds which grasp them to frame some positiv type of religion, and to recognize the indestructible tie between religion and civilization. A strong mind, really saturated with the historical sense, turns from agnosticism and atheism, with the same weariness and pity with which it turns from the Law of Nature and the Rights of Man. They are all as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. History and a theory of social evolution based on history and social statics, compel us to think upon the past of religion, the need for religion, and the future of religion.

Agnosticism is thus found to be simply the temporary halting-place of those scientific men who hav not yet carried their scientific habits of mind into the history of humanity as a whole. It marks, indeed, the physicists and the thinkers about physics, using physics in the widest sense as the study of Nature rather than of Man. It would be difficult to name a single known agnostic who has given to history anything like the amount of thought and study which he brings to his knowledge of the physical world. The Darwins, the Huxleys, the Tyndalls, hav been absorbed in other labors which hav left them no opportunity to enter on the vast field of universal history. They would, of course, admit that social science is quite as legitimate, quite as indispensable to the human intellect, as is natural science; though they recognize its present condition as far less advanced and far more obscure. But the field of natural science is itself so gigantic that they may very fairly claim to limit their labors to that. In so doing, and missing in social science and in historical evolution the precision of proof which they justly seek for in physical studies, they are somewhat inclined to overrate the proportion which natural science bears to the whole field of knowledge, and to forget that physical laws are only a part, and the smaller part, of science in the sum. Nothing is more common than to hear an eminent savant say: "So far as I understand anything of science," meaning by science our knowledge of nature exclusivly, when, perhaps, he has given as little attention to social science, to history and social evolution, as the first man he meets in the street. As to the great discoverers in the physical realm, as the Darwins, the Huxleys, the Tyndalls, the Lyells, the Hookers, it would be preposterous to expect them to withdraw precious hours from their special pursuits; as Aristotle says, it would be ridiculous to ask a geometrician to reason persuasivly, or to ask an orator to prove his points by geometry. Mr. Spencer, on the other hand, is not a specialist observer, but a philosopher, and no English philosopher before him has ever so forcibly insisted on the supreme place held in the intellectual synthesis by social science. This, therefore, is all the more a disappointment to those who most admire his genius and most carefully watch the development of his "Synthetic Philosophy," that he has not yet been able to turn his extraordinary powers of coördinating ideas to the systematic study of universal history. It is difficult, indeed, to recall a passage in which he has contributed to this grand task of the future a single reflection that does justice to his eminent position. Yet, without a systematic conception of history, a synthetic philosophy of human nature is as utterly futil as a synthetic philosophy of physical nature would be without biology.

We may now form some general forecast of the future course of Agnosticism. Agnosticism is a stage in the evolution of religion, an entirely negativ stage, the point reached by physicists, a purely mental conclusion with no relation to things social at all. It is a stage as impossible for a social philosophy to rest in as it is for a statesman to proclaim his policy to be "no law" and "no government." But if Agnosticism cannot rest as it is there is not the slightest reason to suppose that it can go back. Agnosticism represents the general conclusion of minds profoundly imbued with the laws of physical nature, minds which find the sum of the physical laws to be incompatible with the central dogmas of theology. And since the physical laws rest on an enormous mass of experimental demonstration and the dogmas of theology upon the unsupported asseverations of theologians, the agnostic, as at present advised, holds by the former, and, without denying the latter, treats them as "not proven." But the laws of physical nature show no signs of becoming less definit, less consistent, or less popular as time goes on. Everything combines to show that natural knowledge is growing wider, more consolidated, more dominant year by year; that the reign of law becomes more truly universal, more indefeasible, more familiar to all, just as the reign of supernatural hypotheses retreats into regions where the light of science fails to penetrate.

Whatever, therefore, has fostered the agnostic habit of mind in the past seems destined to extend it enormously in the future. And, when the entire public are completely trained in a sense of physical law, the agnostic habit of mind must become the mental state, not of isolated students and thinkers, but of the general body which forms public opinion. There is no weak spot about the agnostic position per se, no sign of doubt or rift in its armor, as a logical instrument. All that is objected to is, that it is simply one syllogism in a very long and complex process of reasoning, not that the syllogism itself has any vestige of error. The result is that the agnostic logic shows every sign not of failure, but of ultimately becoming an axiom of ordinary thought, almost a truism or a commonplace, as minds are more commonly imbued with the sense of physical law. But to accept the agnostic logic is not to be an Agnostic, any more than to accept the protest against the papal infallibility or the Council of Trent is to be a Protestant. Hence, the more universal becomes the adoption of the agnostic position, the more rare will agnostics pure and simple become, and the less will agnosticism be looked on as a creed. When agnostic logic is simply one of the canons of thought, agnosticism, as a distinctiv faith, will hav spontaneously disappeared.

As social science and the laws of social evolution more and more engross the higher minds, and become the true center of public interest, Agnosticism, the mere negation of the physicists, will hav left the ground clear for the rise of a definit belief. That belief, of course, like everything destined to hav a practical influence over men, must be positiv, not negativ. It must also be scientific, not traditional, or fictitious. And it must further be human, in the sense of sympathetic and congener to man, not materialist and homogeneous with the physical world. Its main basis obviously must be social science, the larger, more noble, and dominant part of science in the sum. And its main instrument and guide will be the history of human evolution, which is to physical evolution all that man himself is to the animal series. To collect these suggestions in one, what we hav is this. Agnosticism must be absorbed in a religious belief, for which it will hav cleared the ground. That belief will necessarily hav these characters. It will be at once positiv, scientific, human, sociologic, and evolutionary or historical.

These five characteristics are all, it is plain, distinctiv marks of the system for the future that Auguste Comte propounded as the religion of Humanity. Indeed, taken together they would be a very good description of it. But it is no part of my present purpose to pursue that topic further, or to insist on Positivism as the inevitable solution of the problem. The object to which this paper is confined is to examin what, upon the principles of agnosticism itself, would be the natural development of agnosticism in the future, when its protest against the assumptions of theology shall hav done its work, when antagonism to theology has become an anachronism, and when the world has realized how completely religion has yet to create its future. There is no reason to think that thoughtful agnostics would very much dispute the general line of this reasoning. Very many agnostics already hav recognized in a general way, and for a distant future, some kind of humanitarian ideal as the ultimate basis of the religious sentiment. And this has been done most definitly by those agnostics who are the most interested in social science, and especially by those who hav the keenest grasp on the laws of historical evolution. Every student of social philosophy, who combines a knowledge of physical laws with a dominant interest in history, is already a humanitarian in embryo, though he choose to maintain an attitude of mental suspense on the religious problem as a whole.

Further than this I hav no wish now to carry the argument. I am not advocating Positivism, but am examining the future of Agnosticism. Agnosticism, indeed, has no future, unless it will carry out its scientific principles to their legitimate conclusion. It offers no locus standi by itself. As Charles Darwin so pathetically tells us in his diary, it affords no permanent consolation to the mind, and is continually melting away under the stress of powerful sympathies. It destroys but it does not replace.

That which alone can take the place of the mighty mysteries and the grand moral drama created by the imagination of the prophets and priests of old is the final scheme of moral and social life which social science shall finally elaborate for man, which shall be the fruit of science as a whole, with physical science for its foundation and social science for its main gospel, a scheme which shall be entirely positiv and entirely human; and its main characteristic will be, that it explains the history of humanity as a whole and points to the future of humanity as the inevitable sequel of its history. In whatever form such a view of religion may approve itself to the ages to come, it will only be agnostic in the sense that it is ready with the agnostic answer to all idle and irrelevant questions. FREDERIC HARRISON.

Treeing Large Game.

A farmer out west who had never paid much attention to religion was last summer brought to seek grace and a change of heart by his pious wife, though he was evidently a reluctant pupil.

The weather was dry and rain badly needed. His wife thought he should pray for rain. He consented, and down upon his knees he went one night before retiring and assailed the Throne of Mercy. "O Lord," he said, in conclusion, "if it rains to-morrow it will do my potatoes good. If it don't, I can get in my hay. There!" turning to his wife, "I think I've got God up a tree."

Comstock's Mental Rottenness.

From the Galveston News.

Anthony Comstock in a recent address said that this is an age of corruption and that all good influences are openly derided. Mr. Comstock has spent his life hunting up naughty books and pictures in order to prosecute the offenders against public morals. Naturally everything in his eyes is corrupt. He is in the fix of the lady who objected to Sam Johnson's dictionary on account of the bad words in it. "Ah, madam, I see you hav been looking for them," said Johnson. "It is so with Comstock," says the Atlanta Constitution. "He has been looking for corruption." And he has been laying temptations with false pretenses. Is that the way to promote morality?

Contingently Truthful.

From the Concordia (Kan.) Blade.

The last TRUTH SEEKER has a cartoon with a dog representing the state and a shield with U. S. around his neck, and Edmunds, Blair, Hale, and a W. C. T. U., with the face of a fury, attaching a serpent to the tail of the dog. The next stage presents the serpent, which is named the church, wagging the dog, who remonstrates, and the next stage his snakesbip is dragging the dog toward its "old hole, Puritanism." Next the snake has the dog up in the air, and finally swallows him. In these different stages his snakeship increases in size until he becomes a monster, and the dog grows lank and lean.

It is a very truthful portrait of what would result if that Sunday bill should become law.

To Tax Church Property.

For over a month I hav been endeavoring to find some one of the senators or representativs of Illinois who had courage enough to present a bill for the taxation of church property in the legislature. At each of the mass meetings I hav addressed on the Blair bill, a resolution was adopted demanding taxation of church property, and now Hon. Q. J. Chott, of Chicago, has positivly promised to present the following to the general assembly next week:

A BILL

To amend section 2 of an act entitled, "An Act for the Assessment of Property and for the Levy and Collection of Taxes," approved March 30, 1872; in force July 1, 1872.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the people of the state of Illinois represented in the general assembly: That section 2 of an act entitled, "An Act for the Assessment of Property and for the Levy and Collection of Taxes," approved March 30, 1872, in force July 1, 1872, be and the same is amended so as to read as follows:

PROPERTY EXEMPT FROM TAXATION.

SEC. 2. All property described in this section to the extent herein limited shall be exempt from taxation; that is to say:

First.—All lands donated by the United States for school purposes, not sold or leased; all public schoolhouses; all property of strictly non-religious institutions of learning, including the real estate on which they are located, not leased by institutions or otherwise held with a view to profit.

Second.—All lands used exclusivly as public graveyards, or grounds for burying the dead, except when owned by ecclesiastical corporations or carried on for profit.

Third.—All unentered government lands; all public buildings or structures of whatsoever kind and the contents thereof and the land on which the same are located belonging to the United States.

Fourth.—All property of every kind belonging to the state of Illinois.

Fifth.—All property belonging to any county, town, village, or city, used exclusivly for the maintenance of the poor; all swamp or overflowed lands belonging to any county, so long as the same remains unsold by such county, township, city, or incorporated town, with the ground on which such buildings are erected, not exceeding in any case ten acres.

Sixth.—All property of non-religious institutions of purely public charity when actually and exclusivly used for such charitable purposes, not leased or otherwise used with a view to profit, and all free public libraries, art and scientific institutions.

Seventh.—All fire-engins and other implements used for the extinguishment of fires, with the building used exclusivly for the safe-keeping thereof and the lot of reasonable size on which the building is located, when belonging to any city, village, or town.

Eighth.—All market-houses, public squares, or other public grounds used exclusivly for public purposes; all works, machinery, and fixtures belonging exclusivly to any town, village, or city, and used exclusivly for conveying water to such town, village, or city.

Ninth.—All property which may be used exclusivly by societies for agricultural, horticultural, mechanical, scientific, and philosophic purposes, and not for pecuniary profit.

SEC. 3. That section 2 of said act, and all other acts or parts of acts in conflict herewith, be and the same are hereby repealed.

Will the executiv members of the several states hav a similar bill drafted and presented to their legislature as soon as possible, and demand a hearing before the committee having the bill in charge? Do this without delay. Let the agitation be all along the line. The attack has been made upon us, and this robbery has been permitted too long. Now let us assert our manhood! Because of this Blair bill there could not be a more favorable opportunity for retaliativ agitation.

WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY.

As our Union is trying the experiment of a monthly dance to knit the people more closely together, we shall hold a ball to-morrow (Feb. 22d), and the Vorwaerts Turners hav kindly volunteered to giv us a gymnastic exhibition. Perhaps the writer will make a brief address bearing on the Secular character of the first president's public utterances and documents, and something as to his non-Christian principles.

A VALENTINE'S VISIT.

In the third century a priest of Rome interfered too much with the secular pleasures of the pagans, for which, it is asserted, he was beaten with clubs and then beheaded. His martyrdom secured canonization, and the day of "solemn remembrance" of his terrible death has, through the perversity of human frolic and passions, become celebrated for the mirth-provoking propensities this monk was trying to suppress. Alas for human irreverence! To think a monk's bones merely develop more monkery. How excruciating to the saints this must be!

Wanting a couple of days' rest, I dropped in to Rochelle, Ill., and discovered our worthy Materialistic philosopher, whose admirable articles are such severe specimens of logical reasoning, perusing—just think of it—a valentine. When about to tell him of my willingness to enter into a solemn covenant not to mention the matter to Mrs. Wettstein, he took me into his confidence, and "gave the whole thing away," as I will to your readers. It was only an advertisment of his watches! At his comfortable residence I received a hearty welcome from his charming and accomplished wife, a cordial salute from Mr. Frank—who, being in a local bank, acts as a deputy treasurer of the American Secular Union—also from Otto junior and his pretty sister Olivia. Their delightful home abounds in gems of literature, the recherché and refined in art, for art is another of Brother Wettstein's hobbies. Since my last visit a most important—yes, the most important personage I hav met—is domiciled at his home. No less than William Cullen Bryant Ralph Waldo Emerson, but as I found him fonder of pranks than poetry or philosophy, my embarrassment gradually gave way, and I struck up quite an intimacy with the personage of the overawing name. He's quite autocratic, as young gentlemen of sixteen months usually are, but they would not part with the little tyrant for all his weight in diamonds, for after all he's really good natured. So far he displays more of the propensities of the distinguished scientist John L. Sullivan than those of his Materialistic progenitor. When W. C. B. R. W. E. W. comes to realize the weighty responsibility such a patronymic implies, it will be a wonder if he survives.

Next noon Brother Jas. A. Greenhill, of Clinton, Ia., who has been on a European tour, was passing through Rochelle homeward bound, but was prevailed upon to remain over one train to partake of the good cheer at the Wettstein mansion, and unveil some of the rich reminiscences he had recently acquired in the land of his birth. He told of his visit on Burns's birthday to the house where he was born in Ayr; of his journey to Abbotsford, as you know, the residence of Sir Walter Scott; of his pilgrimage to London, where he went to Westminster Abbey to view the tombs of Darwin and Dickens, and other places of intense personal and historical interest. But, as his friends in Clinton were to giv him a reception that night, we reluctantly let him go.

Brother Wettstein's store is filled with a finer and costlier assortment of diamonds and watches than can be found in an ordinary country jeweler's, but he explained to me that he was compelled to carry a stock adequate to send out samples to the Liberals of the country, as he was now almost entirely dependent on their patronage, the local trade having abandoned him because he has lived here over thirty years, carried an unblemished reputation, assisted as much as any in the town's development, but could not be coerced into hypocrisy and thus into the church. This proves how Christians love their neighbors as themselvs. Before leaving I procured a Freethought badge-pin, for my scarf, so in traveling, though smaller than the former, a Liberal would soon discover it.

E. A. STEVENS, Sec. A. S. U.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

I find that the many demands on my time while on the road prevent my preparing the argument used in the Fishback debate, held at Dorchester, Neb. I will at the very earliest after my arrival home write it up, embodying my articles on Facts and Fallacies of the New Testament and Brief Historical Evidences on the Canon of Scripture, making a pamphlet that will be a ready reference, thoroughly equipping its possessor with the facts that will refute any assertions or arguments of orthodoxy.

Albert Lea, Minn., is one of the most energetic, wide-awake of small towns. I met a cordial welcome from that prince of bonifaces, S. J. Johnson, and his brother, of the Hall House, and had a good visit at the happy home of Brother E. K. Picard, the pioneer Liberal and most outspoken Infidel in the county.

Fears were entertained in regard to our having good attendance, but joyous disappointment awaited us. The Opera House was nearly filled at the first lecture, and each night the attendance greatly increased. I sold a large quantity of Liberal literature. Every inducement was offered the clergy to attend and defend their faith, but all in vain. Liberals were surprised to find, instead of being almost alone, they mustered quite a goodly company. All were greatly encouraged, and are eager for the continuance of the good work and impatient for the advent of Mrs. Reynolds. A good, able, eloquent woman, with her experience in Christian life, can do a wondrous work by enlisting good women and securing their zealous coöperation. Without the whole-hearted help of women no real, efficient, permanent organization can be maintained.

Dundas, Minn., is a quiet little village, devoutly pious, and so it was deemed best to giv them a lecture on "Mormonism as I Saw It in Utah." For this subject good Brother Tue obtained the free use of the Seventh Day Adventist church. Considering the only advertising was half a dozen written notices, the attendance was good. It was the first time I ever delivered a lecture on this subject. It proved of very great interest, and there were eager demands for its repetition.

Northfield, Minn., is a theological college town, mainly inhabited by fossils—old farmers, who hav rented or sold their farms and moved into town to board students and enjoy the sanctifying influences of their Zion. They mostly liv in their back kitchens on the interest of what they owe. The young folks by vigorous hustling keep the town from stagnation, and the students for the ministry necessitate an activ police force.

I delivered a lecture on "Mormonism" at the Opera House. The attendance was small, but I was astonished at the great interest awakened. Very many were earnestly desirous I should repeat the lecture, and promised a crowded house, but time forbade.

Mrs. S. J. Lenont, her sturdy sons, and fair young daughters, are each and all noble representativs of Liberalism, and comprise about all the genuin Infidels in the township.

St. Paul, Minn., is the saintly city of ice palace fame, with grand, mammoth buildings, but narrow streets. I had counted on witnessing the ice carnival, but this has been a most exceptional winter. The Mississippi river was not frozen over until December 21st; last winter it was solidly frozen on November 25th. The weather this year has been so balmy and genial that they could not obtain ice enough to build a palace.

James L. McKelvey, from whom I do hope and expect the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will in the near future receive an account of good and efficient work done by him in the lecture field, is a young man of brains, sterling worth, modesty, and very great ability; John Monroe is a zealous, self-sacrificing, indefatigable worker; C. J. Greenleaf is a practical, studious thinker; C. Nichols is earnest and ever reliable. They form a quartet invincible. Yet, while living in the same city, they were unknown to each other until arranging for lectures made them first acquainted, and now leaves them warm friends.

The lectures were delivered at a church between Eighth and Ninth streets, an out-of-the-way place. The Grand Opera House having burnt down, the theater people had secured the sole use of Market Hall, the only really suitable place, so the church was Hobson's choice.

One of the results of the lectures was a real practical organization, starting with a few members, but they are among the best and most estimable people of the city. They intend to hav science schools on Sunday with an extempore speaking class, and also provide for sociability by a succession of entertainments. C. I. Greenleaf was elected president, and James L. McKelvey, secretary.

River Falls, Minn., is quite a pretty, thriving town. I. C. Putnam, the jolly miller, and his queenly and accomplished wife; Chris Nebel, and his bright, amiable better half; the brave old veteran, by all beloved, S. M. Rosenquist; the outspoken Liberal and practical reformer, George H. Bates, and the ever reliable, sturdy champion of reason, right, and truth, Leonard Stiles, make a glorious vanguard of Liberals that it is an honor for any to follow.

All were astonished at the great success of the lectures. At the last two lectures the Opera House was crowded and a furore of enthusiasm evoked. One more course of lectures and a large and powerful organization can be effected at River Falls.

I go from here to Minneapolis, thence to Princeton, thence to St. Charles, stop over to visit the gentle Wettstein at Rochelle, Ill., thence to Kalamazoo, Mich., and home.

I hav now been away from home eighteen months. I now hav to cancel engagements, so that I may return to my loved ones, and make ready to return to the Pacific coast with Mrs. Reynolds early in May.

St. Paul and Minneapolis are called "the twin cities," being less than twelve miles apart. Minneapolis was the last born, yet has got to the front and secured first place, having to-day a population of over 130,000 against 112,000 of St. Paul, her first-born sister. Both cities evince remarkable energy and progress. There is a very laudable spirit of emulation, resulting in both keeping well up to the times, promptly adopting every modern improvement. Both cities are surrounded with lovely, picturesque, and exceedingly productiv farm land, while their geographical position makes them natural railroad centers. Minneapolis has the advantage on account of her prodigious flour and lumber mills. Her production of flour for 1888 was 7,130,135 barrels, as compared with 6,574,900 barrels for 1887, an increase of 555,235 barrels. And the value is $35,549,371, as against $27,811,827 for 1887, a nice little increase of $7,837,544. And last year was not a good year for making flour either.

Minneapolis made a few feet of lumber last year, at least, enough to be worth making a note of. The indications are that more lumber was made in Minneapolis during the past year than at any other point in the country, with the possible exception of Muskegon and Menominee, Mich. The cut of the Minneapolis mills was 338,000,000 feet.

For the skilful, industrious mechanic there is abundance of work at good wages. A large number of stupendous buildings, eight to twelve stories high, are in course of erection, and very many more will be started early in the spring.

The cost of living is very low. I noticed in the markets good boiling pieces of first-class beef at four cents per pound; roasts, choice cuts, at seven and eight cents; mutton, six cents; potatoes, thirty-five cents per bushel, and other things in proportion. With thrift and economy the industrious hav every chance to save money, and there are excellent opportunities for safe and profitable investments.

The three lectures were well advertised, yet the attendance was not large, simply because delivered at the Grand Army Hall away up in the sky parlor with a long, winding, dismal, dreary, rough, and rugged stairway to climb to reach it.

When you hav lectures, apply strict business rules to the endeavor.

It is not profitable to go to much expense to carry coals to Newcastle, nor to proclaim Infidelity to Infidels. We desire the greatest good to the greatest number, and should, therefore, strive to insure the largest possible audience, and especially offer every inducement to the ladies to attend.

Ladies will not—unless deeply interested—climb up long, dark stairways to listen to unpopular truths. In big cities especially, second-rate, sky-parlor halls should be shunned.

The most popular place in town is always really, in the end, the most satisfactory. Opera houses are generally to be preferred.

Advertise thoroughly. But never giv "hand-bills" to boys to distribute, nor to regular bill-posters. Hire some good girl or woman; then your work will be well and faithfully done, and, at the same time, you are helping the deserving.

Three lines of editorial is better than six squares of ordinary advertisment. One dozen lines of editorial in the local newspaper is better than five hundred dodgers, and equal to two hundred small posters.

Despite all disadvantages, very much interest was manifested in the lectures.

Minneapolis had the start of St. Paul in organizing its Liberal society, but she will hav to "hustle," or St. Paul will excel her in efficiency and propaganda work for Freethought. Both societies report excellent and interesting meetings last Sunday.

At Minneapolis Brother John Maddox delivered a very telling and able address. He is a power for good, a reliable helper, intellectually, financially, and every other way. A deep thinker, a genuin honest man and true Infidel, with the courage of his convictions and the ability to express them. Then he has the great advantage of a true helpmeet in his noble wife, and able, powerful auxiliaries in his independent, intellectual, very pretty daughters.

Good old father John Macomber, the president of the society, a lifelong worker for Liberalism, is a host in himself, while the genial, gentle Fred Greaves and the indomitable, zealous, practical Charles Lownd represent the younger element, and are determined the cause shall be sustained and Minneapolis keep ahead, if pluck, self-sacrifice, and persistent efforts can accomplish it, and there is a host of loyal, generous-hearted Liberals in the society backing them.

Princeton is quite a large, prosperous place, depending mainly on chopping and hauling wood in winter and farming in summer. Two churches had been holding revival meetings and were just concluding with a good hallelujah of glory. The Methodists concluded to hold on yet a little longer—at least as long as the Infidel lecturer remained, for fear he should entice away some of the lambs. The Congregational minister did attend two of the lectures, and would hav attended the last, only he had to be at his church, as they were to vote if he should be retained another year. While at the lecture he failed to avail himself of the invitation to correct any real or supposed misstatements, or to say a word in defense of his faith.

The lectures created wonderful interest. The hall was crowded each night. Very few had ever before heard an Infidel lecture, and they had been led to believe it would consist of a tirade of abuse of Christians—a wild denunciation of everything good. Very many expressed their approval of the lectures and their high appreciation of the ennobling principles of Liberalism, and all were astonished to learn how in the past they had been deceived, and what the Bible really taught.

So great was the interest that a very general request was urged for a fourth lecture. I spoke the fourth night on "Salvation: Christian or Secular, Which?" And the eager and extreme interest manifested well repaid for the extra effort I put forth. I disposed of quite a number of Liberal pamphlets, and obtained some subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Irving R. Zimmerman, Louis Proctor, and J. C. Hatch are the chief burden-bearers. I enjoyed a very pleasant home at jolly Henry Heubert's Commercial House. He is a Liberal, and knows how to keep a hotel. There are brave, noble women and earnest men devoted to the advancement of the work of Freethought at Princeton. I left them with regret, promising to use all my influence to induce Mrs. Reynolds to visit them on her way to the Pacific coast.

C. B. REYNOLDS.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY'S Catalog of Freethought, Reform, and Scientific Books will be mailed free.

IN this issue we print Mr. Frederic Harrison's Positivistic opinion of Agnosticism. It is worth reading, though most Agnostics strongly dissent from his conclusions. England possesses no more brilliant essayist than Mr. Harrison, unless it may be Professor Thomas Huxley, who in the Nineteenth Century for the month following the date of the Fortnightly Review, in which Mr. Harrison's article appeared, took occasion to macerate a Christian who had spoken slightingly of Agnosticism, and to reply to Mr. Harrison's misconception of the popular heretical philosophy. Mr. Huxley's answer to both his opponents is as keen as a knife, and will be read with great satisfaction by the Liberals of this country. He also points out to Mr. Samuel Laing, whose Agnostic creed appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 19th, that he has fallen in various logical and creedal errors. Professer Huxley's paper will appear in the two succeeding numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

A GREAT sensation was made by an evening paper last week by the allegation that President Cleveland is a Spiritualist. It would be no one's business but his own if he is, and nothing to his discredit, as the dailies seem to think, but the facts are that he probably is not. His intimate friends in Buffalo positivly assert that he is not, though the dispatch from that place states that "they are not so sure but that he is a Materialist," in spite of his Presbyterian antecedents and attendance upon churches of that ilk. All that we know upon the subject is what an Albany friend says, which is to the effect that Cleveland, when governor of this state, was in the habit, when among his personal friends, of arguing upon the heretical side when religious questions were broached. By the general consensus of the Albanians, who had opportunities to know, he was put down as a Freethinker. It is said, too, that his sister Elizabeth used frequently to reason with him on his unbelief, and come off second-best.

THE Rev. Dr. Alfred Nevin, of Philadelphia, according to the Tribune, has some sharp ideas on the prescnt status of Christianity. In his opinion it is not advancing, but declining. Every year larger numbers of people are ceasing to attend church services, and every year more sensational efforts are being made on the part of the churches to attract them. Entertainments and amusements are often made to take the place of gospel preaching. There is plenty of church machinery, he says, and religious conferences of all kinds are more numerous than ever; but the saving of men's souls is often lost sight of. The responsibility for this Dr. Nevin places upon the civil war and the subsequent attacks upon religion of "noisy Infidels," and recreant clergy. The revision of the Bible, too, had much to do with unsettling the belief of many in the integrity of the Bible. Other reasons he has, among them the multiplication of religious associations—which divides and therefore weakens the workers; the decline of church disciplinary authority—or the tendency of the people to force the preachers to mind their own business; the discontinuance of family worship, and relegation of the religious training of children to the Sunday-school. This may be all so; if it is, we are glad of it, but the one great cheering fact is Dr. Nevin's well-founded statement that Christianity of the orthodox sort is going down.

IN his last encyclical Mr. Pecci, of Roma, as the Mail and Express writes it, devoted a few lines to the erstwhile "strolling vagabonds" now known as actors, and generally received into rather more intellectual society than the average priest can frequent. Mr. Pecci says: "We know that impious and immoral dramas are exhibited on the stage; that books and journals are written to jeer at virtue and ennoble crime; that the very arts which were intended to giv pleasure and recreation hav been made to minister to impurity." The Dramatic Mirror doesn't like this, and reads the old gentleman a short lesson on consistency. "The Romish church," said the Mirror, "is not averse to accepting benefits at the hands of this 'impious and immoral' institution; indeed, if the pope would but glance over the accounts of the Catholic churches and charities in this city he would find that the stage had been to them a source of considerable revenue. It is a matter of fact that actors hav raised more money for Catholic charities during the past five years than they hav for their own charity, the Actors' Fund. And pray, by what means did his holiness learn that 'impious and immoral dramas are exhibited on the stage?' He hasn't seen them, of course, nor hav the priests of his church, for theater-going is not supposed to come properly within their province. The testimony he has depended upon, whatever its nature, must hav been decidedly unreliable. It is astonishing that he should hav permitted himself to be led into the foolish, sweeping condemnation of something of which he has no personal knowledge, and of whose character it is evident that he has been falsely informed. The fallible assertion of the sovereign pontiff, whom good Catholics believe to be infallible, must either test their faith in his judgment or do wrongful mischief to the theater." The Mirror seems to be more astonished than it probably is. The editor undoubtedly knows that anything that keeps a penny from the church, or a person from the confessional, or raises a doubt of the church's supreme importance in the world, or that inculcates virtue and bravery and goodness without giving the church credit, must be condemned by the head of that organization. Of course the church will take all the money the actors are foolish enough to giv her—that is what she is here for.

A PAPER called River Falls, published at Beaver Falls, Minn., prints in one issue two items of interest to Freethinkers: "The meetings conducted by Mr. Reynolds, the Liberalist, which closed Sunday night, were well attended throughout. Mr. Reynolds is a fluent speaker and very able withal, and his discourses will hav a tendency to inspire those who heard him with a commendable desire to 'search the scriptures.'" "To evidence their Liberalistic ideas in a material way, four of our estcemed citizens—Messrs. F. W. Houston, J. T. Starr, J. D. Putnam and George Fortune—'pooled,' and sent to a worthy widow of our city, with six children, a barrel of flour last Monday."

Tidal Waves.

It will no doubt appear presumptuous in me to attack an old and apparently well-established scientific theory—a theory which seems so well founded on facts that I shall, no doubt, be considered an idiot, or a madman, to attempt to controvert it. But I shall offer no apology for attacking a scientific theory which I believe false, any more than I should were I criticising a religious dogma or a social custom.

I am not making this criticism for the mere sake of controversy, or for the purpose of appearing erudite. But having had several years' experience in the school-room, and having many occasions to discuss the subject of the tides with my classes, I hav always been unable to reconcile, to myself, at least, many seeming absurdities.

It may be that it is ignorance on my part in not being able to fully understand, and therefore accept, the universal explanation of the cause of the tides. But I hope that if I hav gone astray in my reasoning, some one will kindly set me right.

I shall not so much as offer a suggestion of what I think may be the cause of the tides. I shall only present my reasons for rejecting the present explanation of the cause of the tidal wave.

May it not be that a mere coincidence has been taken for a cause in the theory of the tides? Coincidences hav often been mistaken for causes, and may it not be the same with the subject under discussion?

For many centuries the early Egyptians had observed that the rising of the Nile coincided with the heliacal rising of Sirius, and thus it came to pass that the appearance of the Dog-star on the horizon at the rising of the sun was not only viewed as the signal, but as the cause of the inundations.

The priests proclaimed how the water stood on the Nilometer, and the husbandman made corresponding provisions for an abundant or a scanty harvest. Sirius is the most brilliant star in the heavens; to the Egyptian the inundation was the most important event upon earth. Mistaking a coincidence for a cause, the Egyptian was led to believe that when the splendid Dog-star emerged from the morning rays of the sun, and began to assert its own inherent power, the great river, moved by sympathy, commenced to rise. From coincidences like this the belief soon arose that the star, in some mysterious manner, exercised an influence over terrestrial affairs and the lives of men; they were therefore objects worthy of veneration, and from star-worship evolved astrology. And modern civilization is tinctured, in no small degree, with these ancient superstitions.

We frequently hear people, apparently well informed, contend that farm products will be more certain of yielding well if planting and sowing is done at the "right time of the moon." For instance, wheat and other cereals should be sown in the "light of the moon," as then they will "head well;" but potatoes and other vegetables, whose fruit is borne in the ground, should be planted in the "dark of the moon," for, if planted in the "light of the moon," they would "run all to tops." In like manner many people pretend to predict the weather, or attribute the condition of the weather to changes of the moon. May it not be that the theory of the tides is just as erroneous, and has originated in superstition?

Since the days of Anaxagoras and Thales it has been believed that the tides are caused by the influence of the moon, and Newton's discovery of the law of gravitation seems to hav firmly established the present explanation of the tidal wave. And yet it seems to me that the theory is encumbered with difficulties sufficient to break it down.

It is claimed that the tides are caused by the attraction of the sun and moon. The tide is highest when the sun and moon act conjointly, and lowest when they act in opposition, a fact which givs much weight in support of the theory. It is also claimed that as the moon is four hundred times nearer the earth than the sun, her attractiv influence is much the greater. But it must be remembered that every particle of matter attracts every other particle of matter directly proportionate to its mass, and inversely as the square of the distance increases. Though the moon is four hundred times nearer the earth than the sun, yet the mass of matter of the moon is so small compared with that of the sun that the sun exerts upon the earth one hundred and twenty times the greater attractiv force.

Then if the moon causes a rise in the tides to the hight of fifty feet or more, as in the Bay of Fundy, then as the moon exerts only the one hundred and twentieth part of the influence of the sun, when the sun and moon act conjointly there should be a tidal wave seven hundred feet in hight rolling upon the peninsula of Nova Scotia and the province of New Brunswick. And, furthermore, while the conjoint action of the sun and moon should produce the highest tides, yet the sun should produce, in opposition to the moon's influence, far higher tides than the moon does in opposition to the sun's influence.

If the moon's attractiv force is greater than that of the sun, then the earth would revolve about the former instead of the latter.
